DURING the three years that I was engaged in writing this book, the early history of Indiana naturally often became the subject of conversation in mingling with educators, legislators, politicians, editors and men engaged in professional and business pursuits. In all these talks but one individual revealed knowledge of the fact that under the first constitution, in force from 1816 to 1851, the people of the commonwealth were permitted to vote for and elect only two State officers—Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. Other State officers were elected by the General Assembly. Judges were appointed by the Governor.

Among all those with whom I conversed relative to these matters, there was not a single one cognizant of the fact that the first constitution of Indiana never was submitted to popular vote for adoption or rejection, but became the supreme law of the State as drafted by the constitutional convention, whose members had been chosen by the voters of the territory.

The idea of a responsible leadership and belief in the efficacy of a representative government were far more strongly entrenched in the public mind than may be said to have been the case when in later years popular delusion gave emphasis to the theory that ability and power to lead meant curtailment of the right of the people to rule.

Thoughtful perusal of this book will make clear what sort of government the founders of the Republic had in mind when they established the United States of North America. A clear understanding can be gathered of the principles applied in the formation of this government by closely following the historical recital in the opening chapters. No one can intelligently peruse the pages of this book without becoming greatly enriched in information that will be found of incalculable value in the exercise of the prerogatives of citizenship and the performance of duty devolving upon an alert and patriotic electorate.

POLITICS IN THE EARLY DAYS OF THE REPUBLIC

PARTY ALIGNMENTS WERE VARIABLE AND LARGELY PERSONAL—AFTER THIRTY YEARS LINES BECAME MORE SHARPLY DRAWN AND MORE DISTINCTLY DEFINED

DOMINANTLY, the Democratic party, whose history in Indiana it is the purpose of this volume to narrate, is younger by a dozen years than the State itself; but in its principles, although not in its name, it traces its lineage to Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, and in that sense is as old as the Nation. The State of Indiana, and the country in which it is an important commonwealth, have never been without a political party. Wherever the active life of the people has been developed, political parties have always sprung into existence. An absence of political parties would be an indication of passive indifference to their true interests on the part of the people, or of tyrannical repression on the part of their rulers.

The freest and most gifted nations have the most sharply defined political partisanship. It is not a commendable virtue for a citizen to stand aloof from political activity, and it should be a shame rather than a boast for any intelligent person to declare that he does not affiliate with or "belong" to a political party.

Edmund Burke defined a political party as "a body of men united in promoting, by their joint endeavors, the national interest in some particular policy or movement in which they are all agreed." The very name "party" indicates that each such body of men represents but a part of the citizens. Therefore, a party possesses the consciousness of only one part of the Nation and has no right to attempt to identify itself with the whole and arrogate to itself all the virtues and patriotism of the people. Convinced that its principles are for the best interests of the public, it may rightfully combat for them and seek to have them prevail, but it has no right to ignore the views of those who differ from it or to seek the utter destruction of other parties. In fact, the experience of popular governments demonstrates that the public interest is best promoted by the existence of two nearly equally balanced political parties.

During the Revolutionary War, which resulted in the establishment of this Nation, there were but two parties—those favoring continued allegiance to Great Britain, and those supporting the movement for independence. The latter called themselves Patriots, and the others Tories; while the former designated themselves as Loyalists and their opponents as Rebels. Doubtless both were sincere, and high authority has defined a patriot revolutionist as a "simply successful rebel."

The Confederation in which the Colonies had united to achieve their independence was soon found inadequate to meet the exigencies of an independent Nation. So a convention was called to amend the Articles of Confederation. At once two parties appeared. One, including Washington, Hamilton, Franklin and Pinckney, believed a strong central government necessary. The other, including Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Samuel Adams, George Clinton and James Monroe, feared that the central government, if too powerful, would infringe upon the liberty of the people. The former party was called Federalist, and the latter Anti-Federalist. The Federal Constitution, as finally adopted, was a compromise, providing an instrument capable of a double interpretation on the disputed point, and the two parties continued under the new government. The Federalists gave the Constitution a broad construction with large powers to the Nation, while the Anti-Federalists gave a strict construction, which made the States the paramount authority except in specially defined cases. Alexander Hamilton was from the first the leader of the former party, and Thomas Jefferson was soon recognized as the head of the latter. Both men were members of President Washington's cabinet. But the President's firm conviction of the necessity for a strong central government enabled the Federalists to control the policy of Congress during the first twelve years—the formative period of the new government. Besides, through the life tenure of the members of the Supreme Court, Federalist views on the construction of the Constitution prevailed for many years in the judicial branch of the government.

Jefferson's political sagacity led him early to perceive that an "anti" party would not successfully appeal to the people, so he sought a party name that should stand for something affirmative. His own idealism in connection with a residence in France made him an admirer of the principles set forth by the French in establishing their Republic. Moreover, there pulsed throughout this country a feeling of grateful sympathy for France because of the assistance she had rendered us in our war for independence. With shrewd political wisdom Jefferson appropriated this sympathy by using the term which the French had employed and named his party "Republican." The Anti-Federalists had already accused Hamilton of influencing

Washington to favor a government modeled after that of England, which, under popular forms, would, they asserted, actually establish monarchical or, at best, aristocratic rule. In fact, in the political bitterness of the times, the Federalists were often by their opponents called monarchists.

The formal beginning of this Republican party dates from May 13, 1792, when Jefferson, still a member of the Cabinet, addressed a letter to President Washington in which he said: "The Republican party, who wish to preserve the government in its present form, are fewer in numbers than the Monarchical Federalists. They are fewer, even when joined by the two or three, or half a dozen Anti-Federalists, who, though they dare not avow it, are still opposed to any general government; but being less so to a Republican than to a monarchical one, they naturally side with those whom they think pursuing the lesser evil."

This may be taken as the platform of the Jeffersonian Republican party; and no political pronouncement was ever more adroitly worded to appeal to all the dissatisfied elements of the people. Its assumption that the Federalists were preparing the way for a monarchy; its apparent solicitude for the preservation of the Constitution, and its repudiation of the views of the extreme States' Rights partisan, were calculated to attract not only the actual opponents of the administration, but the conservative supporters of the new form of government.

Washington's proclamation of neutrality in the war between France and England brought into prominence a class of active politicians among the sympathizers with the former country. They assumed the name "Democrat" and formed a circle of societies patterned after the Jacobin Clubs of Paris. One of them, indeed, the Charleston Society, actually affiliated with the Paris Clubs. Their prime instigator was the French ambassador, Genet. These societies became quite numerous in the central and southern states. For a time they were very active and extremely vindictive in language, branding all who did not agree with them as enemies of "the people." They humored the whims and passions of the more ignorant masses, assumed eccentricities of dress and language, and expressed contempt for all constituted authority. With the natural instinct of their class to be "agin' the government," they sided with the party of Jefferson and called themselves, politically, "Democratic-Republicans," and were particularly vicious in abuse of Washington. The Federalists were horrified and the Republican leaders disgusted with their antics; nevertheless, the latter were naturally not averse to receiving the aid of their votes.

With the same spirit which during the Civil War led the two political parties at the North to dub their opponents respectively as "Abolitionists" and "Copperheads," the Republicans in those days had called the Federalists "Monarchists," and now the Federalists retorted by terming the Republicans "Democrats."

These "Democratic-Republicans," however, were not the progenitors of the Democratic party whose illustrious leaders later helped to build the greatness of Indiana. Their societies were regarded in those days very much as is the I. W. W. organization at present. A prominent member of the Jeffersonian party, Hon. Edward Livingston, speaking years after of the conditions at that time, stated that gross as were the attacks upon Washington, they came from Bache, Leib and Duane, and the noisy and frequently silly leaders of the professed Democrats; and it is greatly creditable to the Republicans proper that their opposition to Washington's administration was legitimate, and their public utterances were decorous and affectionate toward the President personally.

Although later writers have applied the names "Democrat," "Republican," and "Democratic-Republican" interchangeably to the party of Jefferson, there is abundant evidence that for a quarter of a century the party leaders avoided the name assumed by the imitators of the Jacobin Clubs of Paris, and it is said that Andrew Jackson in those early years denounced the appellation "Democrat" as a political slander. At any rate, when Jefferson, in his first inaugural, appealing for the support of the entire American people, declared "We are all Federalists, we are all Republicans," he did not mention any Democrats. The fact is that the suppression of the whisky insurrection, which those societies were charged with having incited, and, a little later, the threatened war with France, virtually drove them out of existence. It was not until the odium created by the folly and extravagancies of their promoters had been forgotten in the lapse of years, that the term Democratic in its true sense of "rule by the demos"—all the people—was revived in its old glorious Grecian meaning and accepted by a political party in this country. And that occurred when the State of Indiana was twelve years old.

The Federalist party, of which Alexander Hamilton was the acknowledged leader, had two objectives: First, to form a government strong enough to make and hold a place among the nations of the earth; and, secondly, to create a central authority sufficiently powerful to coalesce the diverse and often conflicting interests of the various states into one general welfare. In pursuit of the first objective James Madison was in hearty and active accord with Hamilton, and they worked together effectively, through the framing and adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the first two years of Washington's administration—the vital period in the organization of the government. To Madison was due very largely the framing of the "Compromises of the Constitution"—those phrases on which differing constructions could be and have been placed. It was as to the meaning of these phrases that the distinction of "Strict Constructionist" and "Broad Constructionist" arose. Jefferson, whose absence from the country as Minister to France from 1785 had prevented him from taking part in the framing or adoption of the Constitution, became, on his return in 1789, the leader of the Strict Constructionists, and on matters of internal policy he was joined by Madison. There were, however, able and patriotic men on both sides of the question—said question being fundamentally, whether the Federal government has only limited, strictly defined powers, leaving the States supreme within their respective borders, and, in consequence, whether the primary allegiance of the citizen is due to his State or to the Nation. This question was not finally settled until it was decided by the arbitration of arms in the Civil War.

It is interesting to note, however, that whatever may have been their theory as to the construction of the Constitution, the six most noted Presidents have not hesitated to exercise the broadest governmental and executive authority when, in their judgment, the "general welfare" demanded it. Washington did this in the whisky insurrection and in his proclamation of neutrality in the war between France and England; Jefferson did it in the purchase of Louisiana, and in laying the embargo; Jackson did it in removing the bank deposits, and in suppressing nullification; Lincoln did it in suspending the writ of habeas corpus and in issuing the emancipation proclamation; Cleveland did it in the Chicago strike, and in his notice to England in the Venezuela matter, and Roosevelt did it in the anthracite troubles and in acquiring the Panama canal zone.

The first popular test between the Federalist and Republican parties came in the presidential election of 1796. There were no formal nominations, but a general assent that the Federalist candidate for President should be Washington's associate as Vice-President, John Adams, and that the Republican candidate should be Thomas Jefferson. The electors at that time voted for two candidates. The one having the highest vote became President and the one with the next highest, Vice-President. As to their second choice, the Republicans were divided between Aaron Burr and Samuel Adams—Burr receiving 30 votes and Adams 15. The Federalists were likewise divided—Thomas Pinckney of South Carolina having 59, and Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut, 11. There were also a number of scattering votes, Washington himself receiving one. Of the two chief candidates, Adams received 71 votes and Jefferson 68. Thus Adams became President and Jefferson Vice-President. A. K. McClure, in his book, "Our Presidents and How We Make Them," says of this election: "In no modern national campaign have the candidates been so maliciously defamed as were those in this contest of the fathers of the republic. Jefferson was denounced as an unscrupulous demagogue, and Adams was denounced as a kingly despot without sympathy for the people and opposed to every principle of popular government."

The alien and sedition laws enacted during Adams' administration were an extreme exercise of centralized power. They were aimed at the practices of the Democratic societies, but were opposed by Hamilton as uncalled for, unwise, and a fatal political blunder. They tended, as he foresaw, to make the Federalist administration obnoxious to the people. Washington died during the last days of the year 1799, and the campaign of 1800 was a repetition of that of four years previous, both in the personality of the candidates and the virulence of the opposing sides. This time each party voted unitedly for its two candidates, giving the opportunity for a tie. The Republicans had 73 electoral votes for Jefferson and Burr, and the Federalists 65 for Adams and Pinckney. As the vote was a tie between Jefferson and Burr, and as each had a majority of the electoral college, the House of Representatives, under the Constitution, had to elect one of the two as President, whereupon the other would become Vice-President. As the Federalists were "out of it" so far as a candidate of their own was concerned, their Representatives in Congress either abstained from voting, or voted as personal or partisan motives influenced them. The voting was by States, and the contest continued seven days. Hamilton, regarding Jefferson as much the safer man for President, cast his influence in his favor and he finally received the votes of ten States to four for Burr and two blank.

This action of Hamilton aroused the undying hatred of Aaron Burr, and was the underlying cause of the challenge to a duel, which the "code of honor" of that day compelled Hamilton to accept, and in which he was killed. Before his death, however, Hamilton had warmly sustained the action of Jefferson in the acquisition of Louisiana, although most of the Federalists, for partisan reasons, denounced the purchase as bitterly as latter-day anti-imperialists have denounced the acquisition of Porto Rico and the Philippines. Indeed, such is the course of politics that had Hamilton lived it is not a violent presumption that he and Jefferson would have been actively co-operating for the good of the country.

Adams took his defeat hard. He packed his goods and left the White House at midnight of March 3. Still time tempers even the asperities of politics. Adams lived to see his son hold important offices under Jefferson and his successors, and even to be a Republican President. There was, moreover, friendly correspondence between Jefferson and Adams, and both died on the Fourth of July, 1826—the fiftieth anniversary of the day made memorably glorious by their mutual action in the Continental Congress.

Burr resigned the Vice-Presidency, bade farewell to the Senate in a speech that moved even his enemies to tears, embarked upon a scheme to wrest Mexico from the Spaniards and establish either an independent republic or an empire, was tried for treason on the charge that he intended to seize part of Louisiana in the scheme, and, though acquitted, was thoroughly discredited, and died in poverty and obscurity.*

The experience at this election led to an amendment of the Constitution establishing the present system of electing the President and Vice-President by separate votes of the electors.

In the administration of his office Jefferson practiced the democratic simplicity of manners which he professed. He avoided all pomp and ceremony. The stories of his hitching his horse to the fence on the occasion of his inauguration, and of his receiving foreign ministers in dressing-gown and slippers, are probably as mythical as the tale of Washington and the cherry tree, or of Jackson's smoking

*The retirement of Aaron Burr from the Vice-Presidency before the expiration of his term has been variously treated by historians. Some have entirely ignored it, and some have called it "resignation." Parton says he "took leave of the Senate," and gives a dramatic account of the scene when the Senators, moved to tears by Burr's eloquence, unanimously adopted resolutions extolling his fairness as presiding officer, and proceeded to elect one of their number as president pro-tem to succeed him. The event occurred during executive session March 2, 1805. Burr's motive can only be surmised. He himself quietly attributed it to "indisposition," which might refer to physical illness and might mean that he was "indisposed" to participation in the installation of his hated enemy, George Clinton, the vice-president elect. Possibly he desired the spectacular effect actually produced. But, whatever his motive, or by whatever name the act be designated, Aaron Burr absolutely relinquished the Vice-Presidency two days before his term of office expired.

a corn-cob pipe while transacting business with representatives of other nations. But, instead of delivering his inaugural address in person, as Washington and Adams had done, after the manner of the King of England to Parliament, he sent in a written message to be read by the clerk, thus establishing a precedent that was followed by all of his successors until the time of Woodrow Wilson, who returned to the practice of Washington.

For the elections of 1804, formal nominations were for the first time made. The Republican members of Congress met in caucus and renominated Jefferson for President, at the same time nominating George Clinton of New York for Vice-President. This was the beginning of the Congressional caucus nominations which continued until the time of Jackson. It was, however, but the nationalizing of a practice that had grown up in several States, by which the members of the Legislatures in their respective party caucuses had named candidates for State offices and Congressmen, and sometimes indicated the choice of the State for President. The Federalists made no open nominations, but their leaders united on Charles C. Pinckney of South Carolina for President and Rufus King of New York for Vice-President. The election showed the complete collapse of the Federalist party. Jefferson and Clinton had 162 electoral votes, while Pinckney and King had but 14.

The early custom had been for the Vice-President to follow as President. Adams had been Vice-President under Washington, and Jefferson under Adams. But as Jefferson's second term approached its close there were indications that he preferred his Secretary of State, James Madison, for his successor. There was some demurring in Virginia where the friends of James Monroe, feeling that he had not been treated fairly, urged him for the presidency. The Congressional caucus, however, was controlled by the friends of Madison, and nominated him for President, re-nominating George Clinton for Vice-President. There was considerable ill feeling, especially in Virginia, where the "Quids," led by John Randolph of Roanoke, for a time threatened a serious defection. The trouble, however, was allayed by the influence of Jefferson, who arranged that Monroe should enter the Cabinet as Secretary of State, and thus be in line as Madison's successor, according to the new order of promotion. The Federalists again informally accepted Pinckney and King as candidates without nomination, and made a desperate rally to regain power. The result was a slight gain, as they had 47 electoral votes to 122 for Madison.

Like some other Presidents since, who have been chosen in deference to the wishes of their predecessors, Madison did not measure up to the expectations of his friends. He was greater in constructive than in executive ability. Constitutionally a man of peace, he was confronted by conditions of war, and his administration seemed on the point of failure when a number of the younger element in Congress, led by Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, William H. Crawford and Felix Grundy, forced him into a more active policy, including a declaration of war against England—a war, however, for which the country was absolutely unprepared, and in which it was saved from utter disgrace only by the heroism of its improvised navy, and the brilliant victory of the volunteers under Andrew Jackson at New Orleans.

Madison was, however, re-nominated in 1812 by the Congressional caucus, though the discontent in his own party was so great that fifty members absented themselves. George Clinton, after serving nearly eight years as Vice-President, had died in office and been buried at Washington, whence his remains were removed to New York one hundred years later. So the caucus nominated John Langdon of New Hampshire, the first president pro tem. of the Senate, for Vice-President, but he declined and a second caucus named Elbridge Gerry of "gerrymandering" fame in Massachusetts.

The re-nomination of Madison was followed by the first "bolt" in our national politics. The Republican members of the New York Legislature nominated their party leader in the State, DeWitt Clinton, as an opposition candidate. The Federalists made no nomination for President, but at a conference the leaders agreed to support Clinton and named Jared Ingersoll of Pennsylvania for Vice-President.

Thus the Republican party was divided, with the Federalists generally supporting Clinton. But the war he had been so averse to waging rallied to support Madison and he was elected by a vote of 122 to 89. DeWitt Clinton afterward took part in the organization of the Whig party, and as Governor of New York State achieved a national reputation and wonderfully aided the development of his own State and of the great West by the construction of the Erie Canal.

It is interesting to note in regard to the "war of 1812" that owing to the slowness of communication in those days, some of the events of the greatest political importance connected with it actually took place after the treaty of peace had been signed. The signatures were affixed December 24, 1814. The Hartford Convention was then in session, and early in January passed the resolutions denouncing the war, which sealed the fate of the Federalists. Under a proclamation of President Madison, January 12 was observed as a day of fasting and prayer for peace, and more than all, on January 8, General Jackson, with 7,000 volunteers, defeated 10,000 British veterans, and won the battle of New Orleans, which victory made him President later on.

While the two elections of James Monroe have, because of the lack of opposition, been termed the "era of good feeling," his path to the first nomination was by no means easy. He was not personally popular. William H. Crawford, a Senator from Georgia, was an aggressive candidate, and the Congressional caucus for nominating was already so unpopular that only 58 of the 141 Republican members attended on the first call. The influence of Jefferson and Madison, however, brought 118 to a second meeting, and Monroe, through the same influence, obtained eleven majority over Crawford. Daniel D. Tompkins of New York was named for Vice-President.

For a time the discontent seemed ominous. Public meetings were held in various parts of the country denouncing "King Caucus that seeks to control the people in the selection of their highest officers." At several of these meetings bitter addresses were made by Roger B. Taney, afterward Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Had there been a strong opposition party, Monroe might have been defeated; but the Federalists were so utterly discredited by the part some of their leaders had taken at the Hartford Convention that their open assistance would have been an injury to any candidate. The result was that no nomination was made against Monroe, and no national contest waged. The presidential electors of Connecticut, Delaware and Massachusetts, 34 in all, cast their votes for Rufus King of New York and Monroe received the remaining 183—of which Indiana furnished three.

This State had adopted a Constitution in June, 1816, and the Legislature had chosen presidential electors later on; but it was not admitted into the Union until December 17. At first an animated discussion was held as to whether the votes should be counted, and the two houses of Congress separated to enable the House of Representatives to settle the question of eligibility. No action was taken, however, but when the two houses again met the result was announced, including the vote of Indiana, which thus cast her first presidential vote for a Jeffersonian Republican candidate.

Madison retired to his farm in Virginia and interested himself in agricultural pursuits. He took no active part in politics, but when the South Carolina nullifiers were quoting his Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798 in justification of their nullification and secession doctrines, he wrote several powerful letters to demonstrate the fallacy of their reasoning. He died six days before the Fourth of July, 1836.

Monroe made John Quincy Adams his Secretary of State. During his administration of eight years, two moderately protective tariffs were passed, Florida was annexed, the first slavery conflict was adjusted by the Missouri Compromise, and the famous "Monroe Doctrine" in regard to European interference with America was promulgated. It was a period of recovery from war and of general growth and prosperity. Naturally cautious and conservative, Monroe had aroused no personal antagonisms during his first term. A general assent to the principle of two terms shut out ambitious competitors in his own party, and the utter disintegration of the Federalists had destroyed outside opposition. The regular congressional caucus was called in 1820, but so few attended it that no nomination was made, and Monroe repeated the experience of Washington in securing a unanimous electoral vote—with the exception of one—without either nomination or election contest. Tompkins was re-elected Vice-President.

In this election, following the Indiana precedent, the electoral vote of Missouri was counted, the State having adopted its constitution, though not having been admitted into the Union.

Unlike some modern statesmen, Monroe had served his country so unselfishly that he had absorbed his private fortune, and he left the office of the presidency without means of support. For a time he served as justice of the peace in Virginia, and then found a home with his son-in-law in New York, where he died July 4, 1831. He was buried without ostentation, and his grave was left unmarked until a few years ago.

The presidential campaign of 1824 was a personal rather than a political contest. All the candidates were members of the Republican party, and there was no declaration of principles, as it was assumed that any of them would carry out the policy of previous administrations. While many candidates were discussed, only six were favorably presented. They were named by mass meetings and State Legislatures, and one, William H. Crawford, by the discredited Congressional caucus. Of the six, DeWitt Clinton of New York, who had run against Monroe in 1816, withdrew, and John C. Calhoun was transferred to the list for Vice-President. The four that remained through the campaign were John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury; Henry Clay, who had been Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Andrew Jackson, who had been United States Representative and Senator, and Supreme Court Judge in his State, but who, above all, was "the Hero of New Orleans."

The contest did not develop any great bitterness, and resulted in no choice for President, though Calhoun was almost unanimously elected Vice-President. The electoral vote stood: Jackson, 99; Adams, 84; Crawford, 41; Clay, 37. The election accordingly went to the House, as between the three highest candidates. There the friends of Clay helped to elect Adams. Clay was made Secretary of State, and the Jackson men charged that there had been a "deal" in connection with the election. The charge was denied and is not now believed to have been well founded. But the bitterness aroused made a lasting break between Jackson and Clay, though both still belonged to the same political party. In this election the vote of Indiana both in the Electoral College and in the House of Representatives was cast for the idolized hero of New Orleans, Andrew Jackson.

The administration of John Quincy Adams conformed to the highest type of statesmanship. He treated the office as a public trust and not as either a personal or party perquisite. He made only two dismissals from office, and both for good cause. He favored internal improvements more than did his predecessors, but that was because the opening and developing of the West had created greater need for them. In fact, Jackson, when in Congress, by his votes sustained measures the same in principle. It should not be forgotten that John Quincy Adams was not a Federalist, but a consistent and earnest supporter of Jefferson and his policies. Soon after his retirement from the Presidency he was elected to the House of Representatives, where he continued to serve his country until his death in 1848. He literally died in service, having been stricken with apoplexy at his seat in the House.

The presidential campaign of 1828 began almost as soon as Adams had been inaugurated, when the Legislature of Tennessee presented the name of Jackson as his successor. Criticisms of Adams' administration revived much of the asperities and resentments of the old Republican and Federalist campaigns. Mass meetings and resolutions of Legislatures followed one another in rapid succession, on the one hand urging the election of Jackson and on the other recommending the re-election of Adams.

The campaign soon developed into a contest between the old party leaders who had managed affairs, chosen the candidates and held the offices, and a newer, more uncouth, but more vigorous element that had been developed with the growing country.

The name Republican was still retained by all, but with qualifying adjectives. The supporters of Adams called themselves National Republicans, while many of those of Jackson, probably having never heard of the obnoxious societies thirty or forty years before, took the name "Democratic-Republican." There were, however, no national conventions, no platforms of principles, no declarations of policy. The contest, like that of 1824, was personal, and the more common designations were "Adams men," or "Jackson men." The Jackson men won by an electoral vote of 178 to 83, and Calhoun was elected Vice-President on the same ticket. Indiana had cast her vote for Jackson and Calhoun.

Verification of the statement that political alignments during that period were more personal than partisan is found in the fact that Indiana gave a majority for Jackson in three successive presidential elections. In 1824 the popular vote of Indiana was 7,343 for Jackson, 5,315 for Clay, 3,095 for Adams. In 1828 the vote was recorded 22,237 for Jackson, 17,652 for Adams. In 1832 Jackson had 31,552 and Clay 15,472. When, four years later, in 1836, the contest was between Jackson's favorite, Martin Van Buren, and William Henry Harrison, the latter carried the State quite decisively—41,281 for Harrison and 32,480 for Van Buren. The same candidates were pitted against one another in 1840, and Harrison's majority over his competitor was greater than in the preceding election, the vote being 65,362 for Harrison and 51,695 for Van Buren. The fact that General Harrison had been Territorial Governor of Indiana prior to its admission into the Union doubtless had much to do with this partiality for the military candidate. The fact that Van Buren was "Jackson's man" in both of these elections did not have sufficient weight with the voting element to secure for him a majority of the State's electorate. In 1824 Jackson carried the State by a plurality of only 1,928, while four years later his majority over Adams was 4,585. In 1832 Jackson beat Clay by more than two to one—to be exact, by a majority of 16,080. The increase of the vote at each succeeding presidential election bears eloquent testimony to the remarkable growth of population of the State.

The election of Jackson was partly the result and partly the cause of a thorough revolution in the politics of the country. It was the culmination of a change in political conditions that had been going on since the foundation of the government, but more especially since 1810, when the younger element took control of Madison's administration. In the older States suffrage had originally been limited to property qualifications. In the new States it was granted to every white male of twenty-one. In earlier years presidential electors were chosen by the State Legislatures, but the broadening of the suffrage had led to a demand that the electors be chosen directly by the people; so that in 1828 they were so elected in all the States but one, and that one, South Carolina. In the earlier years, candidates were named by persons already holding office, or by cliques of self-constituted leaders, but Jackson's nomination had been started in mass meetings. In the earlier years office holding had been confined to the cultured, aristocratic class, and though the term was not employed there was virtually a merit or civil service system of terms of office. Jackson's followers openly demanded a share in the offices, and many of the more active came on to Washington to secure them. New men had also been elected to Congress and the various State offices, and they were present everywhere, to the horror and disgust of the old party leaders, who spoke derisively of the "triumphant reign of king mob" and the "millennium of the minnows"—small-fry. To such there seemed a fearful chasm between the life of 1820 and that of 1829. As one disgusted "patriot" expressed it, "Political affairs had fallen into the hands of John Holmes, Felix Grundy and the devil." There was a general change of federal office holders all over the country. The test was not of party faith or allegiance, for all were Republicans. No Federalist had held an office for a dozen years. The shibboleth for the incumbent applied alike to the country postmaster and the highest federal appointee, was: "Is he a Jackson man?" If "Yes," he stayed; if "No," he left or was removed. The principle, "To the victors belong the spoils," which Jackson proclaimed and vigorously applied, has no doubt been grievously misused to the great detriment of the country, but it wrought a benefit at the time by bringing the government into closer sympathy with the mass of the people.

The truth is that in 1829 the people first assumed control of the governmental machinery, which up to that time had been held in a sort of trust for them by political leaders; and the administration which then came into power was the first in our history which represented the people without restriction and which, therefore, presented not only the virtues but the faults of the people. Hence, in every essential this administration was Democratic—the people ruling.

This was the origin of the great Democratic party of the nation. It sprang, indeed, as did the Whig party a little later, from the old Republican party of Jefferson, and for a time bore the hyphenated name, "Democratic-Republican."

The formal assumption of the single name, "Democrat," did not, however, take place for several years—not, indeed, until most of the old Jeffersonian Republicans had retired from active political life. In the campaign of 1832 the Democratic-Republicans supported Jackson, and the National Republicans Henry Clay. An Anti-Masonic party was also in the field, with William Wirt of Maryland as its candidate. Jackson received 219 electoral votes; Clay, 49; Wirt, 7, and South Carolina cast 11 for John Floyd of Virginia, who had not been a candidate. Wirt got his 7 votes from Vermont.

In 1836 the Democratic-Republicans nominated Martin Van Buren, who had been Vice-President during Jackson's second term. The Anti-Masons and part of the Whigs named William Henry Harrison; another portion of the Whigs nominated Daniel Webster, and Judge Hugh L. White of Tennessee was put forward as an anti-Jackson Democratic-Republican. The opposition to Van Buren consolidated on one candidate in each State. The result was 170 for Van Buren, 113 for the other three, and South Carolina again casting her 11 votes for a man who had not been a candidate, William P. Mangrunt of North Carolina. Indiana, unmindful of the fact that Van Buren was Jackson's choice, voted for William Henry Harrison.

By 1840 the opposition to the Democratic-Republicans had been consolidated into the Whig party. The former renominated Van Buren, and the latter again named Harrison.

For popular enthusiasm the campaign resembled that of 1828, only this time the enthusiasm was for the Whigs. Harrison had 234 and Van Buren 60 electoral votes, the former carrying every Northern State except Illinois and New Hampshire—Indiana thus going with the Whigs.

The National Convention of 1844 made the first formal use of the name "Democrat" for the party really formed by Jackson sixteen years before, and that name has ever since been retained. It popularly, and very properly, reverts back to Jackson's administration. Samuel J. Tilden, moreover, continued the use of the name Democratic-Republican so long as he was chairman of his party's State committee prior to his election as Governor of New York in 1874. In the following pages the Democratic party of Indiana will be treated as dating from 1828, though as a matter of fact Jefferson will ever be cherished as the founder and exponent of American Democracy. Although it has sometimes severely suffered from the folly or selfishness of leaders it had trusted, and although it has changed the details of its policy to meet changing conditions in the country's development, it has ever remained fundamentally true to Jefferson's liberal teachings and Jackson's unfaltering confidence in the common people.

History has been termed collated biography. As this introductory chapter has told of the political actors and their deeds in leading up to the formation of the National Democratic party, so the history of Indiana's Democracy will be prefaced by a sketch of the activities of the political leaders during the twelve years that Indiana did her part in the old Jeffersonian Republican Party.

INDIANA'S PIONEERS

THEIR STRUGGLES, TRIALS AND TRIBULATIONS—PRIVATIONS BRAVELY ENDURED—BUT SUCCESS EVENTUALLY CROWNS THEIR HEROIC EFFORTS

THE work of the pioneers was the work of conquest. It was a struggle with matter whose subservience to mind was to bring life into solitude and make homes for future thousands. It was a hand-to-hand conflict with nature, who, with her tempting hoards just beyond reach, has set men on the long and perilous road toward perfection. Their mission was peaceful and constructive, their immediate goal a mere existence. Moved by visions of ultimate victory, they cheerfully made every sacrifice and dedicated their lives to the long and doubtful struggle. Making roads, draining swamps and clearing land for agricultural purposes made the years one long stretch of hardship and toil. The seasons brought no respite, but added, each in turn, to the difficulties yet to overcome. The conquest of the soil, the disarming of unseen hostile forces were for them gigantic enterprises against which their meager equipment could but slowly avail. Meadow and swamp were infested with venomous snakes and poisonous insects. Malaria and insidious fevers undermined the health of the strongest. Physical suffering and unrelieved pain aroused terrors in the most confident and the bravest. For every inch of ground the wilderness exacted its toll of human energy and life. Through pain and suffering, childhood, youth and maturity learned stern lessons and the irrevocable laws of nature.

An accurate delineation of the perseverance and the determination of the pioneers and their faith in final success would reveal a heroism as great as was ever displayed on the battlefield. Forest, swamp and unbroken prairie led them to conflicts as fierce as any knight ever waged in support of his honor and his prowess. Practically exiled from all known civilization, they worked unselfishly for the development of territory that only future generations could enjoy. Money, as a medium of exchange, was almost unknown. The products of the field and dairy went begging for a market. The housewife was forced to spin and weave in order to provide clothing for her family. The forced existence in a narrow sphere with its limited activities was not without its advantages. While it exacted the most strenuous physical toil, it sharpened the wits and challenged the intellect to keener action. Close contact with nature and the stress of spiritual conflicts developed character and heart as easier conditions could never have done. Mutual helpfulness and unselfishness relieved the rigors of privation and softened the grief of sickness and death. Never in the history of mankind has ideal communism become so nearly a reality: a man's word was his bond; a verbal compact stood above the medium of legal execution. Piety was a common virtue and the love of God the lever of morality.

A fine sense of citizenship and civic duty grew out of the individual's attitude toward work. Every blow of the ax involuntarily set echoes ringing in strong and loyal hearts. The love of country grew with the consciousness of every hard-won possession. Every struggle with matter proclaimed an inner growth that meant new life and new responsibilities. The pioneers grew in numbers, in strength and in comprehension. From actual experience they learned the rules of incipient statehood. They anticipated the needs of future society and produced men as strong and capable as the world has ever seen. Community interests resolutely met tested them as social, economic and moral forces. Time has proven their loyalty as citizens and established their record as heroes and benefactors of mankind.

Need any one wonder that these people, undergoing hardships incomprehensible to the present generation, became strongly attached to one another and refused to permit differences of opinion as to what was then termed "politics" to disturb their peaceful relations?

LIFE IN THE LOG CABIN.

The simple life of the Indiana pioneers was many years ago happily described in an enterprising newspaper published in the southeastern part of the State. "There were no churches in those days," wrote the author. "The meetings were held at private homes. The people then did not go to church to display their finery. The men at these private home meetings wore jeans, while the women wore flannel. A calico dress was a rarity indeed. The preachers were muscular Christians, who pointed men to salvation through love of their race rather than because they received a good salary for doing so. Their salaries were but $50 to $75, and on these meager sums they endured great hardships with Christian fortitude. Often they sacrificed their lives in their work. In those days the Indian squaws took a deep interest in the household affairs of the whites and they made the lives of the housewives miserable by begging for cucumbers. The houses of the first settlers were log cabins, with generally but one room. The man who could live in a hewed log house was considered an aristocrat.

These rough homes boasted of but few window lights and greased paper was used instead of glass."

SIMPLICITY NOT THEIR ONLY VIRTUE.

Many characterizations of the early settlers have been penned and printed. Glorifying tributes are the rule; carping criticisms the exception. Among those who have enjoyed excellent opportunities to institute comparisons there is substantial agreement that as a portrayal of pioneer life in Indiana this picture, drawn by David Turpie, stands unrivalled and unexcelled:

"What may be called the modern history of our State began on the day when General Clark set out from the falls of the Ohio upon his famous expedition against Vincennes. That expedition and its fortunate result first revealed to the people of Virginia and the Atlantic States the resources of the immense region, well-watered, fertile and arable, that lay in the territory of the Northwest. The country was not known before, but it was unnoticed. The exodus, long continued, which followed this revelation, attested its value and reality. The migration to Indiana during the closing years of the eighteenth and the beginning of the next century, in some respects has had few parallels in the world's history. It was not like that of the ancient Phenicians to Carthage and northern Africa, or that of the Greeks to the shores of the Euxine, or of the Romans to Spain and Britain—still less did it resemble that of the English to the tidewater regions of Massachusetts, Virginia and the Carolinas.

"All these colonists in their removal still retained and enjoyed the means of communication and commercial intercourse with the kindred and countrymen whom they had left behind them. But the immigrants to the country now called Indiana, in that early period spoken of, having passed the last military outpost on their way and gone thence into the depths of the wilderness, were as wholly severed from the world as Columbus when he sailed upon his first voyage into the unknown waters of the Western ocean. They were in a condition of extreme, almost total, isolation. They made their home in the midst of a vast forest, for the most part unexplored and uninhabited save by roving bands of Indians, equipped with weapons far more deadly than those of the chiefs and warriors who, more than a hundred years before, had attempted with their clubs, bows and arrows, to exterminate the white settlements in the valleys of the Potomac and Connecticut. Whether the pioneer settler reaped, plowed or planted, his rifle must be within reach. Solitude seldom broken, danger always imminent, shadowed his daily life and labor.

"Plutarch observes that those who found prosperous States and communities are more worthy of praise and commendation than any other benefactors of the human race. Yet it has been somewhat the fashion, both in writing and conversation, to decry the pioneers and early settlers of our State as being generally coarse, ignorant, lawless and violent. The founders of Indiana were, for the most part, immigrants from the thirteen original States, and they came hither in nearly equal proportion from the North and South. They were the best element of that hardy population which inhabited the long line of the old Colonial frontier extending from Maine to Georgia. Some of them were men of intellectual attainments and of classic education, everywhere welcomed and recognized as leaders in the new community. The much greater number were actuated by one dominant purpose, one salient ambition; this was to make for themselves and for their household larger and better homes. These pioneers in emigration, leaving their former domiciles, did not leave behind them their respect for law and order, their reverence for religion, or their love of civil and political liberty. All these they carried with them upon their journey. The early legislation and the first constitution of our State show in every line and sentence of the venerable text how thoroughly they were imbued with those principles.

"These predecessors in our goodly heritage had the courage to leave a land of comparative comfort and security; fortitude to endure the hardships and dangers incident to such departure, self-reliance constant and unwavering, a fixity of purpose and integrity of life, which upheld their hands and hopes in what they had undertaken. They were a thoughtful people, slow to anger, quick neither to take nor to give offense, but prompt to resent insult or injury when offered. They were diligent in their work—but took their time in doing it; they depended more than we do upon the morrow for its completion, but they did complete it. They were very frank in conversation, kindly in social intercourse. Their manner of speech was plain, direct—to use their own phrase, home-spoken, but without coarseness or duplicity.

"Many of these patriarchs had unique personal histories and gifts of description and narration quite remarkable; and if their stories were long, they were eagerly listened to, on account of the manifest good faith and verity of the narrator. They were a very religious community, yet without the least trace of superstition. Possessed of lively imaginative powers, they might have peopled the wide expanse of wood and waters around them with elves and fairies, nymphs and naiads; but they looked in the woods only for game or Indians, and saw only what they looked for.

"Nevertheless, they walked not by sight alone. They cherished a faith sincere and simple, unobscured by the mirage of the higher criticism. Nearly all of them belonged to some church communion; there was much difference of opinion on these subjects, but this caused no breach of brotherly kindness or of neighborly good will and courtesy. The creed and form of worship were as free as thought itself. Not a few of these men in the vanguard of civilization were very illiterate, being able neither to read nor write; yet they were not uneducated. They had learned some of the lessons of life and knew them better than the savants of Oxford or Cambridge, or the Pilgrim Fathers, with all their erudition. They had in a very free way wrought out their destiny in the wilderness. Mental, moral, political independence was their birth-right.

"Our forefathers dwelling under the sky of the West were a chosen people who, without the visible guidance of the cloud or pillar, made a Christian solution of the problem that for ages had embroiled their ancestors in bloodiest warfare. Even in the infancy of this commonwealth or in the days of its youth and inexperience, there was no religious test either for office or the franchise. No Baptist was banished, no Quaker was scourged or held in durance, but every one worshiped God according to the dictates of his own conscience. If any man forbore either to believe or worship, he incurred thereby no statutory pains or penalties. The founders of our State passed beyond the line of mere religious toleration; they eliminated from their form of policy both persecution and its victim, and provided that martyrdom should be a thing impossible. They relied upon the utmost freedom of speech and opinion as the best safeguard of truth and the surest correction of error. They gave no credence to the doctrine that the growth of religious sentiment should be accompanied by some sort of proscription of dissent, or that as faith waxed stronger, charity should cease or fail. Greater was the charity of our fathers, even as their faith more abounded.

"The ancient provisions of the ordinance of 1787, touching common school education and involuntary servitude, although for a long period the subjects of active controversy, were faithfully adhered to and loyally maintained.

"In the beginning of our social and civil organization those who attended meetings of any kind always went armed. An aged judge, speaking of this, told me that in his youth the courtroom during term bore the appearance of a military post; witnesses, parties, jurymen and bystanders brought with them their guns and accoutrements. I have seen, several times, on the walls of old meeting houses, remnants of the wooden hooks, upon which, during the hours of worship, the rifles of those present were hung, loaded and primed, ready for instant use. These precautions were taken against attack by the Indians, which was often sudden and unexpected. Still, a habit so constantly in use must have had a marked effect upon the manners of the people. It largely conduced to the observance of the true civilities of life, to mutual respect and deference, whether in public or private intercourse.

"Among brave men thus equipped, who met together for any purpose, there was a savor of knightly bearing shown in the considerate regard paid to the feelings and wishes, even to the prejudices and prepossessions, of their comrades and associates. Utterances of indiscretion and violence, in this armed presence were quietly suppressed; the cost of the feud was counted, its consequences were weighed and measured, restrained and averted.

"The native chivalry of the frontiersman, though it may have been unpolished and uncouth, had yet a real origin and meaning. Its influence was felt perceptibly long after the custom of bearing arms, once so general, had become obsolete.

"In that primitive age there was an innate honest simplicity of manners, as of thought and action. Fraud, wrongdoing and injustice were denounced as they are at present; they were also discredited, dishonored, and branded with an ostracism more severe than that of Athens. Wealth acquired by such means could not evade, and was unable to conceal, the stigma that attached to the hidden things of dishonesty.

"The moral atmosphere of the time was clear and bracing; it repelled specious pretensions, resisted iniquity and steadily rejected the evil which calls itself good. Moreover, there never has been a people who wrought into the spirit of their public enactments the virtues of their private character more completely than the early settlers of Indiana. We have grown up in the shadow of their achievements; these need not be forgotten in the splendor of our own."

PARTY RELATIONSHIP IRONICALLY DEFINED.

As already indicated, party relationship was in the "good old days" subject to sudden and frequent changes. In the absence of clearly defined appellations, men who "dabbled in politics" were designated as Adams men, Jacksonites, Harrisonites, Smithites or Jonesites—dependent on who was up for assignment to public position. So confusing had become the party labels temporarily and shiftingly applied that a critical contributor to one of the more prominent newspapers of that period let himself loose in this fashion:

"I have been pestered of late by many new and uncommon phrases and some old words with new meanings to them, which many of the candidates have lugged into their handbills and public speeches; such as 'Jackson Republican,' 'Whole-Hog Jackson man,' 'Republican of the Jefferson School,' 'Patriot,' 'Hero,' 'Statesman,' 'Tried Republican,' 'Federalist.' I have taken great pains to find out the meaning of these words and phrases and I believe I have at last nearly mastered the subject. The following is the vocabulary of the words in their present acceptation:

Jackson Republican: An old Federalist who supports Gen. Jackson for the office which he has gotten or hopes to get.

Whole-Hog Jackson Man: A fiery tempered person who has no opinion of his own, but votes, praises, censures and turns just as he is bidden by his county caucus.

Republican of Jefferson School: A man who always joins the strong party and swears he never changes.

Patriot: A man who can live by his own trade, but wants the public to support him.

Hero: Anybody who has fought a duel.

Statesman: A man who knows how many States there are in the Union and can tell their names.

Federalist: Everybody who is against my election.

The Party: Five or six office hunters in each county who teach the sovereigns how they ought to vote.

The Good Cause: My cause. My plan of getting into office.

"But the phrase which perplexed me is 'Tried Republican.' When I hear a man say he means to vote for a 'tried Republican' I am astonished and disposed to ask him what he will have him tried for—treason, felony or breach of the peace?

"When the new-fangled doctrine of nullification shall be attempted to be put into practice we shall no doubt see many 'tried Republicans' and not a few of them condemned and executed."

FOUNDATION FOR MORALITY RECEIVES EARLY ATTENTION.

As far back as 1799 the General Assembly of the Northwest Territory met at Cincinnati in the month of September and was addressed by Governor St. Clair. He called attention to the necessity of making provision for and the regulation of the lives and morals of the present and rising generation in the territory and the necessity of providing for the repression of vice and immorality throughout the big stretch of country. He declared that steps should be immediately taken for the protection of virtue and innocence, "for," said he, "the security of property and the punishment of crime is a sublime employment. Every aid in my power," he continued, "will be afforded, and I hope we shall bear in mind that the character and deportment of the people and their happiness here and hereafter depend very much upon the spirit and genius of their laws." Among the laws enacted as the result of this appeal was an act to stop Sabbath-breaking, another to stop profane swearing, dueling, cock fighting, running horses on the public highways and gambling at billiards, cards, dice, shovelboard, etc. The whipping post and the pillory were established.

INDIANA'S ADMISSION INTO THE UNION

(December 11, 1816)

THERE WERE THEN BUT THIRTEEN ORGANIZED COUNTIES IN THE TERRITORY, WITH A TOTAL POPULATION OF 63,897

HEARING on this subject, volumes have been written and printed, with elaborate details of incidents illustrative of the trials and tribulations of the early settlers. All of these writings and narratives are exceedingly interesting and instructive. In epitomized form the story has, in the judgment of the writer, never been more comprehensively told than was done by Senator Daniel W. Voorhees in a notable address delivered by him on the Fourth of July, 1883. The readers of this volume will be delighted with the illuminating manner in which that famous orator narrated the circumstances and conditions under which Indiana was admitted into the Union in the year 1816:

"It was on the fourth of July in the year 1800 when 'The Indiana Territory' was organized under Congressional enactment, embracing 'all that part of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio river which lies to the westward of a line beginning at the Ohio, opposite to the mouth of the Kentucky river, and running thence to Fort Recovery, and thence north until it shall intersect the territorial line between the United States and Canada.' The region thus defined by boundaries comprised all of the States of Indiana and Illinois, and the larger portion of the State of Michigan, and yet within all this vast domain the civilized population was estimated at but 4,875, less than the basis of 1,000 voters. It was the organization of a giant wilderness through whose mighty depths stalked the painted and plumed barbarian in the haughty supremacy of his power. Here and there a feeble and scant ray of civilization had penetrated this widespread abode of savage life. Like a small lamp in a great darkness, the settlement at Vincennes had been throwing its feeble but steady and serene light on the surrounding night for nearly a hundred years. According to reliable history, civilized man first took up his abode at the old post in 1710, sixty-five years before the first guns of the Revolution were fired, and ninety years before the Indiana Territory was created by act of Congress. But there had been no growth or expansion at the post, as the meager population of the entire territory in 1800 amply proves. It had been as stationary as its name implied. In 1805 the Territory of Michigan was organized and separated from the Indiana Territory, and finally, by act of Congress, February 3, 1809, the Indiana Territory was again divided by setting off all that part lying west of the Wabash River and a direct line drawn from the said Wabash River and Post Vincennes due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, to be known as the Territory of Illinois. In 1808, a year prior to this final division, we find an enumeration of the white population of the Indiana Territory, there being about nineteen thousand inhabitants in that portion which is now the State of Indiana, and about eleven thousand in that portion now the State of Illinois.

"The early stages of progress in the Northwest were not swift nor easy; they were slow and painful and the life of the pioneer was full of toil, privation and peril. Emigration from the old States was reluctant to seek new fields of enterprise, envired as they were by every danger which fact or fancy could present to the mind. Settlers came in slowly and tediously over roads of their own construction. When Indiana was admitted as a State into the Union, after sixteen years of important territorial government, after the battles of Fort Harrison and Tippecanoe had been fought, after the battle of New Orleans, and the treaty of peace with Great Britain at the close of the war of 1812, with the Indian titles nearly all extinguished, and the Mississippi River and all its tributaries opened to the unmolested trade and commerce of the American people, she yet showed by a census then taken a population of only 63,897. There were but thirteen organized counties, and Knox headed the list with 8,068 inhabitants. Then came Franklin, Washington, Clark, Harrison, Wayne, Gibson, Dearborn, Jefferson, Switzerland, Perry, Posey and Warrick in the order I have named them.

"And what a small, tame affair the first gubernatorial election appears to us as we look at it from this distance and compare it with some other Indiana elections which we have known! At a general election held on the first Monday in August, 1816, for Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Representative in Congress, members of the General Assembly and the various county officers, calling out a full vote, Jonathan Jennings received 5,211 votes and was elected Governor over Thomas Posey, who received 3,934 votes. With less than 10,000 voters to persuade, and only thirteen county seats to visit, I am inclined to think that some of my friends in both parties would rather have had such a race for Governor than the one they are likely to be engaged in twelve months hence.

"In the convention which framed the first constitution of Indiana there were forty-three members, and it is both curious and pleasant to find so many names in that body which have remained familiar to the people of Indiana at every stage of her subsequent history. Jonathan Jennings was its president and William Hendricks its secretary; each of whom soon afterward served the infant State as Governor and as Senator in Congress. James Noble was also there, and Enoch McCarty, Robert Hanna, John DePauw, John Badaliet, Samuel Milroy, Joseph Holman, David H. Maxwell and others, whose honored names adorn the annals of the State. A careful and competent historian of that period has spoken as follows of those who first here laid the foundations of a great and powerful commonwealth:

The convention that formed the first constitution of Indiana was composed mainly of clear-minded, unpretending men of common sense, whose patriotism was unquestionable and whose morals were fair. Their familiarity with the theories of the Declaration of American Independence; their territorial experience under the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, and their knowledge of the principles of the constitution of the United States were sufficient, when combined, to lighten materially their labors in the great work of forming a constitution for a new State. . . . In the clearness and conciseness of its style, in the comprehensive and just provisions which it made for the maintenance of civil and religious liberty, in its mandates, which were designed to protect the rights of the people, collectively and individually, and to provide for the public welfare, the constitution that was formed for Indiana in 1816 was not inferior to any of the State constitutions which were in existence at that time.

"And with this constitution for the guidance and welfare of her people, Indiana was admitted into the full fellowship of the Union December 11, 1816, and under these bright auspices began her unparalleled career as a State.

"There was but little reading matter in the pioneer settlements. The first newspaper in all that vast region now comprising Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, was the Western Sun, at Vincennes, published by Elihu Stout. In its columns the young and the old of that day eagerly scanned the sayings and doings of those who were entrusted with public affairs. No other people are so deeply interested in good government as those who are not yet strong, rich and self-reliant. In consequence of this fact the inhabitants of the frontiers at every stage of American history have been vigilant observers of their public servants."

THE FIRST STATE GOVERNMENT.

It is quite evident from the data at hand that with the growth of population in Indiana during the sixteen years preceding its admission into the Union came a class of men eminently fitted to manage the affairs of the infant commonwealth and worthily to represent it in the halls of Congress.

Excellent judgment appears to have been exercised by the electorate to choose men of high character and eminent ability to serve the State both at home and at Washington. Thus, a good beginning was made in the ministrations of public affairs.

As intelligently and comprehensively narrated by the painstaking State historian, William Henry Smith, "an election was ordered for choosing delegates to frame and promulgate a constitution, and for the election of a Governor." The two opposing candidates for Governor were Thomas Posey and Jonathan Jennings, then a delegate in Congress. The election was held on the first Monday of August, and Mr. Jennings was elected Governor, Christopher Harrison Lieutenant-Governor, and William Hendricks member of Congress.

The vote for Governor in 1816 stood:

FOR GOVERNOR.

|-------------------------|-------|
| Jonathan Jennings | 5,211 |
| Thomas Posey | 3,934 |
| Total | 9,145 |

FOR LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

|----------------------------|-------|
| Christopher Harrison | 6,570 |
| John Vawter | 847 |
| Abel Finley | 18 |
| John Johnson | 14 |
| Davis Floyd | 13 |
| Amos Lane | 12 |
| Total | 7,474 |

Although the State was not finally admitted into the Union until December 11, the first Legislature elected under the new constitution began its session on the 7th of November, when Jonathan Jennings took the oath of office as Governor. By the terms of the constitution Governors were elected for a term of three years, and the other State officers, with the exception of Lieutenant-Governor, were chosen by the Legislature.

Governor Jennings, in his opening message to the General Assembly, said:

"The result of your deliberations will be considered as indicative of the future character of the State, as well as of the future happiness of its citizens. The reputation of the State, as well as its highest interest, will require that a just and generous policy toward the general movement, and a due regard to the rights of its members respectively, should invariably have their proper influence. In the commencement of the State government the shackles of the colonial should not be forgotten in our limited exertions to prove, by happy experience, that a uniform adherence to the first principles of our government, and a virtuous exercise of its powers, will best secure efficiency to its measures and stability to its character. Without a frequent recurrence to those principles, the administration of the government will imperceptibly become more and more arduous, until the simplicity of our republican institutions may eventually be lost in dangerous expedients and political designs. Under every free government the happiness of the citizens must be identified with their morals; and while a constitutional exercise of their rights shall continue to have its due weight in the discharge of the duties required of the constitutional authorities of the State, too much attention cannot be bestowed to the encouragement and promotion of every moral virtue, and to the enactment of laws calculated to restrain the vicious and prescribe punishment for every crime commensurate to its enormity. In measuring, however, to each crime its adequate punishment it will be well to recollect that the certainty of punishment has generally the surest effect to prevent crime; while punishments unnecessarily severe too often produce the acquittal of the guilty, and disappoint one of the great objects of legislation and good government. . . . The dissemination of useful knowledge will be indispensably necessary as a support of morals, and as a restraint of vice; and on this subject it will only be necessary to direct your attention to the plan of education as prescribed by the constitution."

Mr. Jennings served as Governor for six years, and during his administration the Legislature mainly directed its efforts to putting on the full habiliments of Statehood. Among its first duties was that of filling the other State offices and electing two members of the United States Senate. Robert A. New was elected Secretary of State, W. H. Lilly, Auditor, and Daniel C. Lane, Treasurer. James Noble and Waller Taylor were chosen Senators. The laws were codified and made applicable to the State government. A number of laws were passed on various subjects; courts were established and their jurisdiction defined, and the Bank of Vincennes was adopted as a State bank and was authorized to establish a number of branches. Commissioners were also appointed to select a site for the permanent capital of the State. The slavery question continued to give considerable concern. Notwithstanding involuntary servitude had been forbidden by the ordinance of 1787, and again by the State constitution, slaves were openly held, and efforts were continued to introduce slavery under the disguise of apprentices. In his first message to the Legislature, Governor Jennings thus referred to the subject:

"I recommend to your consideration the propriety of providing by law, to prevent more effectually any unlawful attempts to seize and carry into bondage persons of color, legally entitled to their freedom; and, at the same time, as far as practicable, to prevent those who rightfully owe service to the citizens of any other State or territory from seeking within the limits of this State a refuge from the possession of their lawful owners. Such a measure will tend to secure those who are free from any unlawful attempts (to enslave them) and secure the rights of the citizens of the other States and territories as far as ought reasonably be respected."

In a speech delivered by Governor Jennings in the month of August, 1817, attention was directed to the need of greater educational facilities in the State, the necessity for a revision of the statutes, the need for the organization of the judiciary and of a law to prevent the carrying into bondage of persons of color residing in the State and legally entitled to their freedom. He also urged the necessity of raising the State's revenue to a sufficient amount to meet the expenses of the year and to pay the debt consequent upon holding the constitutional convention of the previous year.

In increasing the State's revenue the Governor met with many difficulties. The objects of taxation were not numerous and the great scarcity of money in the State made it difficult for the collector to realize on the demands of the State upon the property that was assessed. In the next year the problem had become so acute that Governor Jennings said that in order to enforce the payments of the revenue of the State on the part of those charged with the collections he recommended that all suits connected therewith be instituted in the Harrison Circuit Court and that the appointment of an Attorney-General be authorized by law whose duty it should be to prosecute such cases.

The second State election, in 1819, shows this result:

FOR GOVERNOR.

The question of internal improvements also occupied the attention of the Legislature during the administration of Governor Jennings. The State was rapidly filling up with population, but the lack of means to transport the surplus products to market was delaying immigration. No roads had been built anywhere in the State, except a few that had only been cleared of the trees, and the settlements were still largely confined to the neighborhood of water courses. In August, 1822, before the expiration of his second term, Governor Jennings was elected to Congress from the Second district, and the unexpired portion of his term as Governor was filled by Lieutenant-Governor Ratliff Boon. Governor Jennings's resignation was dated September 12, 1822.

It is worthy of note that the first Congressman from the newly-admitted State of Indiana was William Hendricks, an older brother of the father of Thomas A. Hendricks, who in a later year (1860) became the chosen leader of the Indiana Democracy and remained such beyond cavil to the end of his life, the latter part of 1885. So satisfactorily did William Hendricks represent his constituency that he was twice re-elected to Congress, serving three terms in all. As a further evidence of appreciation Mr. Hendricks was elected Governor in 1822, but before completing his term he was again sent to Congress, this time as Senator. A second term as United States Senator was accorded him, thus extending his congressional service to eighteen years in all. Historically we are informed that "during his term as Governor the people were struggling under the load of business depression following 1820, and that but little of moment was done by the Legislature except advancing the cause of education."

SOME OF THE FIRST STATE LEGISLATURE'S DOINGS.

November 15, 1816, a resolution was introduced in the House that a committee be appointed for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of providing for the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. The committee was composed of Amos Lane, Dearborn county; John Dumont, Switzerland; Ratliff Boon, Warrick; Thomas Carr, Clark, and Edward Hogan, Gibson, to meet with a joint committee of the Senate.

In joint session the Senate and House elected as presidential electors: Jesse L. Holman, General Joseph Bartholomew, and Thomas H. Blake. They voted for Monroe.

The vote for United States Senator was: James Noble, 26; Waller Taylor, 20; James Scott, 16; Jesse L. Holman, 3; Ezra Ferris, 2; Davis Floyd, 2; Walter Wilson, 2; Elias McNamee, 1.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS CHOSEN BY LEGISLATURE.

In 1820 the Legislature in joint session elected as presidential electors: Daniel I. Caswell, John H. Thompson, and Nathaniel Ewing. The Vincennes Sun stated after these gentlemen had discharged their official duty: "It is said the electors voted for James Monroe for President and Daniel D. Tompkins for Vice-President."

CAUCUSING IN THE WILDERNESS.

The history of party organization in Indiana may be said to date from the first Jackson campaign of 1824, incited by the United States Bank issue, which had been raised by "Old Hickory." This extended back even to the Madison administration, for the Western Sun, published at Vincennes, reporting the legislative elections of August, 1820, says: "Election reports show that majorities had been given over the 'Banking, or Federal ticket.'"

The same publication furnished an insight into methods of candidate making, for a later issue makes this announcement: "A register has been opened at the grocery store of Mr. William Micure, where the friends of the different candidates may record their names under their respective favorites."

In the 1824 campaign originally David Robb, of Gibson county; Hiram Aldridge, of Shelby; Jonathan McCarty, of Fayette; John Milroy, of Lawrence, and John Carr, of Clark, were chosen as Jackson electors, but some dissatisfaction arose because certain ones would not withdraw, while others were held to be ineligible. In consequence of the state of feeling thus aroused, a call was issued for a convention to be held September 16 at the Court House in Salem "for the purpose of forming an electoral ticket in favor of Andrew Jackson for President of the United States."

Thirteen counties were represented at the convention by delegates who selected Samuel Milroy, of Washington county, as chairman, and Jacob Call, of Knox county, as secretary. A new electoral ticket was named, composed of David Robb, of Gibson county; Samuel Milroy, of Washington; Elias McNamee, of Knox county; Jonathan McCarty, of Fayette, and John Carr, of Clark.

Dr. J. T. Canby, of Madison; Samuel Beach, of Jeffersonville, and Jesse B. Derham, of Jackson county, were appointed "a general corresponding committee with full power, and whose duty was to fill any vacancies that might occur on the electoral ticket, and to take such measures as may be necessary to insure success."

The Henry Clay electoral ticket was composed of William W. Wick, of Marion county; Marson G. Clark, of Washington county; James Rariden, of Wayne county; Walter Wilson, of Gibson county, and Moses Tabbs, of Knox county.

The electors for John Quincy Adams were: Isaac Blackford, of Knox county; Jesse L. Holman, of Dearborn county; David H. Maxwell, of Monroe county; James Scott, of Clark county, and Christopher Harrison, of Washington county. (Jesse L. Holman was the father of William S. Holman, who served a longer period in Congress than any other Indianian, and who achieved a national reputation as the relentless objector to every extravagance in the expenditure of public moneys. Millions upon millions of dollars were thus, through his vigilance and steadfastness, saved the nation during his long and useful congressional service.)

TRIBUTE TO "OLD HICKORY."

The second and final convention called to appoint Jackson electors, Dr. J. T. Canby, of Madison, Samuel Beach of Jeffer-

sonville, and Jesse B. Derham of Jackson county, were appointed a general correspondence committee having full power, and whose duty was to fill any vacancies on the electoral ticket "and take such measures as may be necessary to insure its success."

Samuel Judah, Dr. Israel T. Canby, Henry S. Handy, of Jefferson; Samuel Carr, of Clark, and William Kelsey, of Lawrence, were named to prepare an address to the people of Indiana on the approaching election, same being published October 16, 1824, by the Western Sun and General Advertiser, of Vincennes, in part as follows:

"The history of Andrew Jackson presents every pledge deeds can give of his ability for all his country can require of him.

"His political principles undoubted, his integrity without a stain, and above suspicion; his greatness of intellect proved by the ever-successful result of all his enterprises, we confide in him and we deem him most worthy the Presidency of the nation.

"The history of philosophy, the legislation of Solon and genius of her sons have immortalized Athens. The time was when the spirit of Minerva inspired her councils. Neptune bowed his trident before her, and the commerce of the world poured the wealth of nations at her feet. But corruption sealed the destiny of the Athenians—Pericles had expended the spoils of the public treasury in bribing his fellow citizens—virtue had ceased to exist at Athens, etc.

"As Americans, as citizens of the West, as Republicans, and as men only actuated by a sincere love of our common country, of its love, prosperity and happiness, we most earnestly recommend to you, fellow citizens, to support the man of the people, Andrew Jackson."

At the presidential election in 1824 the people of Indiana, for the first time since her admission into the Union, were permitted to name the electors by popular vote. Prior thereto the electors were chosen by the Legislature. The electors named in 1816 were chosen before Indiana had been admitted into the Union. There was some objection to this procedure, but in the absence of serious opposition, Indiana's three votes were included in the count for Monroe.

JACKSON STATE CONVENTION IN 1828.

At this gathering, held on the 8th of January, Israel T. Canby presided. Benjamin V. Becker was named as vice-president, and Paris C. Dunning and William Marshall officiated as secretaries.

Jackson electors chosen were: Benjamin V. Becker, Knox; Jesse B. Derham, Jackson; Ross Smiley, Union; Ratliff Boon, Warrick; William Lowe, Monroe.

A committee was appointed to prepare an address to the people of Indiana in favor of Andrew Jackson. This committee was made to consist of Samuel Judah, Knox; Paris C. Dunning, Monroe; John Cain, Marion; Marcus Willitt, Rush; Thomas Fitzgerald, Warrick.

A general superintendence committee was named as follows: R. C. Newland, Eli W. Malott, John McMahan, Henry S. Handy, of Washington county; General John Carr, of Clark; William Hoggatt, Orange; William Marshall, Jackson; A. S. Burnett, Floyd; John Milroy, Lawrence; Nelson Lodge, Jefferson; Elihu Stout, Knox; William C. Keen, Switzerland; Thomas Posey, Harrison; Jacob B. Lowe, Monroe; David V. Culley, Dearborn.

FRIENDS OF ADAMS AND CLAY.

The supporters of the Adams administration held their convention January 12, 1828, and named for presidential electors General Joseph Orr, of Putnam county; John Watts, of Dearborn; General Joseph Bartholomew, Gibson; Rev. James Armstrong, Monroe. Mr. Armstrong subsequently declined, and General Amaziah Morgan was substituted. John Watts presided over the convention that named these electors. A protective tariff and internal improvements were presented as the main issues of the campaign. Opposition to Jackson was pronounced.

JACKSON STATE CONVENTION OF 1831.

For the 1832 campaign the Jacksonites met in State convention at the State House December 12, 1831. Benjamin V. Becker, of Knox county, presided. Arthur Patterson, of Parke, and David Robb served as vice-presidents, and Wm. J. Brown of Rush and Nathaniel Field of Clark officiated as secretaries. Thirty-nine counties were represented.

A committee consisting of Messrs. Morrison, Feeney, Culley, Reid and Davis reported a series of resolutions which were published in the Cass County Times of December 30, 1831. They dwell on the depressed condition of the country when President Jackson entered upon office and point with satisfaction to the improvement wrought by his administration; foreign treaties made by the Jackson administration come in for laudation.

Electors named were: George Boon, Sullivan county; James Blake, Marion; Arthur Patterson, Parke; Nathan B. Palmer, Jefferson, and Marks Crume, Fayette.

Contingent electors: Thomas Givens, Posey county; Alexander S. Burnet, Floyd; Walter Armstrong, Dearborn, and John Ketcham, Monroe.

Resolutions adopted were to this effect: "That we approve the measures of the present administration, and especially the late change in the cabinet, the payment of the national debt, the removal of the Indians, and the right system of economy and accountability effected and recommended by our present 'revered' President, Andrew Jackson."

Hon. John Tipton, Hon. Ratliff Boon, Hon. Jonathan McCarty, Hon. John Carr and Gen. Samuel Milroy were named delegates to the Baltimore convention.

Central Committee: A. F. Morrison, D. L. McFarland, Abraham W. Harrison, George L. Kinnard and Henry Brady, Marion county; Nathaniel Bolton, Jefferson; Jacob Shank, Shelby; John C. Julien, Hendricks; John P. Dunn and William Lanus, Dearborn; Enos Lowe, Putnam; Aaron Finch, Jefferson; Edward A. Hannegan, Fountain; John Spencer, John Irwin and Daniel Reid, Wayne; John C. Huckleberry, Clark; John W. Cox, Morgan; William P. Kiser, Bartholomew; John Wood, Rush; John Berry, Madison; Jeremiah Smith, Randolph; R. C. Newland, Washington; John Gardner, Vermillion.

Governor Ray seems to have experienced some difficulty in balancing himself politically. Ostensibly a Jacksonian, he considered it an affront to be asked to commit himself one way or another.

"THE FORLORN HOPE."

The opponents of Jackson styled themselves National Republicans. They held their State convention at Indianapolis, November 7, 1831. Nineteen counties were represented by thirty-one delegates. Twelve others were given seats. Charles Dewey, of Clark county, presided; Doufan Maguire, of Marion county, acted as secretary. The resolutions adopted start out with these declarations:

"The friends of the American system composing this convention warmly participate with their fellow citizens of Indiana and the adjacent States in the general desire to see the vital interests of domestic industry and internal improvements rescued from their present state of jeopardy, and fostered and maintained with unabated zeal. They are especially desirous to witness a correct, honorable and successful administration of the general government. The captivating promises of re-encouragement and reform in which the friends of General Jackson so copiously indulged previous to the last election have not been realized. The alleged abuses of the former administration have been copied and re-copied so often by the present, that, if their number and magnitude had not destroyed the resemblance, we should be led to imagine that the defects of the administration of Mr. Adams had been selected as the models for that of General Jackson."

The resolutions declared for a tariff of duties for the protection of American industry, for internal improvement, and endorsed Henry Clay for President.

Delegates to the Baltimore convention selected were: John I. Neely, Isaac Howk, and George H. Dunn.

The Indiana Democrat said this convention "numbered several who had lately been invited into retirement by the people," mentioning Messrs. Test, Oliver H. Smith, John H. Thompson, Isaac Howk, Law and W. W. Wick. The paper called it "A Forlorn Hope."

THE VAN BUREN CAMPAIGN OF 1836

A preliminary meeting was held at Brookville, Franklin county, March 14, 1834, to pave the way for nominating a successor to President Jackson. Dr. John Bradburn presided and Ben Sed Noble acted as secretary. Col. C. W. Hutchens, Jonathan Eads and Dr. George Berry were the committee on resolutions which reported an endorsement of Martin Van Buren for President and Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky for Vice-President. No further action was taken at this gathering, but a convention was called to be held at Indianapolis, December 9, 1834, at which General Samuel Milroy presided. Robert McIntyre of Fountain county and David V. Culley of Dearborn county were named as vice-presidents, and William B. White of Fountain county and A. F. Morrison of Marion officiated as secretaries.

Three delegates to the national convention which was subsequently called to be held at Baltimore, May 20, 1835, were named from each of the seven districts, as follows:

First—John B. Moyer, Orange county; Joseph Lane, Vanderburg; John Pitcher, Gibson.

Second—Lewis H. Sands, Putnam; Ralph Wilson, Vigo; Hiram Decker, Knox.

Third—Dr. Jesse Jackson, Scott; General William Marshall, and Isaac Stewart.

Fourth—Andrew Davidson, Decatur; John P. Dunn, Dearborn; William J. Brown, Rush.

Fifth—Daniel Reid, Wayne; John Spencer, Allen; John D. Vaughan, Wayne.

Sixth—Alexander F. Morrison, John Cain and Livingston Dunlap, Marion.

Seventh—General Samuel Milroy, Carroll; T. A. Howard, Parke; Thomas B. Brown, Tippecanoe. 1068042

VAN BUREN'S NOMINATION RATIFIED BY INDIANA DEMOCRACY.

An enthusiastic ratification convention was held at Indianapolis, January 8, 1836. The convention was called to order by George Boon, of Sullivan county. General Samuel Milroy, of Carroll county, was made temporary chairman, and Thomas B. Brown of Tippecanoe and Jesse Jackson of Scott, secretaries. The permanent organization was officered by the following named gentlemen:

President: Nathan B. Palmer, Marion county.

Vice-Presidents: William Casey, Posey; George Boon, Sullivan; John Prather, Clark; Thomas Howard, Dearborn; Ross Smiley, Fayette; Elihu Stout, Knox; William White, Vermillion.

Secretaries: Thomas B. Brown, Tippecanoe; Jesse Jackson, Scott; William C. Foster, Monroe; James W. Borden, Wayne.

Upon taking the chair Mr. Palmer said:

"We have convened on the present occasion as the representatives of the people, clothed with the important trust of selecting an electoral ticket from our Democratic brethren, pledged to vote for the Hon. Martin Van Buren, of New York, for President of the United States, and for Col. Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, for Vice-President.

"These distinguished gentlemen stand pledged as the disciples of Jefferson and Jackson, to carry out and to preserve in their purity those great republican principles, which, from the earliest period of our government, it has been the great object of the Democratic party to sustain."

In closing, Mr. Palmer said:

"Nor should we be regardless of the importance of union and harmony in our ranks. . . . A spirit that asks not the aid nor interference of Congress to make for the people a president. Yea, more, a spirit of indignation of the demoralizing tendency of that open and avowed object of so multiplying candidates for the Presidency, that the people may be induced, through local interests and local influences, to so cast their votes as to cheat themselves out of the choice of the chief magistrate of this Union. But I pursue this subject no farther. The outrage contemplated in this attempt is too palpable to escape the notice of any intelligent citizens."

There were reasons for sounding this note of warning. Insidious efforts were made in various parts of the Union to bring out candidates for the presidency, with a view to complicating affairs and causing strife and contention among those who had steadfastly upheld the administration of President Jackson. Judge McLean was formally brought out for the presidency by a caucus of the Ohio Legislature. Thomas H. Benton was put in nomination at a meeting in Alabama. John Forsyth, the distinguished editor of the Mobile Register, was put in nomination by the Georgia Legislature.

The Western Sun published a letter January 24, 1835, from Thomas H. Benton, in which he declined to stand as a candidate for the vice-presidency on the nomination given him by the Mississippi State convention. He lauds Van Buren and declares harmony is necessary in order to preserve the party, and states his belief that schemes are afoot to disorganize the party by bringing out numerous candidates. The letter was issued in answer to one sent him by a committee composed of Robert T. Lytle, Ohio; Henry Hubbard, New Hampshire; Ratliff Boon, Indiana, and H. A. Muhlenberg, Pennsylvania, these gentlemen urging reconsideration of his announced declaration.

The committee on resolutions consisted of James Whitcomb, Monroe; A. C. Griffith, Jackson; V. P. Antwerp, Vigo; J. R. Craig, Posey; George Finch, Vanderburg; A. C. Reid, Marion; A. C. Pepper, Dearborn, and James Ritchey, Johnson.

THE OPPONENTS OF VAN BUREN IN ACTION.

A meeting favorable to the elevation of General William Henry Harrison was held at the Franklin county court house in Brookville, February 5, 1835. Enoch McCarty presided. Resolutions were adopted lauding the candidacy of General Harrison for the presidency. A committee was appointed to prepare an address to the citizens of the United States, as follows: David Mount, Dr. Samuel St. John, Major J. L. Andrew, John A. Matson, Robert John, Lemuel Snow, Bartholomew Fitzpatrick, James Samuels and Capt. John Shultz.

A public meeting was held in Franklin county, February 6, 1835. Fielding Jeter was chairman and Col. B. S. Noble secretary. Jeter left before the convention was over and Noble took the chair.

John A. Matson presented the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the evils of excited party spirit have become so great in the United States that the people are imperiously called upon to take some measures to allay the excitement. . . ."

It ended by declaring confidence in General William Henry Harrison of Ohio.

C. W. Hutchens offered a motion to adjourn for four weeks, which was lost. He then offered as a substitute:

"Whereas, Several hundred of the citizens of Franklin county united in inviting together their fellow citizens for a specific object, viz., to adopt measures, that in the opinion of this assemblage shall be best adapted to the work of allaying party strife or excitement—a consummation devoutly to be wished; we have after mature reflection come to the conclusion that the object can be best attained by leaving the business of candidate-making to others who are better acquainted with the claims of prominent men than is possible in the nature of things than we can be. Therefore,

"Resolved, That we will, each of us, return to our respective places of abode, and with the utmost composure, await the presentation of the candidates for the office of President and Vice-President of the United States, and also impartially examine, from the best opportunities offered, the qualifications, and make our selections accordingly.

"Resolved, That we deprecate all attempts to dictate to us, from whatever source, and that we prefer open dealing to blind innuendo.

"Resolved, That we think this course entirely characteristic of freemen, and con-tradistinguished by that of calling together a select few for the advancement of party views to operate more abroad than at home."

These resolutions were adopted. C. W. Hutchen then moved to amend the resolution of John A. Matson by striking out the name of Harrison and inserting the name of the person who may be nominated by the Democratic National Convention to be held on the 20th of May, 1835. This motion failed, as did also that by Hutchens, to substitute the name of Martin Van Buren for that of Harrison.

Though the Democrats of Indiana did not succeed in securing the election of Van Buren electors, they felt highly elated over the victory won in the country-at-large. While averse to General Harrison being made President of the United States, they felt that the pioneers owed him a large debt of gratitude for the splendid military service he rendered in fighting the Indians and making it possible for white men to gain a habitation and enjoy the benefits thereof.

VAN BURENITES JOLLIFY.

A jollification over the election of Van Buren and Johnson was held December 26, 1836, at Ross Smiley's store at Longwood, Fayette county. The newspaper account says:

"When the meeting was proposed it was only intended to meet and drink a few bottles of wine in sociability, expressive of the good feeling experienced on the occasion. But finding the meeting would be numerously attended, a beautiful young hickory, five inches in diameter, was planted with the bark and limbs thereon, and bearing a flagstaff, with a new hickory broom on the top and a flag of the Union suspended at a distance of seventy-five feet from the ground. On the flag was impressed the name of Martin Van Buren in large letters, with the eagle, stars and stripes, and decorated with ribbons—all in handsome style."

INDIANA'S REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS FROM 1816 TO 1833.

During the first six years of Statehood Indiana had but one Representative in Congress—William Hendricks. Under a new apportionment, as the result of largely increased population, the State became entitled to three Representatives. This ratio continued until 1833, when the State's representation was more than doubled. William Prince, ex-Governor Jonathan Jennings and John Test were elected to the Eighteenth Congress. Mr. Prince was killed by the explosion of a steamboat on the way to Washington to begin his term of office. Jacob Call was elected to fill the vacancy.

To the Nineteenth Congress—1825 to 1827—Ratliff Boon, Jonathan Jennings and John Test were elected.

There was quite a "shake-up" in the election of members to the Twentieth Congress, Boon having been defeated and Thomas Blake chosen in his stead. Jennings fared better, succeeding himself, but Test was replaced by Oliver H. Smith.

At the following election the delegation to the Twenty-first Congress was again made to consist of Boon, Jennings, and Test. But at the election two years later Ratliff Boon was the only one of the trio to retain his seat, so that Indiana's delegation to the Twenty-second Congress was made to consist of Ratliff Boon, John Carr, and Jonathan McCarty. With the ending of that decade terminated Indiana's trio representation.

In order to give the present generation something of an idea of the manner of men sent to Congress from Indiana in the earlier days of the State's existence, brief biographical sketches are presented:

U. S. SENATORS CHOSEN PRIOR TO 1840.

James Noble, Waller Taylor, William Hendricks, Robert Hanna, John Tipton, Oliver H. Smith and Albert S. White were chosen prior to 1840 to represent Indiana in the United States Senate. Two of them—William Hendricks and Oliver H. Smith—had previously served in the Lower House and are biographically mentioned in the foregoing chapter. They will, therefore, not be included in the sketches following:

JAMES NOBLE, born near Berryville, Clarke county, Virginia, December 16, 1785; moved with his parents to Campbell county, Kentucky, in 1795; studied law and was admitted to the bar; moved to Brookville, Franklin county, Indiana, in 1811; member of the Territorial Legislature; elected to the United States Senate in 1816; re-elected in 1821 and 1827, and served from November 8, 1816, until his death, in Washington, D. C., Feb. 26, 1831.

CONGRESSMAN, GOVERNOR AND SENATOR.

When the delegate convention met at Corydon on the 10th day of June, 1816, under the authority of the enabling act of Congress, to frame a constitution for the new State, William Hendricks was chosen secretary of that small but able and historic body. He was an elder brother of Major John Hendricks, father of Thomas A. Hendricks. Those who knew him in the days of his activity described him as having been large and commanding in person and as bearing in his physiognomy the marks of strong intellectuality. In August of the same year he was elected a member of Congress under the approved constitution, thus becoming the first Representative of the State of Indiana in the National Legislature. Twice re-elected to this position, he acquitted himself so creditably that he was, in 1822, elected Governor of the new commonwealth without opposition, receiving all the votes cast for that high office—18,340.

The vote for Lieutenant-Governor was:

|-----------------------|-------|
| Ratliff Boon | 7,809 |
| William Polke | 4,044 |
| Erasmus Powell | 3,603 |
| David H. Maxwell..... | 2,366 |

It is a notable circumstance that Jonathan Jennings preceded Hendricks in Congress as territorial delegate and after serving two terms as Governor, succeeded him as member of Congress. This exchange of places is in itself evidence of the high esteem in which these two men were held by the people of Indiana.

Ratliff Boon had been chosen Lieutenant-Governor in 1819. When Governor Jennings was elected to Congress in 1822 he resigned the office of Governor. Boon constitutionally became his successor and served as acting Governor from September 12 to December 5, 1822. At the August election of that year Boon was again chosen Lieutenant-Governor on the ticket headed by Mr. Hendricks. He served as such until the close of the legislative session of 1824, when he filed his resignation with the Secretary of State. This document was dated August 30, 1824. Under the same date he addressed a letter to the State Senate in which he announced his act of resigning the office which he had held under two administrations—those of Governors Jennings and Hendricks.

Before the close of his term as Governor, Mr. Hendricks was elected United States Senator to succeed Waller Taylor. He filed his resignation as Governor February 12, 1825. There being then no Lieutenant-Governor, by reason of the resignation of Ratliff Boon, January 30, 1824, James B. Ray, as President of the Senate, became acting Governor, serving as such until December 11, 1825. Mr. Ray was twice elected Governor, his second term expiring in 1831.

At his first election Mr. Ray was credited with 13,040 votes, while his competitor, the distinguished jurist, Isaac Blackford, then an anti-slavery Whig but later on a Democrat, received 10,418 votes. Scattering, 12. For Lieutenant-Governor the vote stood:

|-------------------------|--------|
| John H. Thompson..... | 10,781 |
| Samuel Milroy | 7,496 |
| Dennis Pennington | 1,496 |
| Elisha Harrison | 1,434 |
| General W. Johnson..... | 851 |
| Scattering | 84 |

Mr. Hendricks served two terms in the Senate of the United States. He must have possessed, in an eminent degree, the conciliatory qualities and pacifying characteristics of his nephew, Thomas A. Hendricks, whose undisputed leadership of his party for a full quarter of a century is without parallel in the history of the State.

Unlike his predecessor, Governor Jennings, Mr. Hendricks did not seem to have become involved in the bitter controversies and contests provoked prior to the State's admission into the Union. The pro-slavery element that came into Indiana Territory had ingratiated itself in the good graces of General and Governor William Henry Harrison, who himself was a champion of that cause. Jonathan Jennings was the uncompromising foe of slavery and as such was repeatedly elected as delegate to Congress before the Territory had been clothed in the habiliment of Statehood. As a native of the State of William Penn, Mr. Hendricks may without much hazard be assumed to have been in sympathy with Mr. Jennings on the slavery question. Public feeling ran high on that issue in the Territory, and in view of the fact that in each succeeding contest Mr. Hendricks came out of the fray as victor, the inference is warranted that these two leaders were in hearty accord on that and other questions and issues. In matters pertaining to pacification or conciliation the name "Hendricks" seems to have possessed a high degree of magnetic power.

And yet, toward the close of Mr. Hendricks's second term as U. S. Senator circumstances so shaped themselves as to frustrate his aspiration to a third term in that coveted station. It may be assumed that, having served three successive terms in the House, he cherished the hope that he might be delegated to represent his State for a like number in the Senate. It was in December, 1836, that the continuance of his senatorial service came to a final decision. The candidates pitted against him were Governor Noah Noble, former Lieutenant-Governor Ratliff Boon and Congressman Oliver H. Smith. On the first ballot Noble and Hendricks were in the lead, but after that the situation changed. On the ninth ballot Smith carried away the honors—to the amazement of the "old timers" who at the beginning looked upon his candidacy as a daring and somewhat presumptuous political venture.

William Hendricks was born at Ligonier, Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, in 1773. He was educated at Canonsburg, having for a classmate Dr. Wylie, afterward a distinguished President of the State University at Bloomington. Both became eminent, one as a statesman, the other as an educator. Their diverse pathways did not diminish their early friendship, which terminated only with their lives.

In his admirable book, entitled "Biographical and Historical Sketches of Early Indiana," William Wesley Woollen, who prior to locating in Indianapolis was for years a resident of Madison, the town at which William Hendricks established himself and resided from 1814 to the end of his useful life, in the year 1850, thus speaks of the subject of this sketch:

"Men who found empires should not be forgotten. They plant the tree of civil liberty, and water its roots, while those who come after them but trim its branches to preserve its symmetry. If they plant carelessly and in poor soil the tree will have but a sickly growth. That the men who planted Indiana in the wilderness planted wisely and well is evidenced by its wonderful growth. It was then inhabited only by a few thousand hardy pioneers who had settled on its southern and eastern borders; now it contains two millions of prosperous people, its whole area being covered with happy homes.

"William Hendricks had as much to do with laying the foundations of this great State and commencing its superstructure as any other man, excepting Jonathan Jennings only, and yet how few there are who know he ever lived. How transitory is the fame of human greatness.

"Worldly honors are not easily won, although the bard tells us that some men have greatness thrust upon them. In the contest for fame there is sharp competition, and those only win who have endurance and mettle. A number of educated and talented young men had come to Indiana in quest of fortune, and had William Hendricks been a dolt or a laggard he would have been distanced in the race. But he was neither. He was talented and energetic, and he won. He also knew how to utilize the means at his command and to make the most of the situation. When he came to Indiana he brought with him a printing press, and soon afterward commenced the publication of a weekly paper. It was called the Eagle, and, I believe, was the second newspaper published in the State, the Vincennes Sun being the first. Through his paper he became known and paved the way for his political fortune. He made the first revision of the laws of the State and had it printed on his own press. The Legislature offered to pay him for this work, but he declined all pecuniary compensation. It then passed a resolution of thanks, the only return for his labor he would take.

"Governor Hendricks was a friend to education. Hanover College and the State University at Bloomington both received his fostering care. He took an active interest in public enterprises, and frequently aided them with his purse. He was very politic in his actions, never antagonizing a man when he could honorably avoid it. He had a large estate, and after leaving the Senate he spent his time in managing it and practicing law. He held on to his real estate with great tenacity, leasing it for a term of years when practicable, instead of selling it. Many houses were erected at Madison on property leased of him, and, like most houses built under such circumstances, they were poorly and cheaply constructed. His disposition to lease rather than sell his property caused much dissatisfaction among the people, and very greatly lessened his influence.

"On the 16th of May, 1850, Governor Hendricks rode out to his farm, just north of Madison, to oversee the building of a family vault. While assisting in the preparation of a receptacle for his body 'after life's fitful fever' was over, he was taken ill and soon afterward died. The author is not certain whether he died at the farm house or was taken back to his home in the city, but is inclined to the opinion that he breathed his last near the spot where he is buried and where his remains have crumbled to dust.

"Governor Hendricks was of a family that occupies a front place in the history of Indiana. There is probably no other one in the State that has exerted so wide an influence upon its politics and legislation as his. His eldest son, John Abram, was a captain in the Mexican war, and a lieutenant-colonel in the War of the Rebellion. He was killed in the battle of Pea Ridge while in command of his regiment. Another son, Thomas, was killed in the Teche country during General Banks' campaign up Red River. A brother and a nephew sat in the State Senate, and another nephew, Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks, has received the highest honors his State could confer upon him.

"Governor Hendricks was about six feet high and had a well-proportioned body. He had auburn hair, blue eyes and a florid complexion. His manners were easy and dignified, and his address that of a well-bred gentleman. He was not a great lawyer, nor an eloquent advocate, but he prepared his cases with care and was reasonably successful at the bar. In early life he was a Presbyterian, but in his later years he joined the Methodist church and died in her communion."

The Indiana Gazetteer of 1850 thus spoke of him: "Governor Hendricks was for many years by far the most popular man in the State. He had been its sole representative in Congress for six years, elected on each occasion by large majorities, and no member of that body, probably, was more attentive to the interests of the State he represented, or more industrious in arranging all the private or local business entrusted to him. He left no letter unanswered, no public office or document did he fail to visit or examine on request; with personal manners very engaging, he long retained his popularity."

In northern Indiana there is a thriving town, located in Noble county, that was laid out by Isaac Cavin and named Ligonier. It was in this town that the author of this book established the National Banner in May, 1866. This paper is still in existence, but bears the name Ligonier Banner. Like Mr. Hendricks, Isaac Cavin came to Indiana from the vicinity of Ligonier, Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania. He was a most estimable man and a highly successful farmer on the celebrated "Hawpatch," the garden spot of Indiana.

RATLIFF BOON.

When Governor Jonathan Jennings accepted an election to Congress his unexpired term was filled by Lieutenant-Governor Ratliff Boon. And upon being elected a second time as Lieutenant-Governor, in 1822, he served two-thirds of his term and then resigned. His reason for resigning was that he wanted to go to Congress. He made a successful race for that position in the First district in 1824, but was defeated two years later by Colonel Thomas H. Blake. But in four subsequent races he was again successful. As a Congressman he was quite active and influential. During the greater part of his congressional service he was chairman of the then highly important committee on public lands. In 1836 he aspired to a seat in the U. S. Senate, antagonizing Senator Hendricks, who desired to be re-elected to a third term. The election of a Whig, Oliver H. Smith, was the final outcome of the contest. Mr. Boon was a radical Jacksonian Democrat, though in the earlier part of his political career he styled himself a Jeffersonian and later on a Bentonian. His congressional career ended in March, 1839, and a few months afterward he moved from Indiana to Pike county, Missouri. In that State, then absolutely under the sway of Thomas H. Benton, Boon soon again actively engaged in politics. He became leader of the anti-Benton Democrats, who were bent on sending him to Congress. His health had, however, become undermined. He was intensely anxious that James K. Polk be elected to the presidency in 1844. When assurance came the latter part of November that Henry Clay was beaten and Polk triumphantly elected, Ratliff Boon expressed himself quite willing to die. His spirit fled from its tenement November 20, 1844.

The spirit of conciliation, concession and compromise must have been very much in evidence at the beginning of Indiana's State government. This was especially made manifest in the first election of U. S. Senators, when James Noble and Waller Taylor were chosen. The latter was a pronounced pro-slavery man and a bitter personal and political enemy of Governor Jennings. When Indiana was still a territory Judge Taylor ran against Jennings for delegate to Congress. The contest was made an offensively bitter one, not by Jennings, but by Taylor. The latter boasted of having publicly insulted his competitor and of having done his utmost to provoke the fighting of a duel. "Liar, sneak, coward," were some of the choice epithets hurled at Jennings, who, however, maintained his equanimity and complacently ignored the vituperation of his antagonist. It would seem strange, however, that under such circumstances Walter Taylor could twice have been chosen to the exalted office of United States Senator.

GOVERNOR JAMES BROWN RAY.

As a result of the resignation of Lieutenant-Governor Ratliff Boon, January 30, 1824, James Brown Ray, a Senator from Franklin county, was chosen president pro tempore of the Indiana State Senate. He presided over that body to the close of the session, and was again chosen to that position at the beginning of the next session in January, 1825. Upon Governor Hendricks' election to the U. S. Senate Mr. Ray became acting Governor. He was then an exceedingly popular young man. The following year he became a candidate for Governor and was, as already stated, triumphantly elected by a majority of 2,622 votes over the distinguished jurist, Isaac Blackford. Ray's administration must have given measurable satisfaction, for at the next election, in 1828—presidential year, when Andrew Jackson was triumphantly elected to the Presidency of the United States—Governor Ray was re-elected. He had two competitors—Dr. Israel T. Canby and Harbin H. Moore. Governor Ray received 15,141 votes; Dr. Canby, 12,315, and Mr. Moore, 10,904. He held the office until 1831, when he was succeeded by Noah Noble.

The race for the Lieutenant-Governorship was a remarkably close one, as appears from these figures:

|---------------------|--------|
| Milton Stapp | 17,895 |
| Abel C. Pepper..... | 17,262 |

The total vote for Governor exceeded this by 3,000, the three candidates being credited with 38,360.

Governor Ray became involved in a somewhat acrimonious controversy over the appointment of supreme judges. It appears that he had aspirations to go to the U. S. Senate and that two of the judges assumed to be justly entitled to reappointment were denied such recognition by the Governor on account of their refusal to aid him in his senatorial aspirations.

This greatly impaired his popularity. Prior thereto he had rendered himself unpopular by accepting an appointment as commissioner to negotiate a treaty with the Miami and Pottawatamie Indians. The constitution expressly forbade a State officer holding a federal appointment of trust and profit. To get around this he requested that no formal commission be issued to him and that he be simply authorized by letter to serve on the aforesaid commission in conjunction with Generals Lewis Cass and John Tipton. This extraordinary procedure was sharply criticised by the Legislature. Formal action was taken, but the matter was permitted to drag along for a time. A final decision was evaded and Governor Ray was permitted to resume the functions of that office. It was a "close shave," this escape from a formal declaration that the office of Governor had been vacated by the acceptance of an appointment to effect a settlement with the Indians.

In view of the fact that Governor Ray instigated the gigantic internal improvement movement that subsequently proved so disastrous to the State, the subjoined characterization of the man by William Wesley Woollen will be adjudged as being of more than passing interest:

"In Governor Ray's messages to the Legislature he argued forcibly and eloquently the great advantage that must accrue to Indiana by the construction and operation of railroads, and predicted much which, although at the time seemed chimerical, has really come to pass. Many considered him insane and his utterances those of a madman, but time has demonstrated that in the main he was correct. He saw more plainly than any other man of his day the future of the State in which he lived. After he left office he continued to dilate upon his favorite subject, and to predict a great future for Indianapolis.

A writer, who seems to think the Governor was somewhat off his mental balance, thus speaks of him in a late article in an Indianapolis paper:

During a long period of mental disturbance in his old age, Governor Ray was fond of discussing his "grand scheme" of railroad concentration at Indianapolis. Here was to be the head of a score of radiating lines. At intervals of five miles were to be villages, of ten miles towns, and of twenty miles respectable cities. This crazy whim, as everybody regarded it, has been made a fact as solid as the everlasting hills. The only point of failure is the feature that possessed special interest to the Governor. The Union Depot and point of concentration of the radiating lines are not on his property, opposite the court house, where, by all the requirements of symmetry and consistency, they should have been. Oddly enough, one expedient in construction, which certainly looked silly, has been actually put in use successfully in some one or another of our far Western lines. Where deep gorges were to be crossed, he thought that trestle-work might be replaced by cutting off the tops of growing trees level with the track and laying sills on these for the rails. It is not many months since the papers published a description of exactly that sort of expedients in crossing a deep and heavily timbered hollow on a Western railway—the Denver & Rio Grande probably. So thoroughly has the great "hub" scheme and its connections and incidents been identified with Governor Ray and his hallucinations, that there are few who know anything of the matter at all who will not be surprised to learn that the origination of it is at least as likely to be the work of Governor Noble's deliberate reasoning as of Governor Ray's fantasies. In his annual message of 1833-4 he discusses the importance of the internal improvement system, then projected and widely debated, but not adopted by the State, and only partially pursued by the help of canal land grants by Congress, and he argues for the concentration of artificial facilities for transportation here. In other words, without saying it, he wants Indianapolis to be exactly the "hub" that Governor Ray predicted it would be. Whether the national Governor in office got his notions from the fancies of the deranged ex-Governor, or the latter only expanded in his fantastic projects the official suggestion of the other, we shall never know. But the probability is that the sane Governor profited by the hints he saw in the wild talk of the insane Governor. For Governor Noble was not a strikingly original genius, and Governor Ray, as eccentric and egotistical as he was, had more than an average allowance of brains.

"After Governor Ray ceased to be Governor he resumed the practice of law, but he did not succeed in getting much legal business. He seemed to have 'run down at the heel,' and, although he was in the prime of life, the public appeared to think him superannuated, as having passed his day of usefulness. In 1835 he became a candidate for clerk of Marion county against Robert B. Duncan, Esq., and, for a time, seemed bent on making a lively canvass. But, before the election came off, he had virtually abandoned the contest. Although he did not formally withdraw, he had no tickets printed, and when the ballots were counted it was found that few of them had been cast for him. In 1837 he ran for Congress, in the Indianapolis district, against William Herrod, and was defeated, receiving but 5,888 votes to his competitor's 9,635. This want of appreciation by the public soured him, and made him more eccentric than ever.

"In the summer of 1848 Governor Ray made a trip to Wisconsin and returned home by way of the Ohio river. While on the river he became unwell and, on reaching Cincinnati, was taken to the house of a relative. The disease proved to be cholera, and terminated in his death August 4, 1848. He was buried in Spring Grove Cemetery, near Cincinnati, outside the State he had helped to found.

"In his latter days Governor Ray was so eccentric that most people thought his mind diseased. He always walked with a cane, and sometimes he would stop on the street and, with his cane, write words in the air. It is no wonder that those who saw him do this believed him insane. A short time before he died he advertised, in an Indianapolis paper, a farm and a tavern stand for sale, and for a proposition to build a railroad from Charleston, S. C., through Indianapolis to the northern lakes, all in one advertisement.

"In person, Governor Ray, in his younger days, was very prepossessing. He was tall and straight, with a body well-proportioned. He wore his hair long and tied in a queue. His forehead was broad and high, and his features denoted intelligence of a high order. For many years he was a leading man of Indiana, and no full history of the State can be written without frequent mention of his name."

By birth he was a Kentuckian.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT BUBBLE

UNDER WHIG RULE THE SLOW BUT SURE POLICY WAS DISCARDED AND A GIGANTIC SCHEME OF CANAL BUILDING DEVELOPED—DISASTER THE INEVITABLE CONSEQUENCE

NOAH NOBLE, the fourth elected Governor of Indiana, was a native of Virginia, grew to manhood in Kentucky, and located at Brookville about the time Indiana was admitted into the union. In 1820 he was elected sheriff of Franklin county and re-elected in 1822. Two years later he was chosen a member of the Legislature virtually without opposition, only twenty votes having been cast against him. In order to guard against his running for county clerk the friends of the incumbent of that office suggested that Noble be groomed for Governor. The suggestion met with high favor, and in due course of time he was put in training. He easily secured the nomination by the Whig party, and although Jackson Democracy was largely in the ascendancy in the State at that time, Mr. Noble was elected by a plurality of 2,791 over James G. Read, Democrat, and this in face of the fact that another Whig, Milton Stapp by name, was also a candidate for that office and polled 4,422 votes.

The total vote for Governor cast at the election of 1831 reached 37,549, divided as follows:

FOR GOVERNOR.

|------------------------------|--------|
| Noah Noble, Whig..... | 17,959 |
| James G. Read, Democrat..... | 15,168 |
| Milton Stapp, Whig..... | 4,422 |

FOR LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

|----------------------------|--------|
| David Wallace, Whig..... | 17,101 |
| Ross Smiley, Democrat..... | 12,858 |
| James Gregory..... | 5,346 |

Three years later, in 1834, Governor Noble successfully aspired to a re-election.

He polled 27,676 votes, his Democratic antagonist, James G. Read, receiving 19,994.

For Lieutenant-Governor David Wallace, Whig, polled 29,415 votes, and David V. Culley, Democrat, 14,260.

Shortly after his retirement from the Governorship the Legislature elected him as a member of the Board of Public Improvements. In 1841 he was chosen to fill another highly important position, that of Fund Commissioner. He was held in high esteem throughout his career. Born January 15, 1794, he died in the very prime of life, February 8, 1844, near Indiana-pol.

What happened during Governor Noble's two administrations is thus comprehensively set forth in "A Century of Indiana," by Edward E. Moore:

"Vast System of Internal Improvements.—Governor Noble was an advocate of extensive public improvements, having been elected on a platform declaration to that effect. He early began the construction of the Wabash and Erie Canal, for the promotion of which Congress had given, in 1827, a large and valuable grant of land. This canal was to connect Lake Erie with the Wabash river, at a point below which the river would be navigable; and in 1836 a general system of internal improvements having been agreed upon, consisting of canals, railroads and turnpikes, covering almost the entire State, bonds were issued and sold and contracts let. Then ensued an era of great prosperity. There was employment for everybody at profitable wages, money was plentiful and easy to get and a spirit of daring speculation and of general extravagance seized upon many of the people and helped to embitter the unfortunate experiences so soon to follow. The future, with these great improvements completed, was pictured in exceedingly bright colors. It was thought by some that the revenues to be derived from the railroads and canals would not only pay for their construction, but would build up such a surplus in the treasury of the State as to relieve the people of all burdens of taxation.

"The improvements undertaken consisted of 1,289 miles of roads, railroads and canals at an estimated cost of $19,914,424. Bonds for many millions were issued and sold and the State's indebtedness by 1841 had been pushed up to the appalling aggregate of $18,469,146. The total of roads and canals completed up to that time amounted to only 281 miles.

"The State Embarrassed.—Works Abandoned and Compromise Made With Creditors—The First Railroad.—It very soon became apparent that the State had overestimated its financial resources, and before a halt could be called had involved itself beyond its ability to pay. And to make matters worse, the pall of the great panic of 1837 descended upon the whole country, at the very time of the State's greatest embarrassment. All the works had to be abandoned, bringing bankruptcy to contractors and distress to thousands of citizens. Construction ceased entirely in 1839.

"The State found itself unable to pay even the interest on its indebtedness, much less to proceed further with the improvements. It finally entered into compromise agreements with its creditors, relieving itself of a part of the debt and reducing interest charges. The creditors were permitted to take over the unfinished improvements in part satisfaction of their claims, the balance being paid in new bonds, or treasury notes. As a rule, the improvements were not completed by the new owners, and the State's vast expenditures were practically for naught. Then the securities in the nature of bonds, and certificates of stock, to possession of which the State was entitled under the compromise settlements, were not all surrendered, and afterwards attempts were made to exact payment of them. Claims were also preferred on the grounds that the State had rendered the canal properties valueless by granting franchises to competing railroads. Finally, in 1873, after years of agitation and bitterness, an amendment to the constitution was adopted prohibiting the Legislature for all time from paying any of these compromised debts, particularly that of the Wabash and Erie Canal.

"Of all the vast projects undertaken by the State, the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad alone was fully completed, its completion being accomplished by the assignee company to which the State surrendered it. It was the first railroad built to Indianapolis, its entrance into that city signaling the year 1847. The Wabash and Erie Canal was completed as far as Lafayette, and was extensively patronized by the people having surplus products to transport, but the receipts from tolls were not sufficient to maintain it, much less produce dividends to apply on cost of construction. The White Water Canal was completed from Lawrenceburg, on the Ohio river, to Connersville, and its facilities for transportation purposes availed of by the people for many years.

"State's Undertaking not Wholly Unadvised.—It would be very unfair for the people of this day, enjoying all of their wonderful facilities for travel and commerce and trade, to say that the vast undertakings of 1836 were wholly unadvised. The question of 'internal improvements' was one of the great issues of the day, not only in Indiana, but in other States, and in the country at large. The Erie Canal in New York, constructed at a cost of $7,000,000, had proved itself a paying investment and of vast benefit in facilitating travel, in reducing freight rates and in settling up the country. And there were many other examples of profitable canal construction to be held up before the people by the early '30's. The work was not taken up hastily in Indiana, or without discussion. The need was great, and the people, thoroughly in earnest, thought they were prepared for whatever sacrifice was necessary to meet it. The issue had been before them for a decade or more. They could not foresee the panic conditions which set in in 1837, nor the early development of the modern railroad. In spite of the panic and the financial breakdown on the part of the State, most of the system of improvements planned would have been completed eventually, and to the incalculable benefit of the State, had it not been for the coming of the railroads. These early made the canals useless, or practically so, as their competition was impotent against the more rapid means of transit, and their construction ceased, or rather was not resumed.

"The Surplus Revenue Fund.—In 1836 the United States treasury found itself overburdened with a large surplus fund, for which there was no immediate or prospective need. The national debt had been extinguished and there was no other demand to be met outside of the ordinary running expenses of the Government. Hence, the question arose as to what should be done with the surplus. After much discussion, Congress decided, by an act approved June 23, 1836, to deposit all the fund but $5,000,000 with the several States, proportioning it among them on the basis of their representation in Congress. The total amount to be thus distributed, in four equal installments, was $37,468,859. Three of the installments were paid to the various States, but before the fourth was due the panic of 1837 had paralyzed the Government revenues and no further distribution was ever made. Indiana's share of the fund actually distributed amounted to $806,254.44.*

"It was clearly the intention of the Government that this transaction should be considered merely in the nature of a deposit of funds with the States, and that repayment would be required, but three-quarters of a century have passed without any demand being made. And although the distribution was not an equitable one, when all sections of the country are considered, it is unlikely, after such a lapse of time, that Congress will ever exact repayment.

"By an act of the Legislature of 1837 it was directed that one-half of Indiana's

*D. H. Montgomery, in his "Student's American History," says of the transaction: "It was styled a 'deposit,' but it was practically a gift. . . . Some States divided their share of the money among the whole population, each person getting a few shillings; others used the money to begin great systems of roads, canals, and similar public improvements. These works were seldom carried to completion, and generally ended by piling up a heavy State debt. A few States still hold and use the income of the money." All of which would indicate that Indiana, by investing her share for the benefit of her schools, is one among the very few States making wise use of a Government bounty so unwisely bestowed.

portion of this 'surplus revenue fund' be distributed among the counties, in proportion to the enumeration of male citizens twenty-one years of age and over, in amounts not to exceed $400 to any one individual, at 8 per cent. interest, and the other half invested in stock of the State Bank. The interest on the loans and the dividends on the bank stock were to be turned into the common school fund.

"Owing to the fact that the first two installments went to the counties and the fourth was never paid, the fund was not equally divided, the counties receiving $537,502.96 and the bank $268,751.48. Of the latter sum $40,000 was used to pay interest on internal improvement bonds, and of the portion distributed to the counties a large percentage was lost through bad loans, carelessness in enforcing collections and depression in values of mortgages and other securities resulting from the panic of 1837. The portion recovered was turned over to the State Bank in 1841, and this, and the original investment in stock of the bank proved so fortunate, yielding large and certain dividends, that the fund more than restored itself. With the closing of the State Bank in 1859, the money was transferred to the State treasury and reinvested through the counties for the benefit of the schools. It now constitutes a very important item of the State's magnificent common school endowment.

"The State Bank of Indiana.—The State Bank of Indiana, which proved to be a most successful and stable institution, was chartered in 1834. The charter provided for the establishment of twelve branches and the thirteenth was later added. The capital stock authorized was $1,600,000, of which the State agreed to subscribe one-half. It had a complete monopoly, as no other banks were permitted to operate in the State. During the panic of 1837 it was compelled to suspend specie payment temporarily, but resumed in 1842, and from that date until its charter expired in 1859 it never failed to meet all demands upon it, and enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best managed and most reliable banking institutions in the West.

"Issue of State Scrip—'Red Dog' and 'Blue Pup' Currency—Days of 'Wildcat' Money.—During the stress of its difficulties attendant upon the collapse of the internal improvement system, and the general panic which enveloped the whole country, Indiana was compelled in 1839 to resort to the expedient of issuing State scrip. The entire extent of such issue amounted to $1,500,000. It bore 6 per cent. interest and was receivable for taxes, but rapidly depreciated until its market value was only 40 to 50 cents on the dollar. It was printed on red paper, and the people desirively called it 'red dog' currency. It was finally redeemed and was worth a large premium at the last, due partly to the restoration of confidence in the financial integrity of the State and partly to the accumulated interest.

"Before the panic was over merchants, plank-road contractors and others resorted to the issuance of private scrip. It is needless to say that its circulating value also quickly fell below par, and taking their cue from the fact that it was printed mostly on blue paper, the people called it 'blue pup' currency, as distinguished from the State's 'red dog' currency. Much of the private scrip was redeemable only in trade, or merchandise, or toll on the plank roads. The State was flooded with 'wildcat' currency in the form of depreciated paper put out by 'banks of issue' in surrounding States, which drove good money out of circulation."

GOVERNOR DAVID WALLACE.

Sons of Pennsylvania seem to have been in favor with the voters of the young Commonwealth of Indiana, as made manifest in the choice of Governors. David Wallace, who succeeded Noah Noble in the gubernatorial chair, 1837, was born in Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, April 24, 1799. General Harrison was instrumental in having young Wallace made a cadet at West Point. Graduated in 1821, he became a tutor in that institution, serving as such a short time, then enlisting in the army as lieutenant of artillery. His father having located in Brookville, that picturesque Indiana town became his place of residence. He studied law, and several years after his admission to the bar was elected to the Legislature three times in succession—1828, 1829 and 1830. In 1831 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor and re-elected in 1834. It is said that as preceding officer of the State he had few equals and no superior. In recognition of his demonstrated ability, his party (Whig) nominated him for Governor. His Democratic competitor was John Dumont, an able and distinguished lawyer residing at Vevay, on the southern border of the State. The vote stood: Wallace, 45,240; Dumont, 36,197. For Lieutenant-Governor, David Willis, Whig, had 48,823; Alexander S. Burnett, Democrat, 22,311.

Elected as a champion of the internal improvement policy, inaugurated by his predecessors, Governor Wallace did his utmost to make that undertaking a success. With all the ability and resourcefulness at his command, he found himself unable to save from wreckage the stupendous enterprises into which the State had been lured by enthusiasts and visionaries—well-meaning, it is true, but woefully unmindful of that cautionary admonition, "look before you leap." Having done his best, his party turned him the cold shoulder when he sought a renomination in 1840. With characteristic ingratitude for service well rendered, the Whig convention of 1840 nominated for Governor Samuel Bigger, a gentleman who had been prominently identified with the internal improvement scheme of that decade. Without a murmur of complaint, Governor Wallace accepted defeat, and at the completion of his term of office resumed the practice of law. A year after he was elected to Congress from the Indianapolis district, defeating the popular Colonel Nathan B. Palmer. Seeking a re-election in 1843, he met with defeat at the hands of William J. Brown, who beat him by 1,085 votes. The demoralization of the Whig party by the political defection of President John Tyler doubtless had much to do with bringing about this result. Undaunted by political adversity, he pursued assiduously the practice of his profession. In 1846 he permitted himself to be made Chairman of the Whig State Committee, and in 1850 he was made a member of the Constitutional Convention that framed the organic law under which Indiana still operates its governmental machinery. Despite his superb ability as a debater, he took but little part in the deliberations of that body. This occasioned grievous disappointment to his friends and admirers. The most noteworthy statement credited to him in the records of the Constitutional Convention is the declaration that while a member of Congress he voted for the expulsion from that body of the high priest of abolitionism, Joshua R. Giddings, on account of his persistence in stirring up sectional animosity between North and South. Giddings then represented the famous "Western Reserve" (of Ohio) in Congress and took high rank as one of the most outspoken and defiant anti-slavery agitators of the land. The last official position filled by Governor Wallace was that of Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, to which he was elected in 1856 and which he filled with marked ability. He died suddenly on the 4th of September, 1859. In eulogy he was declared to have been "a just judge—firm, upright, clear, patient, laborious, impartial and conscientious"—certainly a very high and appreciable tribute to honesty, integrity and efficiency. His oratory was of the choicest phraseology and of inspiring delivery.

LAST OF WHIG GOVERNORS—SAMUEL BIGGER.

A native of Ohio succeeded, in 1840, a native of Pennsylvania as Governor of Indiana. His name was Samuel Bigger, a product of Warren county, Ohio, born March 20, 1802. He was the son of John Bigger, a Western pioneer, and for many years a member of the Ohio Legislature. Though reared on a farm, he was frail of body, too delicate to perform manual labor. Accordingly he was prepared for college. As the result of earnest application to his studies he graduated from Athens University and then fitted himself for the legal profession. In 1829 he moved to Liberty, Ind., where he practiced law for a short time, and then located at Rushville. Like other Indiana lawyers, he sought and secured a seat in the Legislature, being first elected in 1834 and re-elected in 1835. The first year of his legislative career he sought to be elected Speaker, but was defeated by Colonel James Gregory by a 39 to 37 vote. After his legislative service he became a judge of his judicial circuit. In this position he made a creditable record. The reputation thus gained secured him the Whig nomination for Governor in 1840 over Governor Wallace, a much abler man and a far more forceful and eloquent public speaker. The campaign was a most exciting one. It was the famous "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" campaign, in which figured conspicuously and fantastically the log cabin, hard cider and coon skins. General Harrison was immensely popular in Indiana, having for years been its Territorial Governor. Though Indiana had three times voted for "Old Hickory" for the Presidency, it refused to give its electoral vote to Jackson's legatee, Martin Van Buren, either in 1836 or in 1840.

GENERAL TILGHMAN A. HOWARD.

The Democrats had as their candidate for Governor an exceptionally able, strong and good man in the person of General Tilghman A. Howard, then a member of Congress from the seventh district. He was a native of South Carolina, but his boyhood days were spent in North Carolina until he was nineteen years of age. Fascinated by the picturesque scenery of East Tennessee, he located in that part of the Union, following the pursuit of a school teacher and then of a merchant's clerk. He drifted into a law office, and at the age of twenty-one was admitted to the bar. Having developed high qualities as a public speaker, an appreciative electorate made him, at the age of twenty-seven, a State Senator. In this capacity he soon won prominence and distinction, so much so that he was placed upon the Jackson electoral ticket in 1828 and triumphantly elected. Two years later he became a resident of Indiana, locating at Bloomington, where he opened a law office and soon after formed a copartnership with James Whitcomb, who, in the following decade, became Governor and later on United States Senator. After a residence of about three years at Bloomington, Howard concluded that the town of Rockville, in Parke county, would prove a more advantageous location for him. He, however, continued his business relations with Mr. Whitcomb until 1836, when he dissolved it and associated himself with Judge William P. Bryant. This connection continued three years, when Judge Bryant withdrew from the firm. His place was taken by Joseph A. Wright, who, like Mr. Whitcomb, also in later years became Governor, and for a short time United States Senator. This combination of talent continued up to the time of Howard's death.

As an ardent supporter of "Old Hickory," Howard was appointed United States District Attorney for Indiana in 1832. This important office he held for seven years. In 1839 he made the race for a seat in Congress and was triumphantly elected. His district comprised nineteen counties in the western and northern parts of the State, extending clear over to Michigan City. Contrary to his wishes he was made the Democratic nominee for Governor in 1840. He entered upon a very vigorous campaign, at the close of which he was worn down by fatigue and disease. Yet he murmured not. His strong religious faith lent him stamina and afforded him serene buoyancy even in the hour of defeat, distress and disaster. In the truest sense of the word he was a Christian gentleman of steadfast character.

During the time he served as District Attorney of Indiana it became necessary for the Jackson administration, in 1835, to appoint a commissioner for the purpose of adjusting and settling a number of claims against the Government growing out of treaties with the Indians. This task was considered one of unusual delicacy and of utmost importance. There was much difference of opinion among President Jackson's cabinet officers as to who should be selected for this position, when "Old Hickory" himself solved the problem by suggesting Tilghman A. Howard as the very man needed and best suited for this difficult task. Needless to say that the selection fully met the expectations of the administration. General Howard proved himself the right man in the right place—the very soul of honor and integrity.

While serving as a member of Congress, and after having been selected to make the race for Governor, the suggestion was made, the latter part of May, 1840, that some sort of State demonstration be made in his behalf at Indianapolis, including a dinner. To this suggestion he made this characteristic reply:

"I have considered the matter. It is not democratic, and would be, to a certain extent, imitating the folly of our antagonists. Freemen ought to meet together to reason on public interests when they assemble for political effect, and allow me to say to you that the mass of our people will not be any the more zealous by any public demonstration. They will turn out to hear debate. I shall have as many as I deserve to have to hear me, and my wish is to have no demonstration, no procession, no flags, no drums, nor any other exhibition unworthy of a free, thinking, orderly community. I shall leave here at the very earliest day and hurry home and you may rely on it I will be at several points yet in Indiana before the election (in August). Allow my suggestion to prevail. Let us be what Democracy should be, too independent to be deceived by shows or led away by them; possessing too much respect for our fellow-men to attempt to mislead them on those great subjects that concern the general happiness."

The Legislature chosen in 1842 having a United States Senator to elect, the canvass of that year was made mainly upon that issue. The Whigs supported Oliver H. Smith, and the Democrats General Howard. No other man was spoken of in connection with the office until after the Legislature met. The two candidates met just before the Legislature convened and had a talk about the Senatorship. General Howard said to Mr. Smith that he knew one of them would be elected if the will of the people was carried out. "But," said he, "the vote will be so close that a man or two may be found who, like Judas, would sell his party for a few pieces of silver. There is nothing certain." That General Howard was correct events proved. On the first ballot he received 74 votes, Mr. Smith 72 votes, Edward A. Hannegan 3 votes and Joseph G. Marshall 1 vote. It will be seen that Howard lacked two votes of election. It was said at the time these votes were offered him if he would promise office to the givers, but he scorned the proffer. On the sixth ballot Mr. Hannegan was elected, General Howard having withdrawn from the contest.

In the summer of 1844 General Howard was appointed by President Tyler Charge d'Affaires to the Republic of Texas. He left home on the Fourth of July and reached Washington, the capital of Texas, August 1, 1844. In a few days he was taken sick with fever, and in fifteen days from the time of his arrival he died. He breathed his last at the house of John Farquhar, a few miles from Washington. He was buried in Texas, and for three years his remains rested in that far-off country.

Adopting the language of William Wesley Woollen, "General Howard was a member of the Presbyterian church, but he was not a sectarian. He believed there were many branches of the same vine, many paths leading to the straight gate. He was too good to be a bigot, too good to have no charity."

General Howard was always dignified in public. He seldom indulged in levity; but notwithstanding this, he had the faculty of drawing all classes of men to him. The sober and the gay, the lettered and the unlettered alike followed his fortunes.

Although General Howard never attended an academy or a college, he was a very learned man. He was acquainted with the civil law, with theology, history, politics, geology, mineralogy, botany, philosophy and the occult sciences. His mind was a vast storehouse of knowledge, it being questionable if there was another man in the State of such information as he.

During the canvass of 1840 a newspaper published at Greencastle sought to make political capital against General Howard by commenting upon his well-known opinions on temperance. When he spoke in that town he read the article and told the editor to get out another edition of his paper and throw it broadcast over the State. "I want every voter to know my opinions on this question," said Howard. "I am willing to stand by them, and, if need be, fall by them."

In a debate with a gentleman who evaded the issues and went out after side ones, General Howard told the following story, and applied it to his opponent: "Once," said he, "a representative from Buncombe county made a speech in the North Carolina Legislature, in which he talked of many things entirely foreign to the matter before the House, and on being called to order by the Speaker, and told to confine himself to the question at issue, replied: 'My speech is not for the Legislature; it is all for Buncombe.'" "All for Buncombe" became a common saying, and has remained such to the present day.

As has already been stated, General Howard died and was buried in Texas. But the people of Indiana were not willing that his dust should commingle with foreign soil. The Legislature of 1847 passed an act directing the Governor and General Joseph Lane "to have the remains of Tilghman A. Howard removed from their place of burial in Texas and reinterred at such place in Indiana as his family might desire." The act was approved by his friend and former partner, James Whitcomb, then Governor of the State. The will of the Legislature was carried out, and the remains of Howard disinterred and brought to Indiana. They remained a while at Indianapolis, receiving high honors. From thence they were taken to Greencastle, where like honors awaited them. They were then removed to Rockville, his old home, and interred in his orchard. Previous to placing the coffin in the ground, Professor William C. Larabee, afterward Indiana's first Superintendent of Public Instruction, delivered a eulogy upon the dead statesman, replete with beautiful thoughts. It closed as follows:

"Take him and bury him among you. Bury him where the primrose and the violet bloom in vernal beauty, where the rose of summer sheds its fragrance, and where the leaves of autumn fall, to protect the spot from the cheerless blast of the wintry winds. Bury him in that rural bower on the hillside, within sight of his quiet cottage home. Bury him by the side of the pretty child he loved so well—the beauteous little girl, who, years ago, died suddenly when the father was away from home. Bury him now by her, that child and father may sleep side by side. Ye need erect no costly monument, with labored inscription, over his grave. On a plain stone inscribe the name of Howard, of Indiana's Howard, and it shall be enough."

Senator David Turpie pronounced Tilghman A. Howard "A man of rare capacity, wisdom and discretion, and of singular purity of life and morals. Even the venial excesses so common in the customs of that time, and so often indulged in by those engaged in public life, he carefully avoided. Wholly free from cant, without the slightest trace of the formalist or Pharisee in his demeanor, he yet would not in these things conform, but went his own way, as he had chosen. . . . Many persons have spoken to me of Mr. Howard, and all have made mention of the depth and sincerity of his religious convictions. In every circumstance of life he acted as if he were in the presence and under the protection of his Maker—not, as he believed, that general care taken of the young ravens or of the sparrows in their fall, but that concern more immediate, spoken of by the Psalmist of the Friends:

"I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air,
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

HARD TIMES AND THEIR EFFECT

MATTERS THAT ENGAGED, WARPED AND EXCITED THE PUBLIC MIND

BEFORE proceeding to a review of the "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" campaign of 1840, it is quite important and essential to a clear understanding of the situation that some attention be given to the financial and industrial condition of the country, to the questions of moment upon which there was marked division of public opinion, and the causes that led to a crystallization of the forces of opposition to the Van Buren administration.

As tersely yet comprehensively epitomized by General Thomas E. Powell, the United States Bank, in the year 1816, received "A charter for twenty years. The law that created the bank also provided that the national revenue should be deposited in that bank to be paid out by it in accordance with directions it should receive from time to time from the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury had, however, the right to remove these deposits whenever, in his judgment, the public interest demanded the change. The intention of the law unquestionably was that the national deposits should be continued in the bank as long as the bank continued to be a safe depository and performed its duties according to law. In his message to Congress in 1829, 1830 and 1831, President Jackson expressed strong dislike of the United States Bank. A great many people in the country were in favor of continuing the bank, and Jackson's political opponents conceived the idea that if the bank were rechartered it would hamper Jackson in the Presidential election of 1832. Henry Clay was at that time endeavoring to clear his own path to the Presidency; consequently he favored the rechartering of the bank, hoping thereby to handicap Jackson.

"Under the fine manipulation of Clay, both Houses of Congress, in the winter of 1832, passed a bill providing for the renewal of the charter of the bank. President Jackson promptly vetoed the bill. His opponents had felt sure that he would not venture to take this step. They thought it would make him enemies and increase the strength of the National Republicans, of which Clay was the leader. In the next Congress, however, Jackson had a majority of his own supporters and no further attempt was made to renew the charter of the bank.

"The bank's charter would not expire until 1836, but the fight being on, Jackson was not willing to allow the bank to die a natural death. He therefore decided to remove the national deposits, giving as his reason for this act that they were unsafe in the United States Bank. He brought the matter before Congress during the session of 1833. But the House of Representatives expressed an aversion to the project. He then brought the matter up in his Cabinet, but Duane, the Secretary of the Treasury, firmly declared he could not conscientiously consent to the measure. Then, as Duane would not remove the deposits, President Jackson removed Duane and appointed Roger B. Taney in his stead. Secretary Taney at once issued an order for the removal of the deposits from the National Bank to the State banks. The banks to which the deposits were distributed immediately became known as 'pet banks.'

"The National Republicans all over the country were loud in their denunciations of Jackson, and the managers of the United States Bank at once set out for revenge, and for financial self-protection. They proceeded to call in their loans and then restricted discounts. Inside of a few months they had forced the collection of many millions of dollars. They knew the effect this would have upon the country, but the managers of the bank declared that they had made their loans on the credit of the Government deposits, and this being withdrawn, they were compelled to call in their loans. The result was financial troubles in the winter of 1836 and such men as Daniel Webster and Henry Clay laid the responsibility for these troubles at the President's door. Jackson was denounced all over the land as high-handed and tyrannical, and he was charged with taking control of the National Treasury, of which the representatives of the people in Congress were the constitutional guardians. Meanwhile the State banks which had received the surplus revenue regarded it as a permanent deposit, capital in short, and proceeded to enlarge their operations accordingly. So it came about that men who were permitted to borrow from the State banks what they actually needed could now borrow what they might wish. Speculation largely increased; Western lands, steamboat lines, new roads, suburban tracts, any project which the speculator might present, found ready investors, and thus the destruction of the United States Bank led directly to the panic of 1837.

"The usual causes which have produced so many and almost periodical monetary depressions in our history played their part in the panic of 1837, and prominent among them were speculation, undue extension of credits, unproductive investments and large, unwarranted expenditures.

"It should also be mentioned that an element of disturbance was projected into the financial situation in 1834 when an act of Congress changed the relative values of gold and silver from fifteen to one to sixteen to one in order to promote the circulation of gold. Besides all this the financial stringency in England, France, Belgium and over the continent of Europe generally tended to aggravate the situation in the United States.

"The distribution of public funds to pet banks caused those institutions to encourage customers to borrow money. This led to speculation in all kinds of projects, the most important of which was Western lands. These lands were purchased by speculators, paid for in notes, sold at an advance to another speculator and again paid for in notes; the operations to be repeated over and over as the boom in values progressed. Labor was drawn from productive to unproductive work; men rich in bonds, soon to be worthless, accumulated debts beyond all reason.

"This speculation in public lands swiftly grew to enormous proportions. In 1829 the sale of public lands amounted to a little over $1,500,000. In 1830 it was $2,300,000; in 1832 $2,600,000; in 1833 $3,900,000; in 1834 $4,800,000; in 1835 $14,757,000; in 1836 $24,877,000. In 1836 President Jackson determined to check the wild speculation which had developed all over the land. To do so he issued an order that the land offices should receive nothing but gold and silver or certificates of deposit in specie in the United States Treasury in payment for land. The law at that time was that all except actual settlers should pay for land in gold or silver, but the law was not maintained. In that year the Government deposits with the 'pet banks' had reached the sum of $41,500,000. As soon as Jackson issued his specie circular Congress ordered the money in the banks to be distributed among the several States in proportion to the number of Presidential electors to which each State was entitled, the money to be used for internal improvements. Now the banks had looked upon this money as a permanent deposit and had loaned it to customers. With vaults full of paper securities, how could they pay in gold? The gold had disappeared and in its place was paper, which, when the crisis came, nobody would take. The order of Congress therefore embarrassed the banks, crippled the speculators, withdrew money from circulation and precipitated the terrible financial calamity of 1837.

"The specie circular tied up the public; the distribution of the Treasury surplus to the States tied up the banks. Loans had to be called in and accommodations to business men were greatly restricted. In March, 1837, England began to look to America for remittances of specie through bills on American houses. American houses were not able to pay their bills in specie, and from April 1 to April 10 more than one hundred failures occurred in New York City. Before the end of April the failures were too numerous to be recorded. From the metropolis the commercial paralysis spread all over the country.

"It then became apparent that to survey the wilderness did not convert it into farms nor would plating farms build cities. The spirit of speculation had produced in the public mind a state of enchantment like that of the poet, Bryant, when he wrote 'The Prairie.' Standing upon an uninhabited tract his fancy ran riot until he not only saw cultivated fields and populous cities, but heard the voices of people yet to be. When he became hungry he went back to dinner. So it was with the people of this country in 1837. They were rich on paper and in prospects yet to be realized. When they had to have three meals a day, wear clothes and pay notes at the bank they found it necessary to get back to cold facts. The only facts which were of any use when disaster came were gold and silver. These could be obtained only by earning them, and as that would take time the disaster could not be averted. That wild speculation in land was a large contributing cause to the panic is plainly indicated by the fact that in 1842 sales of land had fallen to less than one and a half million dollars from twenty-five millions in 1836.

"President Van Buren was importuned to have the Government interfere between the speculators and disaster; to have the Government identify itself with commerce, in fact. This the President refused to do. What he did do was call a special session of Congress which convened in September, 1837, and to which he sent a message which deserves to be ranked as one of the greatest state papers in America. In that message he proposed the establishment of a sub-treasury system such as exists today. Congress, however, refused to pass his sub-treasury bill. It did pass the Senate by a vote of 26 to 20, but was defeated in the House. His great idea was to receive recognition later on, however.

"In his message to the extra session of Congress President Van Buren pointed out that the Government had not caused and could not cure the profound commercial disaster; that all banks had stopped specie payments and that therefore some other custody of public moneys must be provided; that the Government could not help the people to earn their living but it could refuse to aid the deception that paper was gold and the delusion that values could be created without labor. In the face of a storm of abuse he took a firm and magnificent stand, but his statesmanship on that occasion did him no good, but rather harm. The country was in distress and looked to him for aid which he was unable to give, and with that unreason inseparable from a panic of any kind he was held responsible for all trouble and became the object of unsparing denunciation."

Conditions in the country at large, so lucidly and intelligently described in the foregoing review, were supplemented and aggravated by the then existing conditions in Indiana. The influx of population represented a class of people who sought to better themselves by utilizing the boundless opportunities here presented, especially in agricultural pursuits. Fertile land in abundance was to be had for a mere pittance, as compared with prices in the more extensively settled regions of the East and South. Many of those who came from the South were hostile to slavery. Scant means did not admit of acquiring plantations in States like Virginia. Their pride did not permit them to work among slaves. As well stated by Logan Esarey in his "Internal Improvements in Indiana": "One can scarcely realize the condition of Indiana in 1825. There was no railroad, no canal, no pike. All her rivers except the Ohio were obstructed by fallen trees, ripples and bars. Two stage lines led to Indianapolis, one from Madison, the other from Centerville. The service was bad, roads frequently impassable, and stages usually late."

Transportation was the great problem calling for solution. In the parlance of the day, it was the paramount issue—the momentous question affecting every inhabitant of the State. Wheat and corn in abundance could be produced, but by reason of inadequate transportation facilities there was no profit in raising grain that cost three times as much to haul to Cincinnati as the farmer realized therefrom in disposing of it to the local dealer.

Need any one wonder that the tillers of the soil chafed under these conditions and that they lent a listening ear to every scheme that gave any sort of promise of relief?

Human nature in those days was not much different from what it is today. The life of a pioneer settler in Indiana was far from an easy one. Hardship was in evidence wherever one's eye might be turned. Relief could come from one source only—transportation facilities. Immature thought was the great stumbling block to a realization of this blessing. Had the power of organized effort been invoked; had patience been cultivated and impetuosity curbed; had feasibility been made paramount to plausibility; had wisdom and practicability been insisted upon before plunging heedlessly into this or that scheme—in short, had good, strong, common sense been injected into the movement for the inauguration of internal improvements from the very start and rigidly adhered to as the work progressed, a mountain-high debt would not have been piled up and bankruptcy would not have discredited and dishonored the State.

It would be well if every thoughtful citizen of the State could be induced to procure a copy of Logan Esarey's history of "Internal Improvements of Indiana" and give the same studious perusal. It is not a tiresome presentation of the subject elaborated and discussed, but a very readable and highly instructive contribution to the historic literature of Indiana. The facts therein set forth ought to be brought to the knowledge of every man and woman who cares to be enlightened with reference to the trials and tribulations that were encountered by Indiana's pioneers during the formative period, 1826 to 1840.

The lesson which the internal improvement mania teaches is that a too ready response to and compliance with popular clamor more often entails injury than it confers benefits. That famous, courageous and fearless journalist, Horace Greeley, once upon a time declared that it was his purpose to give to the readers of his New York Tribune "not so much what they would like to read as what they ought to know." Had there been a combination of influential, practical men resolved upon first ascertaining what the State needed and ought to have been supplied with in the line of transportation facilities, it is not improbable that a carefully worked-out plan might have been adopted by the State and put into practical use and operation. Of course, the fact must not be lost sight of that local jealousies were certain to be encountered. That bane of society is not easily repressed. Every locality thinks its claims should be first considered and its wants first supplied. If politicians, legislators, statesmen and public journals could be brought to the understanding that the common welfare should have first consideration, the spirit of jealousy and envy might more easily be held in subjection. A striking illustration of this truism was furnished in the adjoining State of Illinois where that superb statesman, Stephen A. Douglas, exerted a most beneficent influence by devising sundry safeguards in granting franchises to railroads and other corporations. He foresaw probabilities that came to a realization during his life-time and that in course of time brought millions upon millions of dollars into the State treasury, thus conferring a direct benefit upon the taxpayers of Illinois without imposing any real hardships upon the corporations as they developed, grew and prospered as a result of the steady increase of population engendered by the creation and operation of transportation lines for the convenience, comfort and advancement of a thrifty people.

Leadership, properly, wisely and unselfishly applied, rarely fails to produce results that prove beneficial and advantageous to the community, the State or the nation at large. However vehemently leadership may be decried by demagogues who delight in tickling the vanity of what they assume to constitute "the people," it is an incontrovertible truth that sound, safe, wise and sagacious leadership has ever proved a benefit and a blessing to communities that had the good sense to accept and utilize the same. Under a representative system of government leadership is as essential as is the direction of forces in the construction of buildings, bridges, highways, etc. To lead, guide and direct is but another form of expression for bringing order out of chaos. Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Jackson, Lincoln, Douglas, Tilden, Thurman and Hendricks were, in their day and generation, leaders of men, and the people profited by heeding their counsel and giving emphasis to their views by causing them to be enacted into law.

In his history of the Ohio Democracy, General Thomas E. Powell expresses the opinion that "It is doubtful if in any American campaign any political party has used so much buncombe and so little brains as did the Whigs in the presidential campaign of 1840. Yet they won. On the Whigs' side it was a popular rush to a circus where the admission was free and all who attended could take part in the festive performance. Enormous political meetings were held and these were attended not by men alone but by entire families; fathers, mothers, sons and daughters all turned out. There were Revolutionary soldiers marching in procession; there were bands of music and there were barrels of cider; there was speech making and festivity, and for a sideshow there was a log cabin with the lathstring hanging out and a live coon inside. The log cabin and the coon traveled by wagon from place to place and the barrels of cider were supplied by the communities. The voice of the spellbinder was heard in the land; there was so much enthusiasm that there was no time for thought. It was the proletariat running loose in a bloodless raid.

"Many causes have been assigned for the political revolution of 1839-40 which swept Democrats out of power in the State and nation and placed the young Whig party in the ascendancy. Van Buren's espousal of an independent treaty would, at the first glance, seem to be the rock upon which he foundered. This would imply that in 1840 the majority of the people of the United States preferred the national bank to the sub-treasury system. In preparing its platform the Whig party was very careful to avoid a declaration on that point; nevertheless it undid the work done by Van Buren toward the establishment of an independent treasury system. During the campaign Van Buren was assailed for his sub-treasury plan and no doubt many imagined they could trace the troubles of 1837 to the destruction of the United States Bank, and consequently entertained the belief that a return to the old order of things would be wise. Yet the Whigs as well as the Democrats condemned the 'pet bank' system. It is therefore improbable that his advocacy of the sub-treasury system was the cause of Van Buren's defeat. The fact is he was held responsible for both the real and imaginary errors of President Jackson. Also he had been President during a great commercial crisis and the people, not only of that day but of this, have a strange habit of laying all their commercial troubles at the door of the White House.

"Times had been bad during most of Van Buren's regime and the general cry was for a change. Things might be better, they could not well be worse, or so the people apparently thought. That the commercial troubles which occurred during Van Buren's administration and the consequent desire for a change led to the defeat of himself and his party is made absolutely clear by the speeches of Daniel Webster during that campaign. Like all politicians the great Webster was afflicted with a political bias. He must have known that Van Buren's attitude during the recent troublous times had been grand; and if he had possessed to any degree the foresight with which statesmen are usually credited or the intellect for which he was renowned, he must have seen that the sub-treasury system would prove vastly superior to the national bank. Indeed, it is to be presumed that he did see and understand these things, for in his speeches he studiously avoided logic and regaled his audiences with dogmas and eloquence. Everywhere he went he cried out to his hearers:

“Every breeze says change; the cry, the universal cry is for change.’ Change was the keynote of his oratory and change became the watchword of his party throughout that memorable election. It was the only argument they had, but it won.”

THE UNIQUE CAMPAIGN OF 1840

LOG CABIN, COON SKINS, HARD CIDER, TIPPECANOE AND TYLER TOO

THE "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" campaign was both unique and grotesque. It stands without a parallel in the annals of American politics. In Ohio and Indiana the enthusiasm for William Henry Harrison was doubtless intensified by the fact that he was "one of them"—both Ohioan and Indianian. Log cabins were built and exultantly carried in spectacular processions. Coon skins were displayed on poles, and barrels of hard cider were dispensed to thirsty ones at the big rallies, political gatherings, picnics, etc. It was a great time for the exuberant and the emotional. From the very beginning of the campaign it had become apparent that victory was in store for the Whigs. Martin Van Buren, the elegant and accomplished New York gentleman, was at a discount with the sturdy Westerners, who recognized in William Henry Harrison one after their own heart. At the November election Van Buren carried but two Northern States—Illinois and New Hampshire—and only five States in the South. The result in Illinois was chiefly due to the tremendous effort put forth by the idolized "Little Giant," Stephen A. Douglas. As a matter of fact it was more of a triumph for Douglas than a victory for Van Buren. In the Electoral College Harrison had 234 votes, Van Buren 60, but the popular vote shows no such disparity in strength as might be inferred from these figures. On the popular vote Harrison had 1,275,017; Van Buren, 1,128,702. Notwithstanding the fact that Van Buren suffered a crushing defeat in 1840, his vote in that losing contest was 350,000 greater than he polled four years before when he was triumphantly elected as the successor of "Old Hickory."

General Powell is quite correct in saying that "the Whig Party gained little, if anything, by the victory of 1840. President Harrison died April 4, 1841, after being President but one month. By his death the Whigs lost the substantial fruits of their victory. The utterly incongruous elements that had been held together during the campaign of 1840 by discontent and wild, unthinking enthusiasm began speedily to fall apart. Tyler had never concealed his Democratic views of government, and, as President, he made no pretense of carrying out Whig doctrines. When Congress passed a bill to establish a National Bank he promptly vetoed it and in no way exerted himself to promote Whig legislation. Indeed, he allied himself with the Democrats so openly that he did not hesitate to express a desire for the Democratic nomination for President in 1844."

INDIANA'S PART IN THE CAMPAIGN OF 1840.

Activity in this exciting campaign began early. On the historic eighth of January the Democrats held a largely attended, enthusiastic convention. The intensely partisan semi-weekly Indiana Journal called it the "Office-holders' Convention." Sneeringly the charge was set forth that it was composed of 209 office-holders, bank directors, lawyers, etc., and 102 of other occupations, being two-thirds officeholders and one-third farmers and mechanics. Unctious emphasis was given by that paper to the statement that the Harrison convention, held on the 16th of January, was composed of 413 farmers and mechanics, and 208 officeholders, bank directors, lawyers, etc., making it two-thirds farmers and mechanics and one-third officeholders—just the reverse of the Van Buren convention. The nature of this criticism serves as an illustration of the campaign fodder which in those days was made to do service for the purpose of warping the intellect of the yeomanry.

The general management of the Democratic campaign had been largely intrusted to such staunch party men as N. B. Palmer, Treasurer of State; W. J. Brown, Secretary of State, and J. L. Ketcham, lawyer. As speakers the Democrats had on the stump such men as General Tilghman A. Howard, U. S. Senator Edward Hannegan, James Whitcomb, Marinus Willett, Finley Bigger, Amos Lane, Thomas Smith, Robert Dale Owen, John Law, Joseph A. Wright, John G. Davis, Paris C. Dunning, Delaney Eckels, Alvin P. Hovey, Andrew Kennedy, John Spencer, Elisha Long, Nathaniel West, General Drake, John Carr, William W. Wick, James Brown Ray, Joseph Holman and Ross Smiley.

The principal speakers on the Whig side were Joseph G. Marshall, O. H. Smith, George Dunn, Albert S. White, William Herod, Caleb Smith, Richard W. Thompson, Henry S. Lane, Newton Claypool, Samuel C. Sample, John Liston, Thomas J. Evans, Schuyler Colfax, John Vawter, Milton Stapp, John Dumont, Jeremiah Sullivan, Joseph C. Eggleston, William G. Ewing, James H. Cravens, Jonathan McCarty, John Ewing, George H. Dunn, Samuel Judah, Randall Crawford, Thomas H. Blake, Elisha Huntington, Judge De Bruler, Charles Dewey and Conrad Baker.

In both these lists will be found the names of a number of gentlemen who later on became quite conspicuous in the councils of the State and nation. Cabinet officers, U. S. Senators, Governors, Congressmen and other distinguished officials will be found liberally represented among those who made the welkin ring during that memorable campaign.

As stated by Historian Smith, "For near six weeks these men went up and down the State. Joint debates were the order of the day. Barbecues, torchlight parades and rallies varied the program. It is estimated that forty thousand people gathered at one time on the Tippecanoe battleground. The campaign closed with a monster parade in Indianapolis the night before the election. Mr. Whitcomb was to speak on the North Side and Senator O. H. Smith on the South Side. After waiting till midnight for the noise to subside, the two speakers left the stands."

Throughout the campaign much virulence was injected into the discussions. Even a gentleman so amiable and courteous as Senator William Hendricks did not escape ill-natured attack. Because of his conciliatory course during the heated United States Bank controversy he was spoken of as "being on all sides and never long."

At the August election for choosing a Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, the only State officers elected by the people under the old constitution, Samuel Bigger received 62,678 votes and Tilghman A. Howard, 54,083. The vote for Lieutenant-Governor stood: Samuel Hall, Whig, 62,612; S. S. Tuley, Democrat, 53,388.

At the presidential election in November the vote of Indiana stood: William Henry Harrison, Whig, 65,302; Martin Van Buren, Democrat, 51,695; Harrison's majority, 13,607.

It will be observed that the total vote for Governor was 116,761, while the total vote for President reached 116,997. Yet Harrison's majority exceeded that of Bigger, 5,012. So, after all, the result in Indiana could hardly be properly called a landslide.

The Harrison electors for Indiana were:

David Turpie, a student of tender years at that time, attended the Tippecanoe barbecue. He says it was an immense affair. It lasted three days. He places the number of persons participating at 20,000, just half of Smith's estimate. However, a difference in estimates of crowds is not usually taken seriously from either a mathematical or ethical point of view.

Judge Turpie speaks thus of the great meeting: "Several stands were erected for speaking, printed bills gave the names of the speakers and announced the hour of meeting, and many bands of music played during the intervals. Eminent statesmen of the Whig party from different parts of the country spoke on this occasion, but the star speaker and guest was Mr. James Brooks of the city of New York. Mr. Brooks was the editor of the New York Evening Express, at that time the leading Whig newspaper in the East. He had been long a friend and admirer of Mr. Clay and had earnestly supported his candidacy for the Presidency; his presence at this great assemblage was understood to signify that the distinguished Kentuckian would give his aid to the cause of General Harrison."

It may be stated in this connection that both Henry Clay and Daniel Webster considered themselves more entitled to the Presidential nomination in 1840 than William Henry Harrison. Both felt that 1840 was the psychological moment to vitalize a Whig nomination into a Presidential reality. Fate had decreed otherwise, as in many other cases. In political life there are indeed many disappointments.

EX-PRESIDENT VAN BUREN VISITS INDIANA.

In a neatly gotten up booklet entitled "The Rooster," issued by John F. Mitchell of the Hancock Democrat, is given a somewhat amusing account of a visit made to Indiana by former President Martin Van Buren. As related by Mr. Mitchell, the ex-President made a tour of the West, in 1843, following the route of the National or Cumberland road, which is the main thoroughfare in Greenfield. His visit to Greenfield was a great occasion and the Democrats made extensive preparations for his entertainment. The journey from the East was made by stage, and almost all of the stage drivers were Whigs.

During President Van Buren's administration he had vetoed a bill for an appropriation for the improvement of the National road. The West was greatly displeased at this action, for the road in many places was almost impassable. The stage drivers had planned to give the ex-President an opportunity to count the mud holes along the road. Near Greenfield there was a steep hill and, at a signal, the driver pulled his horses to the side and the famous traveler was thrown into the mud. When Mr. Van Buren arrived in Greenfield he was in a deplorable condition and new clothes had to be provided.

Later in the day a public reception was held in the front room of the Chapman tavern. Mr. Joseph Chapman took great pleasure in introducing his young son, Martin Van Buren Chapman, to the ex-President. This same Martin Van Buren Chapman later became a teacher in the Greenfield Academy and is responsible for a large portion of the early training of Indiana's favorite poet, Mr. James Whitcomb Riley, who was his pupil.

In the same booklet is given an extended account of the origin of the famous shibboleth, "Crow, Chapman, crow!" There lived in those days in Hancock county an ardent Democrat named Joseph Chapman. Political discussions, then quite frequent and spirited, were freely participated in by this champion of Democracy. He served as a member of the Legislature and was highly respected. During the campaign of 1840 quite a number of Democrats declared themselves for Harrison. Reports of this disaffection reached the city of Indianapolis and prompted the Democratic postmaster of that town to write a letter of encouragement to Mr. Chapman. In this letter its recipient was laconically urged to "Crow, Chapman, crow!"—that is to say, in the vernacular of the day, to keep a stiff upper lip, or to present a bold front. This letter, it seems, was stolen and published by some unscrupulous Whig. By reason of the reference to numerous alleged accessions to the camp of the Harrisonites, much ado was made over the affair—much more than its importance seems to have merited. The commonly accepted version was that Mr. Chapman had acquired quite a reputation as an imitator of a rooster crowing. This was afterward denied as wholly unfounded. However, out of the story grew the propensity for identifying the rooster with Democratic exultation. For a long time "Crow, Chapman, crow!" served excellently in the columns of Democratic publications to herald something of a cheering character politically. At any rate, in due time the rooster became the Democratic emblem in Indiana, and is still so.

In the days of Jackson the Democratic emblem was a hickory pole and broom. In after years a live or stuffed rooster was considered quite the thing in Democratic processions. Both emblems answered a purpose and afforded much delight to those who are fond of injecting something spectacular into a political campaign.

POLITICAL REACTION SOON SET IN.

DEMOCRATIC SENATOR IN 1842; DEMOCRATIC GOVERNOR IN 1843.

It did not take long for a political reaction to set in after the landslide of 1840, and after the death of President Harrison and the not wholly unexpected defection of the Virginian who advanced from the second to the first place in the new administration. The nomination by the Whigs of John Tyler to the Vice-Presidency and his subsequent election in November was an expediency procedure, prompted by a desire to bring to the Whig standard the various elements of opposition to the Van Buren administration. Tyler was something of a free lance in politics, though for years closely allied with Henry Clay. Political shifts were easily made in those days, and Tyler did not regard himself inseparably tied to the party that had elevated him to the second highest office in the gift of the Nation. He considered himself privileged to follow his personal views and convictions rather than being obliged to adjust himself to the program mapped out by the party leaders who had deemed it "good politics" to place him on their ticket and to clothe him with the habiliments of high office. When his determination to pursue this course became generally known the usual cry of "traitor" was raised in chagrined and distressed Whig circles throughout the land. Maledictions were hurled at him right and left. Crimination and recrimination followed in profusion. The more vehement the accusations the wider the breach. Reconciliation had been rendered impossible. Estrangement had become so complete as to have been rendered irreparable. Toward the last year of the Tyler administration flirtation with Democratic leaders had been so marked as to justify the conclusion that it amounted to an invitation to tender John Tyler the Democratic nomination for the Presidency in 1844. Needless to add that the hint was not taken. When the convention met at Baltimore to nominate a Presidential ticket a large number of Federal office-holders were on hand to urge his nomination. Receiving no encouragement, they held a sort of rump convention of their own and formally nominated Tyler for the Presidency without naming a running mate. The performance was too grotesque to be seriously regarded, so some weeks after this nominee issued a rancorous letter formally taking himself out of the running.

At the State election in 1842 the leading question before the people of Indiana was who should be chosen by the Legislature to represent this commonwealth in the Senate of the United States. The Democratic favorite for this position was General Tilghman A. Howard, who two years before had met with defeat in his race for the Governorship. The choice of the Whigs was Senator Oliver H. Smith, who aspired to re-election. The race was an exceedingly close one, as already set forth in a preceding chapter, and resulted in the entrance of a "dark horse" in the person of Edward A. Hannegan and his election upon the withdrawal of General Howard, who had come within two votes of the coveted prize, but who had become convinced that the cards were staked against him on account of his refusal to promise certain offices to several mercenary members of the Legislature.

Mr. Hannegan was a remarkably brilliant man, somewhat erratic, but able, courageous, yea, fearless. His habits were decidedly convivial. He was a native of Ohio; attended the public schools; studied law; was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Covington, Ind.; served several terms in the Legislature; was elected as a Democrat to the 23rd and 24th Congresses (March 4, 1833, to March 4, 1837); defeated for re-election, but in 1842 elected to the United States Senate for a full term of six years. Toward the close of the Polk administration he was appointed Minister to Prussia, serving from March 22, 1849, to January 13, 1850, when he was recalled on account of his temperamental incompatibility with diplomatic discreetness and disregard of diplomatic usages. Upon his return to Indiana he became involved in some serious imbroglios that impelled him to move to St. Louis, Mo., where he died, February 25, 1859. Intemperance marred an otherwise brilliant career. It proved to be an unconquerable foe.

The plight into which the State had been brought by the several Whig administrations in inaugurating a stupendously impracticable, ill-considered and enormously expensive internal improvement scheme admonished the Democrats of Indiana to cast about, in 1843, for a man for Governor whose ability and integrity gave promise of bringing order out of chaos, restoring the commonwealth's shattered credit and affording relief to the sorely burdened taxpayers. They had selected such a man three years before, but the coon skin, log cabin and hard cider phantasy blinded the people to their real interests and impelled them to defeat Tilghman A. Howard. The Indiana Democracy had within their ranks another man of equal sterling qualities and high attainments who could be depended on, in case of his election, to bring about a more satisfactory and assuring condition of affairs. The man believed to be equal to the emergency was James Whitcomb—upright citizen, rigid economist, talented lawyer, wise legislator, and patriotic statesman. His nomination at once met with hearty approval and with final ratification at the polls.

Mr. Whitcomb was a native of Vermont, but was reared on a farm near Cincinnati. As a lad he displayed an extraordinary fondness for the study of literature and the acquirement of knowledge. So persevering was he in his studies that he soon fitted himself for college. In due time he graduated from Transylvania University. Having qualified himself for the law, he was, in March, 1822, admitted to the Fayette county bar in Kentucky. Two years later he located in Bloomington, Ind., and soon won his way to a lucrative practice. In 1826 he was, by Governor James Brown Ray, appointed Prosecuting Attorney of his circuit. Recognition of his ability led to his election to the State Senate in 1830, and to his re-election three years later. He took a conspicuous part in the attempt to safeguard the State against the internal improvement mania, but found himself unable to stem the tide. In 1836 President Jackson appointed him Commissioner of the General Land Office, which position he filled ably and acceptably to the end of the Van Buren administration. Early in 1841 Mr. Whitcomb returned to Indiana, locating in Terre Haute, where he soon commanded a large and lucrative practice.

His campaign for the Governorship was masterly and productive of splendid results. His competitor was Governor Samuel Bigger, who three years before was triumphantly elected to that office. Whitcomb defeated Bigger by 2,069 votes. Jesse D. Bright was the Democratic nominee for Lieutenant-Governor and elected by a plurality of 4,301.

The total vote for Governor at the 1843 election was 121,135. Of these James Whitcomb had 60,787, Samuel Bigger 58,718, Elizur Deming 1,630.

For Lieutenant-Governor, Jesse D. Bright had 60,982, John H. Bradley 56,681, Stephen S. Harding 1,687.

There is but little doubt that the Methodist church of Indiana contributed largely to the defeat of Governor Bigger and the election of Mr. Whitcomb. The latter was for years a Methodist class-leader and stood deservedly high in the church. During the campaign the charge was made that in opposing some legislation which resulted in the establishment of Asbury University (now DePauw), Governor Bigger had said the Methodist church did not need an educated clergy; that an ignorant one was better suited to the capacity of its membership. Bishop Ames, referring to this episode, said in 1846: "It was the Amen corner of the Methodist church that defeated Governor Bigger, and I had a hand in the work." Bigger was for years a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church. He was an accomplished musician and an artist in handling the violin. So was Governor Whitcomb.

So acceptable was the first administration of Governor Whitcomb that he was honored with a triumphant re-election in 1846, defeating his Whig competitor, Joseph G. Marshall, by a majority of 3,958. And Marshall was one of the strongest and most popular men in the State. Paris C. Dunning, a most estimable and excellent man, was Whitcomb's running mate in this contest and triumphantly elected.

In its issue of January 13, 1846, the Indianapolis Sentinel gave the Whitcomb-Dunning ticket this ringing endorsement:

"The State conventions of two great parties have both been held and candidates for the two principal executive offices have been nominated. If we may anticipate the end of the beginning, we may be sure of an easy victory. The Democratic convention was one of the most enthusiastic, the Whig convention the most depressed, that it has been our good fortune to behold. Whitcomb was nominated for re-election by acclamation without a single dissenting voice. The Whigs, full of doubt and fears, finally agreed to Mr. Marshall, because such men as O. H. Smith and ex-Governor Bigger would not submit to the odium which the certain defeat of the Whig party would have inflicted upon them. For it is the custom with the Whig party always to attribute their reverses to the unpopularity or unfitness of their candidates. We well recollect the sneering cut which the Journal gave these leaders of its party for their refusal, imputing it due to selfishness and cowardice. But we think they only gave evidence of superior wisdom in thus refusing to be sacrificed.

"The coming contest we think will be a cool one. The people will calmly investigate the course of Governor Whitcomb's administration and decide accordingly. It is in view of this investigation and decision that we make the positive prediction of success to our party in August. We know that Governor Whitcomb has administered our affairs as prudently, honestly and successfully as perhaps any other man in the country could have done. In the face of the greatest obstacles he has done much good, and, so far as we have knowledge, no harm. This is saying a great deal, if the weight which we intend them to imply is given to our words. The people never did desert a faithful servant and will not now.

"Paris C. Dunning, of Monroe county, who was nominated as the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant-Governor, is a gentleman of much talent and energy of character. He did good service as a Polk elector during the last canvass. He is far the superior of Mr. Orth, the young gentleman nominated by the Whigs for the same office. Mr. Dunning will make himself known to the people before the August election."

The Sentinel had evidently read the signs of the times correctly. Its prediction that Whitcomb and Dunning would surely be triumphantly elected was verified to the very letter by the majesty of the ballot.

Quoting the language of W. W. Woollen:

"Governor Whitcomb filled the executive chair during an eventful period of the State's history. He entered the office with the State loaded down with debt, upon which no interest had been paid for years; he left it with the debt adjusted and the State's credit restored. He smote the rock of national resources, and abundant streams of revenue burst forth;

he touched the dead corpse of public credit, and it sprang upon its feet.' It was at his suggestion and on his recommendation that the Butler bill was passed, whereby one-half the State's debt was paid by a transfer of the Wabash and Erie canal, and the other half arranged for by the issuance of bonds drawing a low rate of interest. The settlement was alike satisfactory to the bondholders and the people, and in Governor Whitcomb's own words, restored 'the tarnished escutcheon of Indiana to its original brightness.' Had he done nothing else, he would deserve the gratitude of all, but this was only one of the many things he did for the good of the people and the honor of the State. It was by his efforts that a public sentiment was created which demanded the establishment of our benevolent and reformatory institutions, and he it was who awakened the people of Indiana to the importance of establishing common schools and providing a fund for their maintenance. It was while he was Governor that the Mexican war broke out, and Indiana was called upon for soldiers to assist in 'conquering a peace.' Five regiments of infantry were organized and mustered into the service under his direction, and the ease and rapidity with which it was done proved him as able in organization as in finance.

"The Legislature of 1849 elected Governor Whitcomb to the Senate of the United States for the term commencing in March of that year. He was qualified by talent, by education and by experience for the place, and he would have added luster to a name already great by his service there had his health been good and he permitted to serve out his term. But disease had fastened itself upon him, and therefore he was unable to discharge his Senatorial duties as he otherwise would have done. He often left the capital in quest of health, but he found it not. His disease (gravel) was painful in the extreme, but he bore it with Christian fortitude. He died at New York, October 4, 1852, away from the State whose representative he was. His remains were conveyed to Indianapolis and buried in Greenlawn Cemetery, where they have mouldered to dust. The State erected a monument to his memory, and it still stands to point out the spot where lies all that is mortal of one whose influence upon public sentiment is felt even at the present day."

Shortly before James Whitcomb was nominated for Governor he had written a pamphlet in opposition to the high protective tariff idea. Upon the publication and circulation thereof encomiums were fairly showered on its author. It was pronounced the ablest argument on the subject discussed that had yet been put into print. It was widely circulated. In 1882 the Indianapolis Sentinel, by special request, reprinted the document, accompanying it with profuse yet merited laudation.

That there has been no overstatement in any of the tributes to this remarkable man will be made apparent by the reproduction of an extract from one of Thomas A. Hendricks' eloquent addresses, delivered in April, 1882, at Indianapolis:

"Governor Whitcomb was a great scholar. He was capable not only of acquiring but of using the accumulations of learning. With him learning became an influence, an instrumentality, a power. His tastes were cultivated. He commanded beautiful and strong language, and in it he clothed his thoughts, that were always appropriate to the subject and the occasion. I heard him address the people in his first candidacy for Governor. It was the greatest political speech I have ever heard. There was not in it a vulgarity or an appeal to low sentiment. He addressed reason, emotion, sympathy. The multitude stood enraptured. As men went from the place of meeting they fell into grave and serious conversation about what they had heard, and the impression remained. From that day he was a leader, but not as men commonly speak of leadership; he maneuvered for no combinations; he was a leader in a higher sense. He declared what he believed to be the truth and trusted to its influence upon men's minds to bring them into common action. He led legislators because it was safest for them to follow. His manner was grave and serious, his voice was full and musical and his delivery almost without gesture. I never heard him in court, but am sure he was a formidable antagonist before either court or jury."

Mr. Woollen is authority for the statement that "Governor Whitcomb was an active Freemason. He was the first man knighted in Indiana, the honor being conferred upon him May 20, 1848. Raper Commandery was organized in his house, and for some time held its meetings there. He was proud of his connections with Masonry; in his affections Masonry stood only second to his church."

During the third year of his occupancy of the gubernatorial chair, March 24, 1846, Mr. Whitcomb was married to Mrs. Martha Ann Hurst. She died July 17, 1847, shortly after giving birth to a daughter, who in later years became the wife of Claude Matthews, Secretary of State from 1891 to 1893, and Governor of Indiana from 1893 to 1897. Governor Whitcomb recorded his adored wife's death in the family Bible, following the record with these much-meaning words: "How brief our happy sojourn together."

PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN OF 1844

POLITICAL PENDULUM EASILY SWAYS IN THE OTHER DIRECTION

THE victory won in 1843 under the leadership of Whitcomb and Dunning had an inspiring effect on the Indiana Democracy. It awakened confidence in their ability to carry the State for Polk and Dallas at the November election, and to aid to the extent of twelve electoral votes in again placing the country under Democratic control. Assembling in convention at Indianapolis in the month of June, they selected an electoral ticket composed of some of the best and most prominent Democrats in the State. For electors at large they chose Dr. Graham N. Fitch, of Logansport, and James G. Read, of Jeffersonville. For District Electors they named:

District

1. William A. Bowles, Orange county.
2. Elijah Newland, Washington.
3. John M. Johnson, Franklin.
4. Samuel E. Perkins, Wayne.

A ringing declaration of "Democratic Principles and Measures" was promulgated in this form:

A simple and frugal Government confined within strict constitutional limits.

A strict construction of the Constitution and no assumption of doubtful powers.

No national bank to swindle the laboring population.

No connection between the Government and banks.

A diplomacy asking for nothing but what is clearly right and submitting to nothing wrong.

No public debt either by the general Government or by the States, except for objects of urgent necessity.

No assumption by the general Government of the debts of the States, either directly or indirectly, by the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

A revenue tariff discriminating in favor of the poor consumer instead of the rich capitalist.

No extensive system of internal improvement by the general Government or by the States.

A Constitutional barrier against improvident State loans.

The honest payment of our debts and the sacred preservation of the public faith.

A gradual return from the paper credit system.

No grants of exclusive charters and privileges by special legislation to banks.

No connection between church and State.

No proscription for honest opinions.

Fostering aid to public education.

A "progressive" reformation of all abuses.

In Indiana, as in other States, the campaign of 1844 became one of intense bitterness. A good deal of personal abuse was injected into it. The apostacy of Tyler had greatly embittered the Whigs. Even the death of President Harrison, officially declared to have been due to an attack of bilious pleurisy, but by others asserted to have been brought about by exhaustive worry over the intense pressure for recognition by importunate office-seekers, constituted no insignificant part of the campaign. Democrats, though tacitly approving the attitude of Tyler on the "burning issues" of the day, did not deem it incumbent on themselves to champion or applaud the course of that public functionary. When the Whigs, in their rage, denounced Tyler as "the corrupt, foresworn, perfidious, mocking image of executive rule at Washington," Democrats were content with the rejoinder that Tyler was placed in power by the Whigs and that the Democrats were in no sense responsible for his official creation. This was considered a "knock-down argument" that afforded no comfort to the Whigs. A new political epithet was introduced. It had originated in New York, where a factional Democratic meeting terminated in a row and a rumpus between "Equal Rights men" and the "Hunkers." During the fracas the gas was turned out by connivance. The Equal Rights men were so determined to continue the meeting that they lit what were then called loco foco matches and continued the proceedings with that sort of scant illumination. The novelty of the thing was so engaging that it received widespread publicity, and in due course of time the term Loco Foco was applied to Democrats in general. As a political nickname it did service up to 1858. It was no longer heard of after that.

The Democratic speakers in Indiana made effective use of both State and national issues. They presented strong arguments. Responsive audiences inspired the campaign managers with high confidence in the outcome. And they were not disappointed. A count of the votes cast at the November election showed this result:

|---------------------------------|--------|
| James K. Polk, Democrat..... | 70,181 |
| Henry Clay, Whig..... | 67,867 |
| James G. Birney, Abolitionist.. | 2,106 |

What pleased the Democrats particularly was that Polk carried the State by a majority over both the Whig and the Abolitionist candidates. There was no sort of indebtedness due the third party for "favors rendered" in running a candidate of their own.

The situation was quite different in some of the Eastern States, as will appear from the following extracts from A. K. McClure's book entitled "Our Presidents":

"Mr. Clay enjoyed a much larger measure of personal popularity than any other man in the Nation, and he was universally accepted as the most gifted political orator of his day. He was to the Whigs of that time what Blaine was to the Republicans during his several unsuccessful battles for the Presidency. It is a notable fact in political history that no pre-eminent political orator ever succeeded in reaching the Presidency. Garfield was the nearest approach to it, but he was a contemporary of Blaine, and Blaine far outstripped him either on the hustings or in parliamentary debate. Clay had entered both the House and Senate when little more than eligible by age, and he was admittedly the most accomplished presiding officer the House ever had. He was the Commoner of the war of 1812, and rendered most conspicuous service to his country. His speeches in the House did more than the persuasion of any other dozen men to force the young Republic into a second contest with England on the right of search on the high seas. He was always strong in argument, was often impassioned and superbly eloquent, and in every great emergency of the country during the first half of the present century he was the pacificator. President Madison was most reluctant to declare war against England, and he yielded to it only when it became a supreme necessity to obey the general demand of the country for an appeal to arms.

"When Clay was nominated for President in 1844, it was generally believed that he would have an easy victory over Van Buren, and when Polk, of Tennessee, was made the compromise candidate against him, the Whigs at first believed that the nomination of a comparatively obscure man against the great chieftain of the Whigs would give them a walkover. The campaign had made little progress, however, until the Whigs discovered that the Democrats were going to be thoroughly united on Polk, and that he was probably the strongest candidate who could have been nominated against Clay. His chief strength was in his negative qualities. He had not been involved in any of the conflicts of ambition among the Democratic leaders. He was regarded as the favorite of Jackson, and while his nomination had been made without any previous discussion or suggestion of his claims to the Presidency, he had filled high State and national positions with credit, and he could not be accused of incompetency. I doubt indeed whether any other Democrat could have been nominated by the Democratic convention to make a successful battle against Clay.

"The Whigs entered the contest defiant in confidence and enthusiastic to a degree that had never before been exhibited in the support of any candidate. The devotion of the Whigs to Clay was little less than idolatry, and strong men shed scalding tears over his defeat. He was largely handicapped in his battle by the complications put upon the Whig party by President Tyler. The Cabinet was wholly Democratic and bitterly against Clay. Under the demoralization caused by Tyler's betrayal of the party the Whigs had lost the House in 1842, but they retained their mastery in the Senate, and a new peril to Clay was soon developed in the growth of the Abolition sentiment of western New York. Neither Clay nor Polk made campaign speeches, and both maintained themselves with scrupulous dignity throughout the long and exceptionally desperate contest.

"Pennsylvania was then, as in 1860, the pivotal State of the struggle, and the death of the Democratic candidate for Governor during the midsummer deprived the Whigs of a source of strength that most likely would have given them the State in October. The Democrats had a violent factional dispute in choosing a candidate for Governor. Mr. Muhlenberg, who had been a bolting candidate against Governor Wolfe in 1835, thereby electing Ritner, the anti-Masonic candidate, was finally nominated for Governor over Francis R. Shunk, the candidate of the opposing faction. Muhlenberg was weakened by his aggressive factional record, and the Democrats were hardly hopeful of his election, but he died just when the struggle was at its zenith, and Shunk was then unanimously and cordially accepted as the Democratic leader.

"The Whigs had nominated General Markle of Westmoreland, who was unquestionably the strongest man they could have presented. The Presidential battle was practically fought in that contest for Governor, and when Shunk was elected by 4,397 majority there were few who cherished much hope of Clay's election. Pennsylvania, lost in October, could not be regained in November, but the Whigs did not in any measure relax their efforts, and Polk carried the State over Clay by 6,332.

"When Pennsylvania faltered the greatly impaired hopes of the Whigs centered in New York, as it was believed that New York might decide the contest in favor of Clay, even with Pennsylvania certain to vote against him. The nomination of Silas Wright for Governor had thoroughly united the Van Buren followers in support of Polk, and while Clay stood against the annexation of Texas and the extension of the slave power, the anti-slavery sentiment of New York was greatly strengthened by the fact that both Clay and Polk were Southerners and slaveholders. Birney, the Abolition candidate, received 15,812 votes, while Polk's majority in the State was 5,106. Mr. Greeley, who was one of the leaders in the anti-slavery movement, and much more practical than the organized Abolitionists, bitterly denounced that party for defeating Clay. In his Whig Almanac for 1845 he had an elaborate review of the contest, in which he said:

The year 1844 just ended has witnessed one of the most extraordinary political contests that has ever occurred. So nice and equal a balance of parties; so universal and intense an interest; so desperate and protracted a struggle, are entirely without parallel. . . . James K. Polk owes his election to the Birney or Liberty party. Had there been no such party, drawing its votes nine-tenths from the Whig ranks, Mr. Clay would have received at least the votes of New York and Michigan, in addition to those actually cast for him, giving him 146 electoral votes to Polk's 129. To Birney & Co., therefore, is the country indebted for the election of Polk and the annexation and anti-tariff ascendancy in the Federal Government.

The number of States voting was twenty-six, the same as in 1840. The new Congressional apportionment had reduced the Representatives from 242 to 223, making the total number of electors 275.

The popular vote in all the States except South Carolina (which for many years chose its electors by the Legislature) was as follows:

|------------------------------|-----------|
| James K. Polk, Democrat. | 1,337,243 |
| Henry Clay, Whig. | 1,299,068 |
| Jas. G. Birney, Abolitionist | 65,608 |

Of the electoral vote, Polk had 170, Clay 105.

In further explanation of the outcome of the campaign, Col. McClure says:

"The Whigs, in keen despair over the defeat of their ablest and most beloved champion, charged fraud as the controlling factor in giving the Democrats their victory, but the battle had been fought and lost, and there was nothing left for them but submission. The electoral count was uneventful, and Polk and Dallas were formally declared elected President and Vice-President without objection.

"The most desperate contests outside of New York and Pennsylvania were made in Tennessee and Delaware. Tennessee was the home of Polk, and the "Old Hero of New Orleans" threw himself into the contest for Polk with tireless energy. He inspired his veteran followers not only because he wanted Polk elected, but because he much more wanted Clay defeated. Clay had defeated him for President in the House in 1825, and Jackson never forgot a friend and rarely forgave an enemy. It was many days after the election before the vote of Tennessee could be ascertained, and it was claimed by both parties until the official vote was declared. It was finally announced that Clay had carried the State by 113, and the success of Clay in that State was the only silver lining the Whigs had to the dark cloud of their defeat.

"Another memorable battle, though not in any sense an important contest as affecting the result, was fought in Delaware. The States did not then vote for President on the same day as now. All of them voted for Presidential electors in the month of November, although at that time nearly all the States elected their State officers and Congressmen earlier in the year. Delaware, with only three electoral votes, held both her State and Presidential elections on the second Tuesday of November, and when her election day came around it was known to all that Clay was absolutely defeated for President.

"New York and Pennsylvania had voted for Polk a week before, and on the second Tuesday of November only Massachusetts and Delaware were left among the States that had not chosen electors. Massachusetts was Whig and hardly contested, but Delaware made a most heroic battle for Clay, even when it was known that a victory in the little Diamond State could not aid the election of their favorite. The Democrats, inspired by their positively assured success in the national contest, exhausted their resources and efforts to win, but in the largest vote ever cast in the State, Clay won by 287 majority, receiving a larger vote than was cast for the Whig candidates for Governor or for Congress, both of whom were successful, the first by 45 majority and the last by 173."

In remembrance of the log cabin, hard cider and coon skin campaign of 1840, the Democratic national platform adopted at Baltimore, in May, 1844, started out with this stinging declaration:

"Resolved, That the American Democracy place their trust, not in factitious symbols, not in displays and appeals insulting to the judgment and subversive of the intellect of the people, but in a clear reliance upon the intelligence, patriotism, and the discriminating justice of the American people."

The 1844 platform consisted of fifteen planks, nine of which were bodily taken from the Van Buren platform of 1840. It is worthy of note that the latter document was preceded by this declaration:

"Resolved, That the convention deems it expedient, at the present time, not to choose between the individuals in nomination, but to leave the decision to their Republican fellow-citizens in the several States, trusting that before the election shall take place their opinion will become so concentrated as to secure the choice of a Vice-President by the Electoral Collège."

Using the term "Republican" even during the Jacksonian era of the Democratic party serves as an indication of the tenacity with which members of the organization adhered to that party appellation. In the National Convention of 1848 that nominated Cass and Butler, the noted Arkansas fire-eater, William L. Yancey, persisted in using the term "Republican" instead of Democrat.

A SELF-SACRIFICING DEMOCRAT.

In the "good old days" there turned up occasionally an individual pre-eminent for devotion to party, self-sacrificing in spirit and action, and charmingly free from sordidness. Within this category comes James G. Read, who represented the counties of Daviess and Martin in the House of Representatives five years successively, the county of Clark two years, then served nine years in the Senate. While a State Senator he was twice made President of the Senate, or acting Lieutenant-Governor. Prior to that he was twice the Democratic nominee for Governor, first in 1831, then in 1834, and defeated both times. In addition to all this, he officiated several times as President of State and district conventions and as candidate for presidential elector. The compensation for service in the State Legislature was meager, barely enough to defray expenses at the Capital. Making two unsuccessful races for the Governorship must have entailed more expense. Mr. Read is entitled to honorable mention in the first and only history of the Indiana Democracy.

ROBERT DALE OWEN, PHILOSOPHER.

For years a Democratic gathering in Indiana seemed incomplete without the presence of Robert Dale Owen. He was a much greater man than his fellow-citizens seemed to realize. That, however, is not unusual in many parts of the world, Indiana not excepted.

Mr. Owen was born in Glasgow, Scotland, November 9, 1801. In his native land he pursued classical studies; came to the United States with his parents in 1832, and located in New Harmony, and aided in the establishment of a social community. He was editor of the Free Enquirer, published in New York 1828-1831. The year following he returned to New Harmony, and three years later he was elected a member of the Legislature and re-elected two or three times in succession. Recognition and appreciation of his eminent abilities led to his election to Congress for two terms, from 1843 to 1847. Amidst one of those strange political upheavals, the cause of which few can fathom, Mr. Owen was defeated in his third congressional race. He served with distinction as a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1850. From 1853 to 1858 he represented the United States in a diplomatic capacity. He died at Lake George, N. Y., June 25, 1877.

Mr. Owen, richly endowed with a philosophical mind, was a public speaker who never failed to interest his audiences. He was a thorough believer in the political philosophy of Thomas Jefferson and never tired of expatiating on the sublime teachings of the author of the imperishable Declaration of Independence. For this devotion to genuine democracy, Mr. Owen was fiercely and not infrequently coarsely assailed by the Indianapolis Journal and kindred unscrupulous partisan publications. Denunciation fell upon his head for proclaiming on all suitable occasions undying faith in these Jeffersonian Doctrines:

"Honesty is the first chapter of the book of wisdom."

"I have never believed there was one code of morality for a public and another for a private man."

"To inform the minds of the people and to follow their will is the chief duty of those placed at their head."

"The information of the people at large can alone make them the safe, as they are the sole, depository of our religious and political freedom."

"There is a debt of service due from every man to his country, proportioned to the bounties which nature and fortune have measured to him."

"It is impossible not to be sensible that we are acting for all mankind; that circumstances denied to others, but indulged to us, have imposed on us the duty of proving what is the degree of freedom and self-government in which a society may venture to have its individual members."

"The station which we occupy among the nations of the earth is honorable, but awful. Trusted with the destinies of this solitary republic of the world, the only monument of human rights and the sole depository of the sacred fire of freedom and self-government, from hence it is to be lighted up in other regions of the earth, if other regions of the earth ever become susceptible of its benign influence. All mankind ought then, with us, to rejoice in its prosperous and sympathize in its adverse fortunes, as involving everything that is dear to man. And to what sacrifices of interest or commerce ought not these considerations to animate us? To what compromises of opinion and inclination, to maintain harmony and union among ourselves, and to preserve from all danger this hallowed ark of human hope and human happiness. That differences of opinion should arise among men, on politics, on religion, and on every other topic of human inquiry, and that these should be freely expressed in a country where all our faculties are free, is to be expected."

Faith in Jeffersonian doctrines is strengthened in turning to his first inaugural address and cogitating over these lofty sentiments:

"I know, indeed, that some honest men fear that a Republican Government cannot be strong; that this Government is not strong enough. But would the honest patriot, in the full tide of successful experiment, abandon a Government which has so far kept us free and firm, on the theoretic and visionary fear that this Government, the world's best hope, may by possibility want energy to preserve itself? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest Government on earth. I believe it the only one where every man, at the call of the laws, would fly to the standard of the law, and would meet invasions of the public order, as his own personal concern.

"Let us, then, with courage and confidence, pursue our own Federal and Republican principles, our attachment to our Union and representative Government. Kindly separated by nature and a wide ocean from the exterminating havoc of one quarter of the globe; too high-minded to endure the degradations of the others; possessing a chosen country, with room enough for our descendants to the hundredth and thousandth generation; entertaining a due sense of our equal rights to the use of our own faculties, to the acquisitions of our industry, to honor and confidence from our fellow-citizens, resulting, not from birth, but from our actions and their sense of them; enlightened by a benign religion, professed, indeed, and practiced in various forms, yet all of them including honesty, truth, temperance, gratitude, and the love of man; acknowledging and adoring an overruling Providence, which by all its dispensations proves that it delights in the happiness of man here and his greater happiness hereafter; with all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people? Still one thing more, fellow-citizens—a wise and frugal Government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government, and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities."

INDIANA'S REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS

FROM 1833 TO 1841

UP TO 1833, as set forth in preceding chapters, Indiana was represented in the lower House of Congress by three members. Under the census of 1830 a new apportionment was made. Indiana had grown wonderfully.

Her population in a single decade had more than doubled. In 1820 it was 147,178; in 1830 it had risen to 343,031—an increase of 195,853, or 133.1 per cent. This entitled Indiana to seven seats in the House of Representatives at Washington. No embarrassment was occasioned the electorate of Indiana by this demand upon its congressional timber. It had an abundance thereof, even in those days, and could easily have furnished a much larger supply. Men of statesmanlike qualities had flocked into the young commonwealth from East and South, and were still coming with the influx of new population.

To the Twenty-third Congress (1833 to 1835) Indiana sent this array of talent:

1. Ratliff Boon.
2. John Ewing.
3. John Carr.
4. Amos Lane.
5. Jonathan McCarty.
6. George S. Kinnard.
7. Edward A. Hannegan.

Boon, Carr and Hannegan have already had mention. John Ewing was born at sea, while his parents were on their way from Cork to Baltimore. The family located in Indiana. Young Ewing was educated in the public schools; established a Whig paper at Wabash, called the Transcript; engaged in mercantile pursuits at Vincennes; served several terms in both branches of the Legislature; was first elected to Congress by a majority of two over Dr. John W. Davis, who in turn defeated him two years later by about 1,000; was thereafter again elected to Congress, serving from 1837 to 1839. He died at Vincennes, April 6, 1858, highly esteemed by all the people, regardless of their political affiliation.

Amos Lane was born near Aurora, N. Y., March 1, 1778; educated in the public schools; practiced law at Lawrenceburg; served as Speaker of the House of Representatives; twice elected to Congress as a Democrat and defeated as a candidate for a third term.

Jonathan McCarty was a native of Tennessee; educated in the public schools; located in Franklin county; served in the State Legislature; removed to Connersville, Fayette county; held several county offices; served two terms in Congress as a Whig; defeated for a third term; was a Harrison elector in 1840. Died in Keokuk, Iowa, in 1855.

George S. Kinnard was born in Pennsylvania, 1803; was by his widowed mother taken to Tennessee, where he completed his preparatory studies; located in Indianapolis; held several local offices; studied law and was admitted to the bar; served in the Legislature and was by it elected to the office of State Auditor; was made colonel of State militia; twice elected as a Democrat to Congress, and served from March 4, 1833, until his death from injuries received in the explosion on the steamer "Flora," on the Ohio River, November 25, 1836. William Herod, a Whig, was chosen to fill the unexpired term.

In the Twenty-fourth Congress (1835 to 1837) these gentlemen represented Indiana:

1. Ratliff Boon.
2. John W. Davis.
3. John Carr.
4. Amos Lane.
5. Jonathan McCarty.
6. George S. Kinnard (died).
7. William Herod (to fill vacancy).
7. Edward A. Hannegan.

John Wesley Davis was born in New Holland, Lancaster county, Pa., April 16, 1799; graduated from the Baltimore Medical College in 1821; moved to Carlisle, Sullivan county, Ind., in 1823; member of the Legislature for several terms; served as Speaker of the House in 1832; appointed commissioner to negotiate an Indian treaty in 1834; elected as a Democrat to Congress from 1835 to 1837 and defeated for re-election by two votes; thereafter returned to Congress from 1839 to 1841; given a rest by the Harrison tidal wave, but triumphantly elected and re-elected from 1843 to 1847; made Speaker of the National House December, 1845. Upon the conclusion of his congressional service he was again sent to the State Legislature and chosen Speaker of the House, having in caucus defeated William H. English, who at that time began his political career. President Polk appointed Dr. Davis as minister to China, in which capacity he served from January 3, 1848, to May 25, 1850. Having several times represented Indiana in Democratic national conventions and achieved a national reputation, he was chosen president of the Baltimore convention that nominated Franklin Pierce for the Presidency in 1852. President Pierce appointed Dr. Davis as Governor of Oregon. The appointment was at first declined, but finally accepted. The office evidently was not to his liking. Holding it a year, he resigned and returned to his beloved Indiana. In 1856 he was again elected to the State Legislature by what he appreciatively characterized as "the most flattering vote I ever received from the good people of Sullivan county, among whom I have resided for more than thirty-five years."

The last office to which Mr. Davis was assigned was that of visitor to West Point Military Academy, of which he was made president. He lived until August 22, 1859, when he died at his cherished home in Carlisle. With his demise terminated the career of one of Indiana's most remarkable and distinguished men. He was a forceful speaker, a clear thinker, a genial gentleman, a thoroughly honest man, a true lover of his country, and in sunshine or gloom ever an ardent but always a conscientious Democrat.

William Herod began the practice of law at Columbus, Ind., served as member of the State Senate, and was elected to Congress to fill the unexpired term of George S. Kinnard. Herod was re-elected to the Twenty-fifth Congress by an overwhelming majority over former Governor James Brown Ray. In his next race for re-election Herod was defeated by William W. Wick, Democrat.

In the Twenty-fifth Congress (1837 to 1839) these gentlemen served their constituents:

1. Ratliff Boon.
2. John Ewing.
3. William Graham.
4. George H. Dunn.
5. James H. Rariden.
6. William Herod.
7. Albert S. White.

William Graham was a Kentuckian; became an inhabitant of Indiana Territory in 1811, settling at Vallonia; there practiced law; member of the Territorial Legislature in 1812; member of the first General Assembly; delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1816; Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1820; member of the State Senate; elected as a Whig to the Congress of 1837 to 1839. Died near Vallonia, August 17, 1858.

George Hebford Dunn resided at Lawrenceburg; served three terms in the Legislature; Treasurer of State from 1841 to 1843; defeated as the Whig candidate for Congress in 1835; had better luck next time, but was again defeated in third race. Was a man of superior ability. Died at Lawrenceburg January 12, 1854.

James Rariden was a native of Kentucky; practiced law at Centerville, Wayne county; served in both branches of the State Legislature; delegate to the State constitutional convention; twice elected to Congress as a Whig. Died in Cambridge City.

As members of the Twenty-sixth Congress (1839 to 1841) these gentlemen were chosen to serve their constituents:

1. George H. Proffit.
2. John W. Davis.
3. John Carr.
4. Thomas Smith.
5. James H. Rariden.
6. William W. Wick.
7. Tilghman A. Howard.

George H. Proffit was a native of New Orleans, La. After establishing himself in Indiana he was four times elected to the Legislature. Twice elected to Congress as a Whig. Appointed by President Tyler as minister to Brazil; the Senate having refused to confirm the appointment, he returned to the United States after serving one year and two months. Died in Louisville, Ky., September 5, 1847.

Thomas Smith was a native of Pennsylvania; moved to Indiana and engaged in tanning at Versailles, Ripley county; served so acceptably as a representative and State Senator that he was four times nominated by the Democrats for Congress, triumphantly elected three times and defeated in his second race. While a member of the Legislature he vigorously opposed the wild schemes of internal improvement which bankrupted the State and brought financial dishonor upon her name. His course upon this subject added to his popularity at home and was the immediate cause of his subsequent political advancement. As a member of the constitutional convention he protested earnestly and eloquently against a proposed clause discriminating against negroes. His sense of justice would not permit him to countenance injustice. He was singularly free of narrowness and prejudice. His manner as a debater was plain, straightforward, emphatic, impressive. As a Jeffersonian he held very pronounced views on the slavery question. He recognized it as an institution older than the Union itself, but nevertheless he could never persuade himself that it was other than an evil. Holding these views, he deplored the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Unwilling to subscribe to doctrines that his conscience could not approve, he regretfully severed his affiliation with the party that had sent him three times to Congress, and in course of time identified himself with anti-slavery organizations. He died at Versailles April 12, 1876.

An exceedingly interesting character was William Watson Wick. He was born in Cannonsburg, Pa., February 23, 1796, taught school, studied medicine, and then law. Upon his admission to the bar he began practice at Connersville, Ind., in 1820. By the Legislature he was elected Secretary of State in 1825; State attorney for the fifth judicial circuit, 1829-1831; president judge, 1831-1835. Was three times elected to Congress and defeated in his second race. In recognition of his services to the Democratic party he was made postmaster of Indianapolis under the Pierce administration, serving from 1853 until 1857. Originally he was a Whig. Like a good many other Indianians of that period he had no hesitancy about changing party affiliations when he could no longer approve its policies. He quit the further study of medicine because he did not care to be contemplating men's miseries. Holding public positions with meager salary attachments kept him poor. His worldly possessions rarely reached a thousand dollars, all told. Like many other public men of his day, he was convivially inclined.

Poor in purse, he was quite desirous of retaining the Indianapolis postoffice. He had gotten along in years and understood full well that resuming the practice of law, after having been out for so long a time, would afford but poor picking. He was sorely grieved that he should be turned out of office. But he realized that he had taken a firm stand on the slavery question, and that he had committed himself unequivocally against the attempt to foist slavery upon Kansas. In letters to Indiana members of Congress he entreated them to resist further encroachments by the slave power. This made him a political heretic in the eyes of Senator Jesse D. Bright, who had the ear of President Buchanan. At the expiration of his four-year term, William Watson Wick had to step down and out and turn the management of the Indianapolis postoffice over to John M. Talbott. It was, under the circumstances, a severe blow to Mr. Wick, but he neither raved nor moaned. He was accustomed to adversity; he never gave much thought to tomorrow. His father, a Presbyterian minister, intended his William Watson to qualify himself for the ministry, but the young man could not reconcile himself to that calling; there was too much of the wag in him for such sedateness. Referring to the fact that his father was a preacher and his uncle a merchant, Judge Wick once dryly remarked: "One chose piety and poverty, the other merchandising and money-getting, and they both succeeded. One laid up treasures in heaven, the other on earth, and verily they both had their reward."

When the campaign of 1860 came on Judge Wick took the stump for Stephen A. Douglas, earnestly and eloquently pleading the cause of popular sovereignty and vigorously denouncing the unreasonableness of the proslavery element that was supporting Breckinridge and Lane. Shortly after the defeat of Douglas, Judge Wick left Indianapolis to take up his abode with his daughter, Mrs. William H. Overstreet, at Franklin, Ind. He died at her home May 19, 1869, and was buried in the Franklin cemetery.

In the Twenty-seventh Congress (1841 to 1843) Indiana was represented by this exceptionally able delegation:

1. George H. Proffit.
2. Richard W. Thompson.
3. Joseph L. White.
4. James H. Cravens.
5. Andrew Kennedy.
6. David Wallace.
7. Henry S. Lane.

Among these exceptionally able men was Richard Wigginton Thompson, the greater part of his life a resident of Terre Haute. He was popularly known as "Silver-tongued Dick Thompson," and in later years acquired distinction in the literary world. The "History of Protective Tariff Laws," issued in 1888, may be said to constitute his most important work in this line. He was born in Culpeper county, Va., June 9, 1809; pursued classical studies; moved to Louisville, Ky., in 1831; clerk in a store; moved to Lawrence county, Ind.; taught school; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1834, and began practice in Bedford, Ind.; member of the State House of Representatives 1834-1836; served in State Senate 1836-1838 and served for a short time as president pro tempore; elected as a Whig to the Twenty-seventh Congress (March 4, 1841-March 3, 1843); unsuccessful candidate for re-election; presidential elector in 1840 on the Harrison and Tyler ticket; re-elected as a Whig to the Thirtieth Congress (March 4, 1847-March 3, 1849); declined a renomination; declined the office of Austrian minister, tendered him by President Taylor, the office of Recorder of the General Land Office, tendered by President Fillmore, and a seat on the bench of the Court of Claims, tendered by President Lincoln; presidential elector on the Lincoln and Johnson ticket in 1864; delegate to the Republican national convention in Chicago in 1868 and in Cincinnati in 1876; Judge of the Fifth Indiana Circuit Court 1867-1869; Secretary of the Navy under President Hayes from March 12, 1877, until his resignation, December 21, 1880; chairman of the American Committee of the Panama Canal Company; director of the Panama Railroad Company. Died in Terre Haute, Ind., February 9, 1900.

Joseph L. White was born in Cherry Valley, N. Y., fitted himself for the law, and began practice in the historic town of Madison. Served one term in Congress, then moved to New York, and there resumed the practice of law. Later on he engaged in manufacturing. Died January 12, 1861.

James H. Cravens was by birth a Virginian; moved to Madison in 1829 and engaged in agricultural pursuits. Later on he located in Ripley county, where he practiced law and managed a farm. Was an elector on the Harrison ticket in 1840 and served one term in Congress as a Whig. Though a Virginian by birth, he was a pronounced anti-slavery man. As such he was nominated for Governor by the Freesoilers in 1848, and, of course, defeated. His devotion to the Union impelled him, at the age of sixty, to enlist in the Eighty-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, of which he was made lieutenant-colonel. He died at Osgood, Ind., December 4, 1876, and was buried at Versailles.

Andrew Kennedy was one of the noted men of the State. Born in Dayton, Ohio, July 24, 1810, he came with his parents to Indiana, locating on the Indian reservation near Lafayette. Soon after he went to reside with an aunt in Connersville, where he became an apprentice in a blacksmith shop. While in the act of shoeing a horse he was kicked so severely that continuation at that trade was deemed physically impracticable and inadvisable. Fairly well equipped with a common school education, he qualified himself for the law. Located at Muncie, he was admitted to the bar in 1830. By reason of his fine natural abilities and his thorough understanding of human nature he built up a remunerative practice. Possessing the elements of personal popularity in an eminent degree, he was elected a member of the Legislature in 1835 and promoted to the Senate in 1838. As a candidate for Presidential elector in 1840 he made quite a reputation as a stump speaker. Before the expiration of his term as Senator he was elected to Congress and thereafter twice re-elected, serving from 1841 to 1847. A fourth nomination was tendered him, but declined. He evinced a desire to be made United States Senator, to succeed Edward A. Hannegan, and at the opening of the legislative session, in December, 1841, proceeded to Indianapolis to make a canvass for that high office. He was stricken with smallpox, which dread disease precipitated a rather unceremonious adjournment of the General Assembly, though this was the only case in town. He died the last day of December of that year at the Palmer House, for many years Democratic headquarters. His body was taken at the dead of night, wrapped in the clothes of the bed in which he died, to the cemetery, attended only by the hack driver and sexton, and consigned to Mother Earth. The hackman and the sexton who performed the sad task of laying him away in his tomb contracted the fatal disease which took him off and in less than two weeks thereafter were laid by his side. "A sad ending," as Woollen put it, "was this of a career which promised so much." Deep-felt sorrow was manifested throughout the State over this sad ending of an extraordinary career. While in Congress Mr. Kennedy delivered a remarkable speech on the celebrated Oregon bill, declaring himself in favor of the "fifty-four forty or fight" doctrine, generally espoused by belligerent Democrats. So earnest was his delivery that he fainted at the conclusion of his speech. Upon recovery congratulations on his forensic effort were literally showered upon him. Among those who thus manifested their appreciation of natural oratory was John Quincy Adams, a bitter opponent of the Oregon measure. Approaching the "Blacksmith orator," the illustrious Massachusetts statesman said: "Kennedy, let me take by the hand the greatest natural orator in America." In one of his characteristic speeches in the Senate the "Little Giant of the West," Stephen A. Douglas, made this reference to the Congressman from the Muncie district: "I am reminded of the case of Hon. Andrew Kennedy, a Democratic member of Congress from Indiana, who, some years ago, was elected from a district which had about four thousand Whig majority. One day he got up to make a speech in the House, when one of his colleagues asked how he got there. He replied: 'I come from the strongest Whig district in the State of Indiana, a district that gave General Harrison a bigger majority than any other in the United States of America. I beat three of the ablest Whigs there were in the district, and I could have beaten three more if they had dared to run against me.'" after having served six years as Lieutenant-Governor and three years as Governor. He was denied a re-election to the Twenty-eighth Congress. According to Woollen, "Governor Wallace was not a money-making and money-getting man. He took more pleasure in filling his mind with knowledge than in filling his pockets with money. He entered into a business venture at Fort Wayne, which, proving unfortunate, cost him his entire estate. One day, while sitting in his yard talking with his eldest son, the sheriff came with an execution which he sought to levy upon the Governor's property. After some parleying the sheriff left, and the Governor, addressing his son, said: 'William, I want you to remember that it will be a good deal better to have a few thousand dollars laid away for old age than to have been the Governor of the State or a member of Congress.'"

David Wallace served but one term in Congress, from the Indianapolis district,

Henry Smith Lane was a native of Kentucky, served in the State Senate, filled the unexpired term of Tilghman A. Howard in Congress, was re-elected, and served in all from December 7, 1840, to March 3, 1843. He was strongly in favor of the Mexican war, in which he served as lieutenant-colonel of an Indiana regiment. He will receive further attention in subsequent chapters.

JESSE D. BRIGHT MADE U. S. SENATOR

TWICE ELECTED TO THAT EXALTED POSITION—NAMED AS INDIANA'S CHOICE FOR THE PRESIDENCY IN 1856

UNDER the constitution of 1816 Representatives in the State Legislature were elected annually, for one year; Senators for three years. The county of Jefferson, of which Madison then was and still is the county seat, was strongly Whig. In those days factional strife was easily engendered. The Whigs put in nomination for State Senator a rigid Sabbatarian who opposed Sunday mails. Assuming that the Democrats would not have the temerity to place a candidate of their own in the field, a more liberal faction of the Whig party trotted out a candidate of their way of thinking to oppose the regular nominee. Espying a fine opportunity to slip in between these two Whig candidates, Jesse D. Bright entered the race and was triumphantly elected. He was a strong character, a man of affairs, a superb judge of human nature and an excellent mixer. He had served two years as Senator when he was nominated by the Democracy for Lieutenant-Governor and after an animated campaign elected by a plurality exceeding four thousand. He made an excellent presiding officer and by his courtesy and fairness greatly endeared himself to members of the General Assembly.

Previous to his election to these positions he had served acceptably as Probate Judge of Jefferson County and as United States Marshal for the State of Indiana. In the latter position he was afforded opportunity to form many acquaintances throughout the State. This doubtless contributed largely to his subsequent nomination and election to the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

When the term of Albert S. White as United State Senator was about to expire, in 1845, Governor Whitcomb let it become known that he would greatly appreciate the honor of an election to that high office. But the Lieutenant-Governor was a better politician than the Chief Executive. So Bright carried away the honors, and the Governor had to defer his Senatorial aspirations until 1849, when the expiration of Edward A. Hannegan's term made it possible for Whitcomb to step from the gubernatorial chair into the seat then about to be vacated by the man who as a "dark horse" snatched away the Senatorial honors from Tilghman A. Howard in 1843.

Though Bright had made himself quite solid with the party managers, opposition to his re-election developed in 1850. Robert Dale Owen, one of the ablest men in the State, had become an avowed candidate for the succession. Charges were openly made that Bright sought to secure a re-election by bribery. He heard of it and hastened on to Indianapolis to defend himself. In an interview with Mr. Owen he easily proved his innocence of the charge preferred against him. Owen withdrew from the race and Bright was re-elected without further contest.

Though an intense partisan, Bright sustained friendly relations with Henry Clay. On some public measures these two Senators agreed and co-operated. And Bright stood high in the Senate. This was made manifest when, in 1853, upon the death of Vice-President King, the Indiana Senator was elected President pro tempore. This position he filled creditably until John C. Breckinridge was installed as Vice-President in 1857. While presiding officer of the Senate Mr. Bright refused to assign three anti-slavery Senators—Charles Sumner, Salmon P. Chase and John P. Hale—to any of the standing committees, upon the ground that “they were not members of any healthy political organizations.”

The death of Senator Whitcomb, after serving a few months more than half of his term, resulted in the appointment by Governor Joseph A. Wright, in the month of October, 1852, of Charles W. Cathcart, of Laporte county, to serve until the Legislature effected an election for the remainder of Senator Whitcomb’s term. The choice of the Legislature of 1853 fell upon Judge John Pettit, of Lafayette. Dr. Graham N. Fitch, of Logansport, aspired to the position, but the caucus gave preference to Judge Pettit. The latter served from the date of his election until March 4, 1855, when the Whitcomb term expired. The Legislature of 1855 was unable to agree upon a joint session for the election of a Senator, so for two years Indiana had but one representative in the Upper House of Congress. The Legislature of 1857, chosen in 1856, was Democratic on joint ballot, the House being of that faith, while the Senate was controlled by a combination of Republicans, Freesoilers, Know-Nothings and Prohibitionists, styling itself for the time being “The People’s Party.”

Senator Bright’s second term expired March 4, 1857. He was desirous of being made his own successor, but had doubts about the legality of an election in case a joint session could not be agreed upon by the two Houses of the General Assembly. The question was submitted to a committee of three eminent jurists, who gave it as their opinion that an election effected by a majority of the entire membership of the Legislature would be valid. Thereupon it was decided to proceed to the election of two Senators—one to succeed Bright, the other to fill the vacancy existing since 1855. This program was carried out, and Bright and Fitch were duly commissioned by Governor Willard. The Legislature elected in 1858 was Republican. After a protracted debate the election of Bright and Fitch was declared to have been illegal and therefore null and void. That done, Henry S. Lane and William M. McCarty were chosen to fill the two alleged vacancies. These gentlemen proceeded to Washington and claimed the seats held by Bright and Fitch. Admission was refused Lane and McCarty, although three distinguished Democrats—Douglas of Illinois, Mason of Virginia and Broderick of California—voted that the election of Bright and Fitch was irregular, illegal and therefore invalid.

Bright had been unfriendly to Douglas for several years. The action just noted made him hate the “Little Giant” with all the intensity of his nature. He was as bitter in his enmity as he was cordial in his friendship. In such matters he tolerated no middle ground. “He that is not for me is against me” guided his action throughout his political career. It is this that made him the relentless foe of Governor Joseph A. Wright, and to a somewhat milder degree of Thomas A. Hendricks, David Turpie, Chas. W. Cathcart, W. J. Brown, W. A. Gorman, Robert Dale Owen, William S. Holman, and any number of other distinguished Indiana Democrats who refused to conform to his wishes or to obey his commands.

It is said that when President-elect James Buchanan had under consideration the formation of his Cabinet he had Senator Bright in view for Secretary of State. The accuracy of this statement may well be questioned for various reasons, chief of which is that Buchanan finally chose for this position General Lewis Cass of Michigan, a man of diplomatic qualities, of conciliatory disposition, eminent ability, and in several respects the very opposite of the Indiana Senator.

The strained relations existing between Senator Bright and Governor Wright did not deter the Democracy, in State convention assembled at Indianapolis in February, 1852, from giving these rival leaders this unqualified endorsement:

"Resolved, That we approve and endorse the administration of our present Governor, Joseph A. Wright, and that we pledge to him, as nominee for re-election in the approaching contest, our hearty support.

"Resolved, That we have undiminished confidence in the undeviating and well-tried Democracy of our distinguished and able Senators in Congress, James Whitcomb and Jesse D. Bright, and that we fully endorse their senatorial action."

At the same convention General Joseph Lane was warmly endorsed for the Presidential nomination. The delegation was not formally instructed to vote for Lane "first, last and all the time," but directed to vote as a unit. The delegation voted on thirty ballots for Lane, then went over to Cass. On the thirty-fifth ballot a "dark horse" in the person of Franklin Pierce was entered and nominated on the forty-ninth ballot.

In the convention of 1856 these endorsements were accorded the Senator and Governor:

"Resolved, That the Democracy of Indiana have undiminished confidence in the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, our Senator in Congress, and while we are ready cheerfully and enthusiastically to support for the presidency in the approaching election whoever may be selected as the candidate for that office by the Democratic national convention, from whatever quarter of the Union he may come—if the Northwest is honored with that distinction we present the name of the Honorable Jesse D. Bright to that convention, and to the Democracy of the Union, as a suitable candidate and one whom the Democracy of Indiana delight to honor.

"Resolved, That the entire vote of the delegates from this State be cast as a unit in the national convention and that a majority of the delegation shall control the entire vote of the State.

"Resolved, That we approve of the administration of the State government by His Excellency, Joseph A. Wright, and that his integrity, ability and executive talents have fully met the expectations of the Democratic party of Indiana, and won for him increased confidence and gratitude from the people."

Though residing in Indiana, Senator Bright owned a plantation over in Kentucky. He was a slave-owner and in full accord with the South on the question of slavery. Fully aware that civil war would eventuate in the destruction of slavery, he counseled against secession and rebellion. But he could not persuade himself to believe that the Union could be kept together by coercive methods. His sympathies being Southern, his affiliations naturally were with Southerners. As a slaveholder he was opposed to war being waged against the South. On the first day of March, 1861, while holding a seat in the United States Senate, he addressed a letter "To His Excellency, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederation of States," in which he recommended his friend Thomas Lincoln of Texas to "favorable consideration as a gentleman of first respectability and reliable in every respect. He visits your capital mainly to dispose of what he regards a great improvement to firearms." The bearer of this letter was arrested on his way to the Confederate Capital with Senator Bright's letter upon his person. The matter was brought to the attention of the Senate; proceedings for expulsion were instituted, and after affording ample opportunity for defense, the Senate expelled Mr. Bright from the seat he had uninterruptedly occupied for sixteen years.

In the campaign of 1860 Senator Bright opposed both the nomination and election of Stephen A. Douglas to the Presidency. While he did not deem it advisable to put a State ticket in the field, he did bring into the race a Breckinridge and Lane electoral ticket. He entered upon a vigorous campaign, earnestly appealing to his old-time friends to stand by him in this crisis. Out of a total vote of 272,143 he managed to poll 12,295 for Breckinridge and Lane.

When a Democratic Legislature was elected in 1862 Mr. Bright did his utmost to induce the Democrats of that body to "vindicate" him with an election to his unexpired term in the Senate. This was refused, the choice of the party having been centered on Mr. Hendricks' running mate in 1860, David Turpie. Responsibility for this "slight" was laid at the door of Mr. Hendricks, whom Bright dubbed "Oily Gammon," but who nevertheless retained for an even quarter of a century the unquestioned and uncontested leadership of the Indiana Democracy.

Soon after the infliction of this sore disappointment Mr. Bright concluded to shake the dust of Indiana off his boots and to take up his residence on his plantation in Kentucky. He served two terms in the Legislature of that commonwealth and was at one time talked of for the United States Senatorship. He had extensive interests in the coal mines of West Virginia, which afforded him a large income. In 1874 he moved to Baltimore. Broken down in health, he died in that city of organic disease of the heart, May 20, 1875.

Toward the close of the war Mr. Bright appears to have experienced some moderation of his ultra political views. He earnestly supported the reconciliation and reconstruction policy of President Johnson, and in 1868 favored the nomination by the Democrats of Salmon P. Chase for the Presidency. In 1869 he wanted the Democrats of the Indiana Legislature to enter into a combination to elect one of the Republican bolters to the United States Senate, his choice being a former trusted lieutenant of his, Senator James Hughes, who, during the rebellion, joined the Republican party. Like Clement L. Vallandigham, of Ohio, Jesse D. Bright believed in letting by-gones be by-gones, in gracefully accepting the decree of fate, and acquiescing in changes that could not be prevented. In other words, he believed in the advisability of what in Ohio was dubbed "the new departure." In a speech delivered by Mr. Hendricks in 1872 he expressed substantially the same idea when he said: "Let us turn our backs upon the past and look hopefully to the future."

THE BRIGHT-FITCH SENATORIAL CONTEST.

In view of the importance of this case and the general misconception of the points involved therein, the reader will doubtless appreciate highly the presentation of the legal aspect by an authority of the eminence of Judge David Turpie. As a member of the General Assembly of 1859 he bore a conspicuous part in the animated contest over the proposition to annul the action of the preceding Legislature. What he had to say on this interesting subject is well worth studious perusal:

"As upon my former service in the General Assembly, so now, came again the question of the senatorial election, as the first business of the session of 1858, which arose in the following manner: the Legislature of 1855, chosen in 1854, had the duty imposed upon it of choosing a United States Senator. But the two houses of that body being of different political faith, declined to go into joint convention for that purpose. The vacancy caused by the expiration of Mr. Pettit's term was not filled, and for two years Indiana had only one member in the Senate, Mr. Jesse D. Bright. The Legislature of 1857, chosen in 1856, was Democratic on joint ballot; of its two branches the House was Democratic, the Senate was controlled by the opposition.

"Under these circumstances the House appointed a day for the election of two Senators, one to fill the vacancy existing since 1855, the other to fill the vacancy about to occur by the expiration of Mr. Bright's term. The Senate, as such, ignored this action of the House, but the Democratic members of that body left their seats in the Senate Chamber, came over to the House on the day appointed, organized a joint convention and elected Doctor Graham N. Fitch to fill the existing vacancy, and Mr. Jesse D. Bright as his own successor for a third term, each of them receiving a majority of all the votes of all the members elected to the General Assembly. The opposition in our State, and especially that of the Legislature of 1858, including the anti-administration Democrats, held that the election of Bright and Fitch so conducted was unconstitutional and invalid; that both vacancies were yet unfilled and that it was their duty to elect two Senators. They took the ground that the word Legislature, in the clause of the federal constitution relating to the election of Senators, necessarily implied the concurrent action of both Houses as such to form a lawful joint convention. We contended, on the contrary, that the word Legislature was not used in any technical sense in the clause referred to, and that the majority of the whole number of members might legally form a joint convention and elect Senators without such concurrent action. In support of this construction we referred to the fact that, at the time of making the federal constitution, several of the States, notably Pennsylvania, had a Legislature composed of only one chamber, and that the framers of that instrument, sitting in Philadelphia, could not possibly have contemplated the two houses as such in the use of the term Legislature, but had used it as we still use the word magistracy, to designate the collective body of all the persons in the county or State who are employed in the duty of administering justice.

"The debate lasted many days; in the House it became quite warm and exciting; the Speaker, Mr. Gordon, left the chair to take part in it; at last a vote was taken and we were beaten. No further resistance was offered. We kept our seats, took no part in the proceedings, and our colleagues of the opposition held a joint convention in which they chose Mr. Henry S. Lane and Mr. William M. McCarty as Senators from Indiana to fill the supposed vacancies. I wrote a full argument upon the law and facts of the case, closing with an earnest request for federal legislation on this question, which was seconded by several of my colleagues. It seemed to be a careless and somewhat dangerous predicament that the Legislatures of the States should continue in many different ways to elect Senators, when Congress had the undoubted right to prescribe by law a uniform method of procedure. Copies of these papers were sent to Senators of both parties at Washington. Many letters were received in answer. Some of them approved, others disapproved the grounds taken in argument in the particular case, but all concurred in the necessity of Congressional action. Yet such was the political stress of that troubled period, now approaching in the history of our country, that it was not until after the conclusion of the war that Congress enacted this much-needed legislation. On the 26th of July, 1866, an act was passed regulating the mode of choosing Senators by the Legislature. Since that time our Senators in Indiana and elsewhere have been elected according to its provisions.

"Mr. W. H. Seward and Mr. William G. Bayard, who were Senators in 1858, Mr. Hendricks and Mr. Lane, who were Senators in 1866, have more than once stated in my presence that it was the Indiana case with its non-election in 1855, and its contested election of 1858, that chiefly impelled Congress to take its subsequent action in the premises. The United States Senate held that the election of Bright and Fitch was valid. Mr. Lane and Mr. McCarty returned from Washington as private citizens, but they lost nothing in public estimation by their journey, nor was the action of our Legislature useless or unprofitable. It led to the passage of a general law on this subject, one of the most important of our statutes at large.

"Although very firmly convinced of the correctness of our opinion upon the question of the Senatorial election, what gave additional zeal to my action was the circumstance that Graham N. Fitch, the friend of my youth, was deeply interested in the result. He served in the United States Senate until March 4, 1861, taking first rank in that body. He was afterward a colonel in the army; he had the choice of many titles, but he preferred to be called Doctor. That designated his favorite pursuit. He was often and long engaged in public employments of the highest character. He entered, indeed he was, so to speak, drafted into the work of the lecture-room, taught as a professor in the medical schools of Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Chicago, but always returned to his home—to his office in Logansport. To the profession he had given his first love, and it never grew old or cold; he continued in it almost to the day of his death, not from necessity, but from the love he bore it. His early labors in the active practice were constant and toilsome. He always drove with two horses. I have met him more than once, returning from some distant night-call in the country, seated in his buggy fast asleep, while his faithful team noiselessly picked their way along the corduroy road, seeming loath to disturb the slumbers of their master.

"As a public speaker Doctor Fitch was versatile and attractive. When he took the stump he bade good-by to the physician. There was not the least trace of the matéria medica, either in his manner or utterances, nothing of either shop or sham. He had read and thought much upon the constitutional principles of our government, and had formed his opinions of the proper mode of their development by legislation. He cited with effect and with precision the writings of Jefferson, Jackson and other worthies of the Democratic school, but an authority to be cited by him must always be brief and pointed. A skillful disputant, he had great powers of apprehension and penetration; he detected in the twinkling of an eye any infirmity or inconsistency in the position of an opponent, and as quickly exposed it.

"In a prolonged series of joint discussions with Mr. Schuyler Colfax he defeated that gentleman for Congress, the only defeat suffered by him in a long political career. During the Civil War Fitch was authorized to raise a regiment, the Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, which he subsequently commanded in the field. His recruits were gathered by a public canvass made by him in his own and adjoining counties. Several times I accompanied him in this canvass and spoke from the same stand. His account of the beginning, course and termination of the movement of secession was the most highly finished and thoroughly wrought-out discussion of that topic I have ever heard. His exhortation to the sons of Indiana in behalf of the Union and the constitution was irresistible. His regiment was rapidly filled by volunteer enlistments to its full complement. Our young men were anxious to go with him."

The strong affection Judge Turpie felt for Dr. Fitch was richly merited. It was based on sterling worth. Friendship between two such men has in it genuineness and sincerity. Had it been lacking in these essentials, it would not have been professed. Both had a decided aversion to mere profession, to hollow pretense.

Graham Newell Fitch was born in Leroy, N. Y., December 5, 1809. He studied medicine in the medical college at Fairfield, N. Y., practiced in Logansport, Ind., was professor in Rush Medical College of Chicago from 1844 to 1849; was presidential elector in 1844, 1848 and 1856; member of the Legislature in 1836 and 1839; chosen member of Congress in 1848 and re-elected in 1850; served as United States Senator four years, from February 4, 1857, to March 4, 1861. At the outbreak of the rebellion he raised the Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, making earnest appeals to the young men of his part of the State to rally to the defense of the imperiled Union and the vindication of the supremacy of governmental authority. He deplored secession and deprecated dissension. His speeches breathed the spirit of genuine patriotism and contributed largely to solidifying public sentiment in support of the Government. After the war he served as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention that in 1868 nominated Governor Horatio Seymour for President and General Frank P. Blair for Vice-President. He died at Logansport, November 29, 1892.

JOHN PETTIT'S LONG PUBLIC SERVICE.

With absolute truthfulness it may be said that Indiana fairly abounded with men of unusual ability and eminent qualification for public service. This circumstance confirms the view not infrequently expressed that if a nation wants strong and able men there must be trials and tribulations; even poverty can hardly be considered a drawback in the development of individual stamina. Certain it is that if there had been three or four times the number of important stations to fill no scarcity of material would have been found to exist to fill them all, and fill them well.

John Pettit came within this category. Born in Sacketts Harbor, N. Y., June 24, 1807, he fitted himself for the law, and after admission to the bar, acted upon Horace Greeley's advice: "Go West, young man, and grow up with the country." He located in Lafayette, Ind., where he began practice in 1838. His public career began with two terms in the Legislature. He was appointed United States District Attorney, and from that position was advanced to three terms in Congress, serving continuously from March 4, 1843, to March 3, 1849. In 1850 he was chosen a delegate to the constitutional convention and helped to frame the present constitution. As an elector he helped to cast Indiana's vote for Pierce and King in 1852, and the following year he was elected United States Senator to fill the latter part of Whitcomb's unexpired term. During the troublous days of the Kansas-Nebraska fight he was appointed Chief Justice of the United States courts in Kansas. After some years of release from public life he was, in 1870, elected a member of the Supreme Court of Indiana, which position he filled with marked ability. He died at Lafayette, January 17, 1877. Judge Pettit was a big man, physically as well as mentally.

RE-ELECTION OF GOVERNOR WHITCOMB IN 1846

EVENTS of magnitude, of tremendous importance, followed one another in quick succession since the election and inauguration of President Polk. Persons who, during the campaign of 1844, derisively asked, "Who the deuce is James K. Polk?" had their minds disabused as to his qualification and fitness for the high office to which he was chosen over the gifted, eloquent and idolized Henry Clay. Though nominated as a "dark horse," James K. Polk had made an enviable record, as member of Congress from 1825 to 1839, as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, as Speaker of the House during a most exciting period of federal legislation, and as Governor of Tennessee. His inaugural address, replete with sound sentiment, strong common sense, lofty patriotism, and enunciation of high purposes, was read with amazement by those who had sought to belittle him and with satisfaction and supreme pleasure by those who believed him to be worthy of filling the chair vacated eight years before by that other sturdy Tennesseean, Andrew Jackson.

The tariff, as will be remembered, was one of the main issues in the campaign of 1844. Up to this time no clearer or more forceful exposition of the real Democratic position on that question had been made by any public man authorized to speak for the party than that set forth in President Polk's inaugural address. In view of the fact that the views therein expressed were subsequently made the basis of the "Walker tariff," some extracts from the Polk inaugural address will be found both interesting and instructive. Note the simplicity, clearness and vigor of this elucidation of the Government's authority to levy taxes upon imports:

"One of the difficulties which we have had to encounter in the practical administration of the Government consists in the adjustment of our revenue laws and the levy of the taxes necessary for the support of Government. In the general proposition that no more money shall be collected than the necessities of an economical administration shall require all parties seem to acquiesce. Nor does there seem to be any material difference of opinion as to the absence of right in the Government to tax one section of country, or one class of citizens, or one occupation, for the mere profit of another. 'Justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.' I have heretofore declared to my fellow-citizens that 'in my judgment it is the duty of the Government to extend, as far as it may be practicable to do so, by its revenue laws and all other means within its power, fair and just protection to all the great interests of the whole Union, embracing agriculture, manufactures, the mechanic arts, commerce, and navigation.' I have also declared my opinion to be 'in favor of a tariff for revenue,' and that 'in adjusting the details of such a tariff I have sanctioned such moderate discriminating duties as would produce the amount of revenue needed and at the same time afford reasonable incidental protection to our home industry,' and that I was 'opposed to a tariff for protection merely, and not for revenue.'

"The power 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises' was an indispensable one to be conferred on the Federal Government, which without it would possess no means of providing for its own support. In executing this power by levying a tariff of duties for the support of Government, the raising of revenue should be the object and protection the incident. To reverse this principle and make protection the object and revenue the incident would be to inflict manifest injustice upon all other than the protected interests. In levying duties for revenue it is doubtless proper to make such discriminations within the revenue principle as will afford incidental protection to our home interests. Within the revenue limit there is a discretion to discriminate; beyond that limit the rightful exercise of the power is not conceded. The incidental protection afforded to our home interests by discriminations within the revenue range it is believed will be ample. In making discriminations all our home interests should as far as practicable be equally protected. The largest portion of our people are agriculturists. Others are employed in manufactures, commerce, navigation and the mechanic arts. They are all engaged in their respective pursuits, and their joint labors constitute the national or home industry. To tax one branch of this home industry for the benefit of another would be unjust. No one of these interests can rightfully claim an advantage over the others, or to be enriched by impoverishing the others. All are equally entitled to the fostering care and protection of the Government. In exercising a sound discretion in levying discriminating duties within the limit prescribed, care should be taken that it be done in a manner not to benefit the wealthy few at the expense of the toiling millions by taxing lowest the luxuries of life, or articles of superior quality and high price, which can only be consumed by the wealthy, and highest the necessities of life, or articles of coarse quality and low price, which the poor and great mass of our people must consume. The burdens of government should as far as practicable be distributed justly and equally among all classes of our population. These general views, long entertained on this subject, I have deemed it proper to reiterate. It is a subject upon which conflicting interests of sections and occupations are supposed to exist, and a spirit of mutual concession and compromise in adjusting its details should be cherished by every part of our widespread country as the only means of preserving harmony and a cheerful acquiescence of all in the operation of our revenue laws. Our patriotic citizens in every part of the Union will readily submit to the payment of such taxes as shall be needed for the support of their Government, whether in peace or in war, if they are so levied as to distribute the burdens as equally as possible among them."

Whatever conflict of opinion there may exist with reference to federal taxation, there can be no question as to the views set forth in the foregoing extracts always having served as a guidance to Democratic legislation in framing laws to raise revenue for carrying on the machinery of the general government.

The public mind during this time was largely engrossed with "burning questions" relating to the Mexican war, the annexation of Texas, the Oregon dispute, etc. Opinions differed widely. In regard to Mexico and Texas, the slavery question became an important factor. Those who were radically opposed to the opening of any more slave territory were irreconcilably against the annexation of Texas. Those who were content with the policy of admitting into the Union territories in pairs, one with slavery and the other without, generally favored the annexation of Texas and waging war upon Mexico for a variety of wrongs and outrages perpetrated by the Mexicans. In Indiana so prominent a Whig leader as Henry S. Lane, who in later years (1856) presided over the first national convention of the newly organized Republican party and who in 1860 was chosen Governor, was not only an earnest and enthusiastic champion of the war against Mexico, but became actively engaged in the enlistment of volunteers. In his speeches, made to arouse the war spirit of Indiana, he bitterly attacked the Whig leaders who opposed the Mexican war. He personally organized a company, was made major of the regiment of which his company constituted a part, was subsequently promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy, and served gallantly to the end of his regiment's enlistment. In Ohio, on the other hand, many of the Whig leaders were violently opposed to the war with Mexico. The foremost among them, Thomas Corwin, for many years a distinguished member of Congress and several times elected Governor of that Commonwealth, vehemently opposed and bitterly denounced the Mexican war. Elected to the United States Senate in 1844, and noted for his eloquence and power of oratory, he created a sensation by delivering a speech on the Mexican war question in the course of which he exclaimed: "If I were a Mexican as I am an American, I would welcome you with bloody hands to hospitable graves." This unpatriotic declaration was deprecated by many of his friends and admirers and had the effect of greatly diminishing and eventually destroying the popularity he had enjoyed for so many years.

Governor Whitcomb made an excellent record as chief executive. His persistent, well-directed efforts to repair the injury inflicted upon the State and its credit by the bungling and impracticable methods adopted under Whig administrations met with high appreciation. So, when the time came for naming his successor, there was no diversity of opinion in his party as to the advisability of renominating James Whitcomb for Governor. As his running mate Paris C. Dunning was named. The election in August shows this result:

FOR GOVERNOR.

|--|--------|
| James Whitcomb, Democrat..... | 64,104 |

The official returns as given in the report of the Secretary of State for 1846 vary from the above. The figures therein given are:

Edward E. Moore, in his "A Century of Indiana," bestows this well-deserved tribute upon the recipient of the popular endorsement above recorded: "It was during Governor Whitcomb's administration that the compromise with the State's creditors was arrived at, whereby the Wabash and Erie Canal, together with the canal lands granted by the Government, and other rights and franchises, were transferred in discharge of one-half of the State's indebtedness, and new bonds, at a lower rate of interest, issued for the remaining half. With this settlement confidence was restored, and the panic having spent its force, prosperity began gradually to return."

December 27, 1848, Governor Whitcomb was elected a Senator of the United States. He thereupon resigned as Governor and was succeeded by Paris C. Dunning, Lieutenant-Governor, who served as Governor during the remainder of the term. In 1849 Joseph A. Wright, Democrat, was elected Governor.

THE CAMPAIGN OF 1848

THE SLAVERY QUESTION CAUSED A SERIOUS SPLIT IN THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

QUEER circumstances arose in 1848. The two leading parties, Whig and Democratic, came near agreeing, in the main, on the slavery question, although the Whigs generally opposed the war against Mexico and were anything but pleased over the annexation of Texas. The campaign was a queer one in this, that the successful aspirant to the Presidency was a slaveholder and that whatever fame attached to his name was acquired in the Mexican war, which most of those who voted for him, especially in the North, had bitterly opposed.

The annexation of Texas had been approved by President Tyler shortly before the inauguration of President Polk. It was an open secret that one of the purposes of the war against Mexico was to get a slice of that country with a view to making slave territory thereof. In annexing Texas a stipulation was incorporated into the treaty that the "Lone Star State" might be cut up into five separate and distinct States. Had this program been carried fully into effect, the slave power in the Union would have been largely increased. But it wasn't. Texas was not subdivided, and none of the territory taken from Mexico became "consecrated" to slavery. To guard against the latter contingency an amendment to the bill appropriating $22,000,000 for a treaty of peace with Mexico, commonly known as the "Wilmot Proviso," was tacked on through the instrumentality of such anti-slavery Democrats as David Wilmot of Pennsylvania and Judge Brinckerhoff of Ohio, expressly forbidding the introduction of slavery in any part of the territory that might be acquired from Mexico. Though this amendment, adopted by the House, was never formally concurred in by the Senate, it accomplished its purpose in an indirect manner. The vote in the House was quite decisive, 83 to 64, only three Democrats from the non-slave-holding States voting against it. General Lewis Cass, nominated for the Presidency by the Democrats in 1848, had declared himself in favor of the "Wilmot Proviso," but subsequently modified his opinion on that subject, doubtless with a view to propitiating the South. This, however, did not prove helpful to him in the campaign. The anti-slavery Democrats used this change of attitude effectively against him by showing that the "Wilmot Proviso" was but a repetition of the clause prohibiting slavery that was put into the ordinance of 1787 by Thomas Jefferson, when the Northwestern Territory was ceded by Virginia to the United States.

The Democratic National Convention met at Baltimore on the 22d day of May, 1848. It was presided over by Andrew Stevenson of Kentucky. The two-thirds vote was adopted by a vote of 175 to 78. Complications had arisen in the State of New York that resulted in sending two delegations to the Baltimore convention, one dominated by Daniel S. Dickinson, the other by Samuel J. Tilden. The latter made a strong representation of regularity; the Dickinson delegation represented the administration element. The ill feeling between the two factions, one called the "Barnburners," the other the "Hunkers," was intensified by the circumstance that Senator Silas Wright, dearly beloved by the New York Democracy, after having declined the nomination for the Vice-Presidency in 1844—made to conciliate the Van Buren element in 1844—was subsequently induced to accept the nomination for Governor that year. This arrangement had the effect of reconciling the Van Burenites and of carrying the State handsomely for Polk and Dallas as well as for Silas Wright for Governor. Two years later, when put in the field for re-election, Governor Wright met with overwhelming defeat. Responsibility for this humiliation was laid at the door of the "Hunkers." Intense bitterness was engendered, and when the time came for appointing delegates to the national convention the "Barnburners" had things pretty much their own way. But the "Hunkers," under the skillful leadership of Daniel S. Dickinson, organized their forces and appointed a contesting delegation. They charged the "Barnburners" with being antagonistic to the established policy of the party with reference to the slavery question and as being hostile to the Polk administration. The wrangle over the disputing delegations from the Empire State lasted two days. After an intensely acrimonious debate a motion was finally adopted by a vote of 126 to 124 to admit both delegations, each to cast half of the vote of the State. Though this was deemed a comparative victory for the "Barnburners," they withdrew from the convention, and the "Hunkers" considerately declined to participate in the further deliberations of that body.

The leading candidates for the Presidential nomination were Lewis Cass of Michigan, James Buchanan of Pennsylvania and Levi Woodbury of New Hampshire. A few scattering votes were cast for Vice-President George M. Dallas of Pennsylvania, W. J. Worth of Texas, John C. Calhoun of South Carolina and W. O. Butler of Kentucky. Necessary to a choice on the first and second ballots, 168; on the third and fourth, 169. Cass received 125 votes on the first ballot, 133 on the second, 156 on the third, and 179 on the fourth—ten more than necessary. Buchanan's vote was 55, 54, 40, 33; Woodbury's, 53, 56, 53, 38. Cass was declared duly nominated on the fourth ballot, whereupon the convention took a recess until the evening to place in nomination a candidate for Vice-President. William O. Butler of Kentucky was largely in the lead on the first ballot, receiving 114 votes, as against 74 for J. A. Quitman of Mississippi, 24 for John T. Mason of Virginia, 29 for William R. King of Alabama, 13 for James J. McKay of North Carolina and one for Jefferson Davis of Mississippi. A second ballot was ordered and Butler was honored with an unanimous nomination.

For a platform the convention adopted a declaration of principles embodying (in condensed form) these points:

"1. That the American Democracy place their trust in the intelligence, the patriotism, and the discriminating justice of the American people. 2. We regard this (trust) as a distinctive feature of our political creed . . . and contrast it with the creed and practice of federalism, under whatever name or form. . . . 3. The Democratic party . . . renew and reassert before the American people the declaration of principles avowed by them on a former occasion." (Here follow resolutions 1, 2, 3 and 4, of 1840). . . . 8. 'No more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, and for the gradual but certain extinction of the debt. . . . (Here follows resolution 5, of 1840, with the addition): "And that the results of Democratic legislation, in this and all other financial measures . . . have demonstrated . . . their soundness, safety and utility in all business pursuits.'" (Here follow resolutions 7, 8 and 9, of 1840, and 10 and 11, of 1844). 15, 16 and 17. Justify the war with Mexico, and compliments the army for its service therein. 18. Tenders fraternal congratulations to the National Convention of the Republic of France. 19. Declares the duty of the Democratic party 'to sustain and advance among us constitutional liberty, equality and fraternity, by continuing to resist all monopolies.'

. . . 20. Orders a copy of these resolutions to be forwarded to the French Republic. 21. Recapitulates the chief measures of Polk's administration and declares that 'it would be a fatal error to weaken the bands of a political organization by which these great reforms have been achieved, and risk them in the hands of their known adversaries.' . . . 22. Compliments and congratulates President Polk. 23. Presents Lewis Cass as candidate."

When the convention adjourned the belief among delegates was quite general that the New York trouble would be adjusted somehow, as it was four years before. Their hopeful conjectures were, however, doomed to disappointment. To the more thoughtful ones among the delegates the signs of the times were ominous. The bitterness of the dispute between the New York factions had filled their minds with apprehension of dire results.

WHIGS NOMINATE TAYLOR AND FILLMORE.

Democratic troubles had not afforded much encouragement to the Whig leaders when they turned their attention to the nomination of a Presidential ticket. They recognized in General Cass a man of high character, of inflexible integrity, and of distinguished ability. He had manifested qualities of both leadership and statesmanship that at once rendered his candidacy formidable and assuring. As astute observers the Whig leaders realized that their own party was in a dilemma. Presidential timber in their ranks had become scarce for the time being. Daniel Webster was no longer considered an available quantity. By reason of his equivocal attitude on some of the "burning issues" of that period Henry Clay had forfeited the support of many of his former ardent admirers. He still had a strong hold upon popular affection, but his repeated failures in Presidential races awakened doubts in the minds of even his most devoted followers as to his further availability. No one in the North had risen to prominence and distinction to be seriously considered in connection with a Presidential nomination. General Winfield Scott had some support, but he was adjudged too "fussy" to be made a safe standard-bearer. After many earnest consultations the conclusion seems to have been reached that the "man of the hour" was General Zachary Taylor of Louisiana—"Old Rough and Ready" his adherents fondly called him. It was freely admitted, however, that he was not without flaws. He was not a man of conspicuous ability; he had no claim to large civic experience; no one pretended that he was on terms of intimacy with statesmanship. The only tangible argument in his favor was that he had made a creditable record as commander of the United States forces in subduing the Mexicans. At the same time they were confronted with the fact that the opportunity then to distinguish himself emanated from Democratic authority and favoritism by being assigned to chief command in preference to General Scott. On the other hand, the fact that he was a slaveholder and wholly without a political record made the anti-slavery men in the party feel dubious as to the advisability of making him the nominee of a party that had all along denounced as unwarranted and unjustifiable the war upon Mexico. Then the only assurance any one had that Taylor even considered himself a member of the Whig party was the somewhat vague declaration that if he had voted at the election in 1844 his ballot would have been cast for the Whig nominee, Henry Clay. Several attempts were made in the form of resolutions to bind those who had the Taylor interests in custody to something definite, but all motions and resolutions tending in that direction were promptly, arbitrarily and autocratically ruled out of order by the presiding officer of the convention, ex-Governor John M. Morehead of North Carolina. The convention met in the city of Philadelphia June 7, in what was then known as Chinese Hall. All the States except Texas were represented. After a good deal of parleying and sparring a pledge was finally obtained from the leaders of the Taylor element that if not nominated by this convention he would not be the candidate of any other party and that he would support the Whig ticket. Upon final assurances being given by a formidable array of Southern delegates that Taylor would accept the nomination, would abide by the decision of the party, and that he could safely be trusted as an exponent of the Whig party, the hero of the Mexican war was nominated for the Presidency on the fourth ballot. He had 111 votes on the first ballot, 118 on the second, 133 on the third, and 171 on the fourth. Henry Clay started out with 97, dropped to 86 on the second, 74 on the third, and to 32 on the final ballot. Winfield Scott started with 43, rose to 49 on the second ballot, to 54 on the third, and to 63 on the fourth and last. Daniel Webster's vote was 22, 22, 17, 14. The Taylorites were considerably chagrined over their inability to secure the adoption of a resolution to make the nomination unanimous, but some of the New England and Ohio delegates expressed themselves so emphatically against such approval of an unsatisfactory nomination that the attempt had to be abandoned. These delegates subsequently identified themselves with the Van Buren Freesoil movement, thereby (unwittingly and indirectly) bringing about the election of the very man whose nomination they refused to permit to be made unanimous. It was Van Buren's candidacy that made possible Zachary Taylor's election.

Among the sorest of the participants of the convention was Horace Greeley, sage, philosopher, and editor of the New York Tribune. This truckling to the slave power was galling to that fearless journalist and pronounced champion of the anti-slavery cause. When it was determined not to adopt a platform, by reason of the existing diversity of opinion, and of fear to make any sort of expression on the slavery question, Greeley left Philadelphia in disgust and repaired to his sanctum sanctorum in New York to indite a scathing denunciation of the cowardliness of the Whig convention. In terms characteristic of that master journalist the nomination of General Taylor was bitterly denounced in the Tribune. The article was headed "The Philadelphia Slaughterhouse." It was a terrific arraignment of political cowardice and imbecility and caused a tremendous sensation for the time being. As time wore on and the Van Buren movement began to assume formidable proportions, Greeley's indignation subsided somewhat. Though in hearty accord with Van Buren on the slavery question, he had fought him for so many years and had denounced him so unsparingly as a scheming trimmer and foxy trickster that he could not reconcile himself to the thought of establishing political fellowship with the Sage of Kinderhook. By and by he banished the unpleasant features of the Philadelphia convention from his recollection and gradually adjusted himself to the support of Taylor and Fillmore. The warmth of this support was somewhat augmented when the New York Whigs caused him to be nominated to an unexpired term in Congress. The propriety and expediency of conferring this honor upon Horace Greeley was at the election affirmed by a gratifyingly decisive majority.

There was quite a strife for the Vice-Presidential nomination. Abbott Lawrence, a New England millionaire, was an active candidate. His chief if not only claim to such mark of distinction was the possession of a large-sized "bar'l" which he gave the managers to understand could be freely tapped as the emergencies of the campaign might require. To the credit of the convention be it said these distinctively commercial advances were respectfully but firmly rejected. On the second ballot the nomination for Vice-President was conferred on Millard Fillmore of Buffalo, N. Y. He was an ardent supporter of Henry Clay, and the convention deemed it "good politics" to placate the admirers of the eloquent Kentuckian by nominating one of their number for second place. Fillmore was a much abler man than Taylor. Struggling with adversity in his youth, he forged rapidly to the front after he had equipped himself for the bar and had served three years as member of the New York Legislature. Three times he was elected to Congress, declining a renomination to a fourth term. He was the Whig candidate for Governor in 1844 and defeated by Silas Wright. In 1847 he was elected State Comptroller. Then followed his nomination and election to the Vice-Presidency of the United States and his subsequent accession to the Presidency.

While a member of Congress, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, he framed the tariff of 1842. This tariff act is popularly assumed to have been the product of Henry Clay, but Fillmore was its real author. It is interesting to note, right here, what were Mr. Fillmore's views on the tariff after becoming President upon the death of Zachary Taylor. In his first annual message, dated December 2, 1850, President Fillmore made this reference to the tariff:

"A high tariff can never be permanent. It will cause dissatisfaction, and will be changed. It excludes competition, and thereby invites the investment of capital in manufactures to such excess that when changed it brings distress, bankruptcy and ruin upon all who have been misled by its faithless protection. What the manufacturer wants is uniformity and permanency, that he may feel a confidence that he is not to be ruined by sudden changes. But to make a tariff uniform and permanent it is not only necessary that the laws should not be altered, but that the duty should not fluctuate. To effect this all duties should be specific wherever the nature of the article is such as to admit of it. Ad valorem duties fluctuate with the price and offer strong temptations to fraud and perjury. Specific duties, on the contrary, are equal and uniform in all ports and at all times, and offer a strong inducement to the importer to bring the best article, as he pays no more duty upon that than upon one of inferior quality. I therefore strongly recommend a modification of the present tariff, which has prostrated some of our most important and necessary manufactures, and that specific duties be imposed sufficient to raise the requisite revenue, making such discriminations in favor of the industrial pursuits of our own country as to encourage home production without excluding foreign competition. It is also important that an unfortunate provision in the present tariff, which imposes a much higher duty upon the raw material that enters into our manufactures than upon the manufactured article, should be remedied."

The first sentence in this quotation must be startling to those who have labored under the impression that the advocates of a protective tariff in the days of Clay, Webster, Greeley and Kelley were as rapacious as are the apologists for and defenders of the tariff devised by Dingley and later on made more extortionate by Aldrich and Payne. Ponder over these declarations: "A high tariff can never be permanent. . . . It brings distress, bankruptcy and ruin upon all who have been misled by its faithless protection." And kindly note, also, that there is no complaint whatsoever in the Fillmore message about the rates in the Walker tariff of 1846 being too low. The chief contention made by President Fillmore was that duties be made specific, instead of ad valorem. On this branch of the subject there always have been differences of opinion among protectionists as well as among revenue reformers.

As already stated, no platform was adopted by the convention proper. But at a mass meeting held after the convention had adjourned a sort of political manifesto was promulgated, of which the following is a comprehensive epitome:

"1. Ratifies nomination of Zachary Taylor as President and Millard Fillmore as Vice-President. 2. Expresses joy at finding Mr. Taylor's opinions conservative and faithful 'to the great example of former days, and to the principles of the Constitution as administered by the founders.' 3. That General Taylor, in saying that, had he voted in 1844, he would have voted the Whig ticket, gives us assurance . . . that the heart that was with us then is with us now. 4. That we look on his administration of the Government as one conducive of peace, prosperity and union. . . . 5. That standing, as the Whig party does, on the broad and firm platform of the Constitution, braced up by all its inviolable and sacred guarantees and compromises . . . we are proud to have as the exponent of our opinions one . . . who has said . . . 'that he will make Washington's administration his model.' 6. Is occupied with a brief recital of Taylor's military services. 7. Asks united, zealous, resolute co-operation of all Whigs 'in behalf of our candidate, whom calumny cannot reach, and with respectful demeanor to our adversaries, whose candidates have yet to prove their claims on the gratitude of the nation.'

"1. 'I reiterate,' said Taylor, 'what I have so often said: I am a Whig. If elected, I would not be the mere President of a party. . . . 2. The power given by the Constitution to the executive to interpose his veto is a high conservative power, but in my opinion should never be exercised except in cases of clear violation of the Constitution, or manifest haste and want of consideration by the Congress . . . 3. Upon the subject of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes and harbors, the will of the people, as expressed through their representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the executive. 4. I sincerely rejoice at the prospect of peace. . . . The principles of our Government, as well as its true policy, are opposed to the subjugation of other nations and the dismemberment of other countries by conquest.'"

VAN BUREN AND ADAMS TICKET IN LIMITED POPULAR FAVOR.

After much earnest consultation the "Barnburners'" delegation to the Baltimore convention and others who were in sympathy and accord with them decided upon holding a State convention at Utica, N. Y., June 22, and inviting thereto delegates from other States for the purpose of definitely determining what course to pursue to promote the cause in which they had enlisted. Delegates from Massachusetts, Connecticut, Ohio and Wisconsin attended this conference and convention. After two days of earnest deliberation Martin Van Buren was formally nominated for President and Senator Henry Dodge of Wisconsin for Vice-President. Senator Dodge was a native of Vincennes, Ind., had a good deal to do with Indian affairs, served as Territorial Governor of Wisconsin, was three times sent to Congress, elected Governor in 1846 and chosen United States Senator in 1848. He was "quite a man" and would have added much strength to the ticket had he concluded to "stick." He was in sympathy with the Freesoil movement, but believed in party "regularity" and had a very high opinion of General Cass. These considerations impelled him to decline the proffered honor and to give his support to Cass and Butler. Van Buren, on the other hand, readily accepted the nomination, which acceptance served as notice to the country at large and the Democracy in particular that the voice of the anti-slavery men would be heard and felt at the November election.

This movement grew rapidly in popular favor, so much so that the leaders declared it to be expedient to convene a much more representative body to complete the ticket of the Freesoil party. Accordingly such a gathering was held at Buffalo, N. Y., on the 9th of August. It was largely attended and had accredited representatives from seventeen of the thirty States.

Charles Francis Adams of Massachusetts presided. John P. Hale of New Hampshire had already been nominated for the Presidency of the Abolition party. He was a United States Senator at the time and had won a national reputation. There was a strong sentiment in his favor and he developed remarkable strength when the convention proceeded to a ballot. Van Buren's nomination was favored by 159 delegates and Hale's by 129. Charles Francis Adams was by acclamation named for Vice-President. Mr. Hale was so delighted over the platform submitted to the convention that immediately after its adoption he formally withdrew as the Presidential nominee of the Abolitionists and throughout the campaign gave earnest support to the Van Buren-Adams ticket.

The platform, unanimously and vociferously adopted by the convention, consisted of nineteen planks, of which thirteen related to the slavery question. It had evidently been prepared with great care. Every sentence in it seems to have had painstaking consideration. Persons familiar with the writings of Samuel J. Tilden would at once detect in the phraseology of this pronouncement the master mind of the Sage of Gramercy. Every phase of the slavery question was treated with sublime courage and absolute fearlessness. In terms that could neither be misunderstood nor misinterpreted the slave power was notified that concessions to it were already too generous and that henceforth no more slave territory could be created under the forms of law. And there wasn't!

Epitomized, this document presented to the consideration of the American people this declaration of principles:

"Freesoil Platform of 1848.—An eloquent and impassioned appeal, in a three-fold preamble and sixteen resolutions, against the extension of slavery, from which the following are brief extracts: 'A common resolve to maintain the rights of free labor against the aggressions of the slave power, and to secure free soil to a free people.' 'We propose no interference by Congress with slavery within the limits of any State.' 'It was the settled policy of the nation (from 1784 to 1800) not to extend, nationalize or encourage . . . slavery, and to this policy . . . the Government ought to return.' 'Congress has no more power to make a slave than to make a king.' 'The only safe means of preventing the extension of slavery into territory now free is to prevent its extension into such territory by an act of Congress.' 'We accept the issue which the slave power has forced upon us; and to their demand for more slave States and more slave territory, our calm but final answer is, no more slave States and no more slave territory.' 'There must be no more compromises with slavery; if made, they must be repealed.' 'We demand cheap postage for the people.' 'River and harbor improvements . . . are objects of national concern.' 'The free grant to actual settlers . . . of reasonable portions of the public lands, under suitable limitations, is a wise and just measure of public policy.' 'Honor and patriotism require the earliest practical payment of the public debt.' 'We inscribe on our banner, "Free Soil, Free Speech, Free Labor and Free Men," and under it we will fight on, and fight ever, until a triumphant victory shall reward our exertions.'"

Several other tickets had been placed in the field, but after the Buffalo convention no attention was bestowed upon these offshoots. It soon became apparent that the American people were intent on making their choice of favorites from the three tickets named. The Van Buren ticket rapidly gained in popular support. At first the Taylor-Fillmore leaders feared that more anti-slavery Whigs than Democrats might vote the Van Buren ticket, but after any number of prominent Democrats had declared themselves for the Buffalo ticket the Taylorites mustered courage and gradually assumed an air of confidence. In the main the campaign was fairly decently conducted. The hottest partisan battle was fought in Georgia, where Alexander H. Stephens, who thirteen years later, in 1861, was made Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy, led the Taylor forces. Stephens was physically diminutive but lion-hearted as to courage. During the campaign he had a personal encounter with Judge Francis Cone of Greensboro. The difficulty grew out of a quarrel on the Clayton compromise of 1848. Cone cut Stephens terribly with a knife, and cried: "Now, damn you, retract, or I'll cut your throat!" The bleeding, almost dying Stephens cried: "Never! Cut!" and grasped the swiftly descending knife blade in his right hand. That hand never again wrote plainly. Few of the witnesses of the affair, which occurred on the piazza of Thompson's Hotel, Atlanta, expected him to recover. He did, however, in time to make a speech in favor of Zachary Taylor for the Presidency, the carriage being drawn to the stand by the people. This affray doubtless had some effect on the vote of Georgia. Stephens was dearly beloved by the people of that Commonwealth. Georgia was throughout the campaign in the doubtful column. When the votes were counted Taylor had 2,742 more than Cass. Quite helpful to the Taylorites was the result of the State election in Pennsylvania in October. The Keystone State had been considered safe for Cass, but when the Whig candidate for Governor carried it by 305 majority Democratic confidence began to waver. At the November election Taylor and Fillmore were triumphant in Pennsylvania by a plurality of 14,337 and by a majority of 3,074 over both Cass and Van Buren.

Of the popular vote Taylor had 1,360,101; Cass, 1,220,544; Van Buren, 291,263. Of the electoral vote Taylor received 163; Cass, 127; Van Buren, none. Of the fifteen Southern States Taylor carried eight; Cass, seven. There were then just as many slave States as free States—thirty in all. Of the Northern States Cass carried eight; Taylor, seven. Every State west of Pennsylvania—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin—went for Cass. Down East Cass carried New Hampshire and Maine—due to the relatively large Van Buren vote. Van Buren's strength was greatest in New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio. In Massachusetts, New York and Vermont Van Buren received more votes than Cass. Relatively the poorest showing made by Van Buren was in New Jersey, where he polled only 829 votes; in Rhode Island he had 730. In the South Van Buren was credited with eighty votes in Delaware, 125 in Maryland, and nine in Virginia. The State that divided its vote nearest equally was Wisconsin, which gave Cass 15,001; Taylor, 13,747; Van Buren, 10,418.

As to the effect of the election, it may be said to have been nil. The only significance about it was the vote cast for Van Buren and the platform upon which he stood. Not a single slave territory was thereafter organized or admitted into the Union. But for twelve long years the nation experienced the liveliest fight over the slavery question that had been witnessed during its entire existence. As for the Whig party—well, it succeeded in electing its candidate for the Presidency in 1848 by putting forth a negative quantity, a slaveholder whose only prestige was that of having won in the Mexican war, which Whigs had all along denounced as an outrage and a national disgrace. They were unable to control either house of Congress, were literally snowed under in the next Presidential contest, and saw the party go to pieces in 1854.

INDIANA IN THE CAMPAIGN OF 1848.

For the purpose of organizing for the Presidential campaign of 1848 the Indiana Democracy met in State convention at Indianapolis on historic Jackson Day, the 8th of January. Hon. J. G. Read of Clark officiated as temporary chairman. A committee on permanent organization was created. This committee consisted of one from each of the ten Congressional districts, as follows:

A. L. Robinson of Vanderburg county, J. S. Sullivan of Clark county, S. F. Covington, Joseph Leach of Union county, Major Z. Tannehill of Bartholomew county, John W. Cox of Morgan, M. L. Roach of Parke county, Thomas Smiley of Tippecanoe county, J. J. Shryock of Fulton county, Frank P. Randall of Allen county.

Through its chairman, A. L. Robinson, this committee named the following gentlemen as permanent officers of the convention:

The State Central Committee for this year's campaign consisted of Dr. Livingston Dunlap, General David Reynolds, Colonel James P. Drake, George A. Chapman, E. N. Skinner, William Sullivan and Charles Mayer.

Tenth—Frank P. Randall, Allen; Samuel S. Mickle, Adams. Contingent: Madison Marsh.

The importance of naming an exceptionally strong electoral ticket seems to have been duly impressed upon the convention. The gentlemen selected were men of high standing and of much more than local prominence. For electors for the State at large the convention named two men, one of whom (Mr. Owen) had already served two terms in Congress, and a presiding judge (Mr. Chamberlain), who later on was elected to Congress in 1852. Among the district electors were several who had also filled important public positions. In its entirety the electoral ticket was thus constituted:

FOR ELECTORS AT LARGE.

Robert Dale Owen of Posey county.
Ebenezer M. Chamberlain of Elkhart county.

DISTRICT ELECTORS.

1. Nathaniel Albertson, Harrison county.
2. Cyrus L. Dunham, Washington.
3. William M. McCarty, Franklin.

4. Charles H. Test, Wayne.
5. James Ritchie, Johnson.
6. George W. Carr, Lawrence.
7. James M. Hanna, Clay.
8. Daniel Mace, Tippecanoe.
9. Graham N. Fitch, Cass.
10. Andrew J. Harlan, Grant.

Heading the electoral ticket, and having attained an enviable reputation as a forceful public speaker, Robert Dale Owen played an important part in this campaign. He was the subject of vigorous attack by the opposition generally and of vindictive denunciation by unscrupulous partisan publications. When his critics found themselves unable effectively to combat his political philosophy, they sought to neutralize the force of his argument by branding him an "infidel lecturer." These shafts had, however, failed utterly to disturb his equanimity. He recalled the fact that Thomas Jefferson was in his day assailed and maligned in like manner and that dismay fell upon the heads of his traducers when the illustrious author of the Declaration of Independence met their accusations with this incisive rejoinder and refutation:

"As to the calumny of Atheism, I am so broken to calumnies of every kind, from every department of government, Executive, Legislative and Judiciary, and from every minion of theirs holding office or seeking it, that I entirely disregard it. . . . It has been so impossible to contradict all their lies, that I am determined to contradict none; for while I should be engaged with one, they would publish twenty new ones.

"Had the doctrines of Jesus been preached always as pure as they came from His lips, the whole civilized world would now have been Christian.

"To the corruptions of Christianity I am indeed opposed; but not to the genuine precepts of Jesus Himself; I am a Christian in the only sense He wished any one to be; sincerely attached to His doctrines in preference to all others; ascribing to Himself every human excellence; and believing he never claimed any other.

"The greatest of all reformers of the depraved religion of His own country was Jesus of Nazareth. Abstracting what is really his from the rubbish in which it is buried, easily distinguished by its lustre from the dross of His biographers, and as separable from that as the diamond from the dunghill, we have the outlines of a system of the most sublime morality which has fallen from the lips of man; outlines which it is lamentable He did not fill up. Epictetus and Epicurus give laws for governing ourselves, Jesus a supplement of the duties and charities we owe to others."

Even a character so gentle as that of the revered Abraham Lincoln did not in the days of his struggles escape the sting of the tongue of vituperation and slander. Chagrined over intimations and innuendos that he was indifferent and derelict as to the performance of religious service, his great mind impelled his gentle heart to unbosom itself in this soulful manner:

"I have never united myself to any church because I have found difficulty in giving my assent without mental reservation to the long, complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterize their articles of belief and confessions of faith. Whenever any church will inscribe over its altar as its sole qualification for membership the Savior's condensed statement of the substance of both law and gospel, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself,' that church will I join with all my heart and all my soul."

Note how happily this blends with the sentiments expressed by Thomas Jefferson!

General Cass carried the State by a plurality of 4,838. The total vote cast was 152,752, of which Cass received 74,745; Taylor, 69,907; Van Buren, 8,100.

Though there was a strong Van Buren sentiment in Indiana, the nomination of General Cass met the approval and approbation of an overwhelming majority of the Democratic party. There were several reasons for this: Cass was personally very popular in Indiana. He had repeatedly visited the State, and on various occasions rendered valuable service to its people. This was particularly so in the adjustment of difficulties with the Indians. His counsel with reference to the construction of public thoroughfares was deemed of incalculable value. Then the fact that he was a Westerner and resident of an adjoining State weighed heavily in his favor. But above all else he was esteemed as a high-minded gentleman, wise legislator and patriotic statesman. On the slavery question he was in accord with prevailing public sentiment: conservative. This made him acceptable to the vast majority of the party. The result of the November election fully corroborated the judgment formed by those who in convention so earnestly labored for the nomination of General Cass on the ground of availability.

Among Van Buren's most earnest and enthusiastic supporters was General John H. Cravens of Ripley county, who was a Whig presidential elector in 1840 and who represented his district in Congress from 1841 to 1843 as a Whig. On account of his pronounced anti-slavery views he left the Whig party, supported Van Buren for the Presidency, and was the Free-soil candidate for Governor in 1849. In later years he served with distinction in the war for the Union.

Ovid Butler, as Chairman of the Free-soil Committee, issued the call for a State convention at Indianapolis August 3 for the purpose of effecting an organization and naming delegates to the Buffalo convention. The same month a Van Buren paper, called The Free-soil Banner, was established at Indianapolis by W. B. Greer and L. Wallace, two young anti-slavery men and former Whigs. In view of the after effect of the Van Buren movement an analysis of the Presidential vote of Indiana, by counties, will prove quite instructive.

GOVERNOR JOSEPH A. WRIGHT

SPLENDIDLY MAINTAINS STATE LEADERSHIP THROUGHOUT SEVEN YEARS

MARKED and pronounced as was the ill feeling between Senator Bright and Governor Wright, each of these distinguished Indiana Democrats seemed to have been able to accomplish his main purpose, at least when highest interests were at stake. Doubtless Governor Wright would have been delighted to have shortened the Senatorial career of Bright; equally certain it is that the latter would have experienced unbounded satisfaction had it been in his power to prevent Joseph A. Wright from being elevated to the Governorship of Indiana.

When such rivalries among politicians of the same affiliation pass under review years after the actors in these dramas have passed from earth; when cogitations are indulged in why enmities and hates are engendered among men, the thought forces itself irresistibly upon the mind that after all is done and said strife and contention are found to be inseparably associated with human efforts. Attempts at fathoming the problem why this approaches the inevitable must ever prove abortive, for wherever the eye may be turned, evidence of disharmony is perceptible here and there, if not everywhere. It has ever been thus, and unless humanity undergoes a radical change, bordering on complete transformation, it in all probability ever will be thus.

When men of mature years become involved in strife and contention, efforts at pacification or reconciliation are rarely appreciated at full value. But there is compensation in the preachment of the doctrine of forbearance and of resistance to the aggressive spirit of revengefulness. Thoroughly imbued with the belief that the gospel of amity should be proclaimed on all suitable occasions, the writer feels assured that the incorporation of this lofty sentiment into these pages will be pleasing to every reader of this book: "In wandering through your mental pleasure grounds, whenever you come upon an ugly intruder of a thought which might bloom into some poisonous emotion such as fear, envy, hate, worry, remorse, anger, and the like, there is only one right way to treat it. Pull it up like a weed; drop it upon the rubbish heap as promptly as if it were a stinging nettle; and let some harmonious thought grow in its place. There is no more reckless consumer of all kinds of exuberance than the discordant thought, and weeding it out saves such an astonishing amount of eau de vie wherewith to water the garden of joy, that with it in hand every man may be his own Burbank."

When the Democracy of Indiana assembled in State convention to nominate candidates for Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, to be elected in 1849, Senator James Whitcomb, twice elected as Governor, was chosen to preside over the assemblage. This was a fitting compliment to one of the State's really great and good men, and gave high promise of wisdom guiding the action of the convention.

As Vice-Presidents these sturdy Democrats from the ten districts were chosen:

1. Gaines H. Roberts, Warrick county.
2. John L. Morrison, Washington.
3. George Berry, Franklin.
4. George Evans, Henry.
5. Robert Hanks, Shelby.
6. Col. Willis A. Gorman, Monroe.
7. A. D. Billingsley, Putnam.
8. George H. G. Stackhouse, Tippecanoe.
9. Lot Day, St. Joseph.
10. Madison Marsh, Steuben.

Secretaries—W. B. Chase of Lafayette; Dr. E. W. H. Ellis, editor of the Goshen Democrat; Colonel William W. Tuley of New Albany, and R. D. Logan of Rushville.

Public sentiment had decided before the assembling of the convention that Joseph A. Wright of Parke county should be nominated for Governor. The people had faith in him; the people demanded his nomination. In conformity with this demand Mr. Wright was nominated amidst an outburst of enthusiasm that admitted of no doubt as to his popularity. The nomination for Lieutenant-Governor was in like manner conferred upon James H. Lane of Dearborn county.

The management of the campaign for Wright and Lane was intrusted to a State central committee, which, in point of adaptation, fitness and excellence, had not been equaled up to that time. The first name on the list was Albert G. Porter of Indianapolis, who later on served several terms in Congress, and who in 1880 was elected Governor over Franklin Landers. These are the names of the gentlemen constituting the State Committee for 1849:

NORTHERN INDIANA DEMOCRATS PIQUED.

Dr. E. W. H. Ellis was for years the most active and energetic Democrat in northern Indiana. He was an able writer and a sagacious politician. As such he wielded considerable influence. His views on the slavery question were very pronounced and he gave them vigorous expression through the columns of his paper, the Goshen Democrat, as well as in party councils. At conventions and in party caucuses he always commanded respect and usually had with him a formidable following.

Owing to the slow development of the northern part of the State and the long start had in populating southern Indiana, political power was correspondingly feeble in the northern tier of counties. Nevertheless a good deal of attention was given the northern part of the State, largely on account of the cleverness and native ability of the men who were dominant in public affairs north of the Wabash.

It so happened that when the time came for nominating a successor to Governor Whitcomb, southern Indiana Democrats, who did not look with favor upon the gubernatorial aspirations of Joseph A. Wright and James H. Lane, strong inducements were held out to Judge Ebenezer M. Chamberlain of Goshen to become a candidate for that office. He was an excellent man and the Democrats of northern Indiana held him in high esteem. Accordingly they went to the State convention with high hopes and large expectations. But it did not take them long to ascertain that the southern Indianians who induced Judge Chamberlain to become a candidate were not in position to deliver the goods. Joseph A. Wright was an exceptionally adroit politician and manipulator. Jim Lane soon discovered that there was no chance for his nomination for first place, and going upon the assumption that a half loaf is better than no bread at all, he slipped under the wings of the Wright faction and gladly accepted second place on the ticket.

When Dr. Ellis returned to his sanctum sanctorum at Goshen he took his pen in hand and formulated an editorial of a column in length in which he unmercifully blistered the hides of the southern Indiana Democrats who had promised so much and did so little to make good their promises and assurances.

Only three or four counties in the entire southern part of the State gave any of their votes to Judge Chamberlain. Dr. Ellis "ripped them wide open," yet considerately and diplomatically declared in his vitriolic pronunciamento that the nominees were good men and worthy of Democratic support. Nothing, he contended, could or would be gained by withholding support from the ticket made up of Joseph A. Wright and James H. Lane. Although Dr. Ellis a few years later severed his connection with the Democratic party on the slavery question, he was too staunch a Democrat in 1849 to think of bolting a Democratic nomination. So, after all, he had his say without tumbling outside the breastworks. Wright and Lane were triumphantly elected. After having served his term as Lieutenant-Governor, Jim Lane went to Kansas, became a howling Free-soiler, secured a seat in the United States Senate as a Republican, and for some unknown reason committed suicide. Dr. Ellis was elected State Auditor by the Legislature with the help of Governor Wright, but three years later was denied a renomination by the Democratic convention after the office had been made elective by the people. He afterward became a Republican. Governor Wright himself broke with the party in 1862, and in consideration of a scathing denunciation of his old-time associates, was by Governor Morton appointed to fill the Jesse D. Bright vacancy in the United States Senate.

Joseph A. Wright was pre-eminently a self-made man. Born at Washington, Pa., April 17, 1810, he came with his parents to Indiana, a lad of unusual promise. He evinced a strong desire for education and availed himself of the earliest opportunity to gain entrance into the State University at Bloomington. He paid his way in that institution by doing janitor's work and making himself generally useful. To earn money for buying books and clothing he hauled brick from the brick yard, did odd jobs with the trowel, and gathered nuts in the woods. In later years he prided himself considerably on the sundry allowances voted him by the Board of Trustees for repairs made about the building. Toward the close of the year 1828 he had equipped himself educationally so as to enter the law office of Judge Hester as a student. Before he was twenty years of age he obtained his license to practice law. Shortly thereafter he located at Rockville, where he hung out his shingle as an attorney at law. In 1830 he was elected a member of the Legislature, in which body he earnestly sought to promote the welfare of his constituents and the people of Indiana in general. During the "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" campaign he was promoted to the State Senate, and in 1843 the people of his district sent him to Congress. His aspirations for re-election were frustrated by the success of Edward W. McGaughey, who beat him by 171 votes. His nomination and election to the Governorship by a majority of 9,778 over so popular a man as John A. Matson was a signal triumph, in view of the aggressive factional animosity that had been arrayed against him. As Governor he did his utmost to promote the agricultural interests of the State. Largely through his efforts the State Agricultural Society was formed. In 1852 he was elected president of the State Board of Agriculture and twice re-elected. He also exerted himself to the utmost to establish a safe banking system. The State having at a previous election declared in favor of a new Constitution, by a vote of 33,173 for to 28,843 against, he interested himself earnestly to have that mandate executed with a view to assuring the framing of an organic law that would meet amply the wants and needs of this rapidly growing Commonwealth. Throughout his career he furnished unvarying proof of his firm belief in and exemplification of Carlyle's creed, "Work is the grand cure for all the maladies and miseries that ever beset mankind—honest work which you intend getting done."

The campaign made by Mr. Wright was largely intellectual. He was an excellent mixer. He made himself easily understood by the people. He never talked over their heads. And he always talked sense. One point he particularly impressed with especial emphasis upon his hearers, and that was the importance of electing the right sort of men for county commissioners and township trustees. With a twinkle in his eye he used to say: "Pick out the best man in your county for commissioner; if you have in your community some overly ambitious scapegrace who thinks he must be cared for, send him to Washington—there he'll be lost in the shuffle."

There were three tickets in the field—Democratic, Whig and Freesoil. The gubernatorial candidate of the Freesoilers was James H. Cravens of Ripley county, a former Whig Congressman, who couldn't "swallow" Taylor the year before and supported Van Buren and Adams. The vote in the State stands thus recorded:

|--------------------------------|--------|
| Joseph A. Wright, Democrat... | 76,996 |
| John A. Matson, Whig..... | 67,228 |
| James H. Cravens, Freesoiler.. | 3,018 |

FOR LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

|-------------------------------|--------|
| James H. Lane, Democrat... | 77,002 |
| Thomas S. Stanfield, Whig... | 66,385 |
| John W. Wright, Freesoiler... | 2,795 |

(This, it may be observed, was the last election held for Governor and Lieutenant-Governor only under the constitution of 1816.)

It may here be noted that under the old Constitution members of Congress were in Indiana elected in odd years. This was deemed necessary when that Constitution was framed and adopted, on account of the time required for gathering the returns and having them duly tabulated and certified. Transportation facilities in the early days were not what they became later on. In case a special session of Congress were convened, a member of that body would have found it exceedingly difficult to reach the national capital in time to answer the roll call at the opening of the session.

The year 1849 was a propitious one for the Indiana Democracy. Besides electing its candidates for Governor and Lieutenant-Governor by decisive majorities, it secured a good working majority in the Legislature and elected nine of its ten nominees for Congress. The only Democratic candidate for Congress defeated that year was G. F. Conkley, in the Seventh District, who was beaten by Edward W. McGaughey, the same man who distanced Joseph A. Wright in a previous race for Congressional honors.

ENMITY THAT DESTROYS

REPEATED DEFEATS SUBVERT A BRILLIANT ORATOR'S
EQUANIMITY

ESSE D. BRIGHT and Joseph G. Marshall were residents of the same town—historic Madison. Bright was a native of New York; Marshall of Kentucky. The father of Bright was a manufacturer of hats, and a man of great force of character; Marshall's father was a Presbyterian minister of distinguished ability. Born in a slave State, Marshall was not enamored of the institution of slavery; Bright, born in a free State, looked upon slavery as being entirely justifiable, and in course of time himself became a slave owner in Kentucky, while maintaining a residence in Indiana. Both equipped themselves for the law, and both dabbled persistently and extensively in politics. The county in which these two men lived, Jefferson, was politically Whig, yet when Bright started out to run for an elective office he rarely failed to carry the county. His political shrewdness and his ability to manipulate were a great source of strength to him in his campaigning and in his aspirations. While it is quite true that Marshall was several times sent to the Legislature from Jefferson county, it is equally true that in his larger aspirations he was uniformly unsuccessful.

Religiously, Bright was a Baptist; Marshall a Presbyterian. To what extent they permitted religion to influence their action is not a matter of record. Evidently, however, they were not guided in their daily walks of life by the sublime doctrines proclaimed in the Sermon from the Mount:

“Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you for righteousness’ sake.

“Ye have heard it said, Love your neighbor and hate your enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you.

“Ye have heard it said, An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite you on the one cheek, turn to him the other also.”

Marshall was twice chosen a member of the Legislature, in 1837 and again in 1840. At the State election in 1843 Bright was chosen Lieutenant-Governor. Albert S. White's term as United States Senator was to expire March 3, 1845. The Legislature of 1844—chosen in 1843—was to elect White's successor. The Whigs had a majority of ten on joint ballot. They nominated Marshall for Senator. The Senate was a tie. As Lieutenant-Governor and presiding officer, Bright gave the casting vote against going into an election for Senator. At the next election the Democrats obtained a majority of the Legislature and Bright managed to capture the coveted prize, securing the caucus nomination over Governor Whitcomb. In 1846 Marshall was defeated in the race for Governor. Eight years later substantially a similar condition to that of 1844 arose. Much against his wishes Marshall was induced to run for Congress in the New Albany district in 1852. He was defeated by Cyrus L. Dunham. Governor Whitcomb had been transferred from the Governorship to the United States Senate. He died in the fall of 1852. Governor Wright temporarily filled the vacancy by the appointment of his personal and political friend, Charles W. Cathcart, of Laporte county. When the Legislature of 1853 met John Pettit of Lafayette was on January 11 elected to serve during the remainder of Whitcomb's term, March 3, 1855. Bright wanted Dr. Graham N. Fitch of Logansport as his colleague. In the Legislative caucus the vote stood 54 for Pettit to 46 for Fitch. The selection of Pettit was a victory for Governor Wright and a defeat for Senator Bright. At the election of 1854 a fusion of Whigs, Know-Nothings and Freesoilers was effected. By this fusion the combined opposition had secured a majority of 14 on joint ballot. The Senate was Democratic by a majority of two. Through the intercession of Senator Bright and Lieutenant-Governor Ashbel P. Willard the Senate refused to go into joint session. The fusion members of the Legislature had agreed on electing Joseph G. Marshall for United States Senator. A joint session being refused, Marshall again was doomed to disappointment. Naturally he felt the sting of defeat quite keenly. Two years later Graham N. Fitch was elected.

In 1851 Mr. Marshall became deeply interested in the proposition to sell the State's interest in the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. He took quite an active part in the contest for the election of members of the Legislature that was to take final action on this proposition. In the course of a speech on this subject Marshall made a statement which Bright, who happened to be in attendance at this meeting, emphatically denied. Marshall reiterated his statement with considerable warmth. This episode resulted in the issuance and acceptance of a challenge to a duel at Louisville. Before the challenge was issued Marshall had purchased a bowie-knife with which, according to his own statement, he intended to kill Senator Bright while going to the postoffice for his mail. Fortunately Bright did not go for his mail at his usual time, and the threatened encounter was thus happily averted. Marshall said Bright always went armed, so no advantage would have been taken had the bowie-knife attack been actually made.

All the preliminaries for the duel at Louisville had been arranged. The combatants went by boat on the Ohio. The seconds, surgeons, etc., that had been chosen on both sides happened to be men of good common sense. By judicious parleying they managed somehow to effect an adjustment, the terms of which very properly never were divulged. Whether these two eminent antagonists ever became reconciled to one another nobody now living is able to tell.

W. W. Woollen lived in the same town with Bright and Marshall. He knew both of them quite well. In his admirable "Sketches of Early Indiana" he speaks thus of the able man of numerous disappointments and defeats:

"Scotch-Irish and cavalier blood mingled in the veins of Joseph G. Marshall. Like the North of Ireland man, he got all the contention out of a thing there was in it; and like the cavalier, he was warm-hearted, impulsive, and brave. When contending for a principle he believed to be right you would imagine him a born son of Carrickfergus; when at the fireside, or around the social board, he would impress you as one born on the banks of the York or the James. His father was a Scotch-Irishman and his mother a Virginian, so his leading characteristics were his by inheritance.

"Joseph Glass Marshall was born in Fayette county, Ky., January 18, 1800. His father was a Presbyterian minister, and he thoroughly indoctrinated the son in the principles of the Scottish Church. He was fitted for college at home, entering Transylvania University as a junior, and graduating from that institution in 1823. In 1828 he came to Indiana and settled at Madison, where he resided until he died. He had studied law in Kentucky, and although a young man in a town noted for the strength of its bar, he soon obtained a lucrative practice. Two years after coming to Indiana he was elected Probate Judge of his county, and discharged the duties of the office with signal ability. When he left the judgeship he returned to the bar. In 1836, 1840 and 1844 he was on the Whig electoral ticket, and each time made an active canvass of the State. In 1846 he was nominated for Governor and was beaten by James Whitcomb 3,958 votes. In 1849 President Taylor appointed him Governor of Oregon, but he refused the place. Before declining, however, he went to Washington and personally thanked the President for the tender of the office. In 1850 he was elected Senator from his county, and served the legal term. In 1852, much against his wishes, he was nominated for Congress in his district, and was beaten by Cyrus L. Dunham 931 votes. This was the last race he made before the people. In addition to the offices named, he represented his county several times in the lower branch of the State Legislature.

"Mr. Marshall had an ambition to go to the United States Senate, but his ambition was never gratified. In the Legislature of 1844 the Whigs had ten majority on joint ballot. They nominated him for the Senate, but the Democrats refused to go into an election. Each party had twenty-five members in the Senate, and Jesse D. Bright, then Lieutenant-Governor, gave the casting vote against going into the election. In 1845 the Democrats carried the Legislature, and elected Mr. Bright to the Senate, his vote being 80, and Mr. Marshall's 66. His defeat the year before incensed him against Mr. Bright, and ever afterward he hated him.

"In the Legislature of 1854 the People's, or anti-Nebraska party, had a majority of fourteen on joint ballot, but the Democrats, having two majority in the Senate, prevented the election of a Senator. Mr. Marshall was the nominee of the dominant party, and had an election been held he would have been chosen. Thus it will be seen that he was twice kept from going to the Senate by the refusal of the Democrats to perform a legal duty.

"Mr. Marshall was at Indianapolis most of the time during the session of the Legislature of 1854-5, and while there contracted a deep cold. The cold settled on his lungs and soon became alarming. Early in the spring of 1855 he started on a Southern trip, in hopes of regaining his health. When he reached Louisville, being too sick to proceed farther, he took to his bed, and, on the 8th of April, 1855, died. His remains were brought to Madison and there interred.

"Indiana never had the equal of Mr. Marshall in breadth and strength of intellect. Neither did she ever have his equal in ability to stir the passions and sway the feelings of the people. She has had men of greater culture and of more general information, but in those qualities which enable the orator to melt the hearts and fire the passions of his auditors he was without a peer. He was called the "Sleeping Lion," and, when fully aroused, he was a lion indeed.

"On such occasions his oratory was like the hurricane that sweeps everything before it. Ordinarily he did not show his power, but when engaged in a case that enlisted his feelings and his conscience his words were like hot shot from the cannon's mouth.

"Colonel Abram W. Hendricks, in a recent address, thus speaks of Mr. Marshall: 'He was one of the most transcendently powerful advocates that have figured at the Indiana bar. His intellect was colossal. He seemed to know the law by intuition. His logic was surrounded by a glowing atmosphere of passion. He could sweep through his subject like a tempest or crush through it like an avalanche.' Colonel Hendricks had practice at the bar with him for many years, and knew whereof he spoke.

"Mr. Marshall was very careless of his dress. He didn't care whether his coat fitted him or not, or whether the bow on his neck-stock was under his ear or his chin. He usually wore low shoes, and there was often quite a distance between his shoetops and the bottom of his pantaloons. He carried his papers in his hat instead of his pockets, and wore his hat pulled low down upon his head. He had a great big head, thickly covered with sandy hair. His forehead, mouth and nose were large and prominent. His eyes were a light blue, and were the least expressive of his features. He stood over six feet high. His body was not symmetrical, being from his shoulders to his hips almost the same in size. It was his head and face that told you the manner of man he was. These were magnificent, and his uncouth form and careless dress served to show them to the best advantage. Had he gone to the Senate, as he should have done, he would have made a reputation equal to any one in the land. He had the ability to shine anywhere and would not have suffered by comparison with the ablest men in that body."

With reference to the refusal of the State Senate on two occasions to agree to go into joint session for the purpose of electing a United States Senator, it may be stated that in those days State Legislatures were privileged to do as they pleased about such matters. There was no federal law governing the election of United States Senators. On another page David Turpie relates, intelligently and comprehensively, how Congress finally came to pass a law prescribing when and how United States Senators were to be chosen by State Legislatures. This legislative enactment has since been superseded by the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution making United States Senators elective by direct vote of the people.

STRONG MEN WERE SENT TO CONGRESS DURING DECADE (1843 TO 1853)

HE census of 1840, revealing another extraordinary increase of population, gave Indiana three additional Congressmen, raising the State's apportionment from seven to ten. Under this apportionment the following named gentlemen were chosen for the Twenty-eighth Congress—1843 to 1845:

1. Robert Dale Owen.
2. Thomas J. Henley.
3. Thomas Smith.
4. Caleb B. Smith.
5. William J. Brown.
6. John W. Davis.
7. Joseph A. Wright.
8. John Pettit.
9. Samuel C. Sample.
10. Andrew Kennedy.

Thomas Jefferson Henley was the first native of Indiana to be elected to Congress. He was born in 1810; attended the State University at Bloomington; was State Representative from 1832 to 1842, and Speaker of the House one term; elected to Congress as a Democrat for three successive terms (1843 to 1849); moved to California in 1849 and engaged in banking in San Francisco. Was a member of the first California Legislature; Superintendent of Indian affairs of California for seven years, and wound up his official career with the postmastership of San Francisco.

Caleb Blood Smith was born in Boston, Mass., April 16, 1808; moved with his parents to Ohio in 1814; was graduated from the Miami University; studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Connersville, Ind.; founded and edited the Indiana Sentinel in 1832; member of the State House of Representatives 1833-1836, and served as Speaker in 1836; elected to the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Congresses (March 4, 1843-March 3, 1849); presidential elector in 1840; moved to Cincinnati, Ohio, and practiced law; presidential elector on the Fremont ticket in 1856; President of the Republican National Convention of 1860; Secretary of the Interior under President Lincoln March 5, 1861, to January 1, 1863; resigned to become judge for the District of Indiana. Died in Indianapolis January 7, 1864.

William J. Brown was for years one of Indiana's most influential politicians—adroit, alert, sagacious and courageous. He was born in Kentucky November 22, 1805; in 1821 moved to Indiana; member of the State Legislature and Secretary of State for Indiana; elected as a Democrat to the Twenty-eighth Congress (March 4, 1843-March 3, 1845); Second Assistant Postmaster General, 1845-1849; again elected to (the Thirty-first) Congress (March 4, 1849-March 3, 1851); editor of the Indiana Sentinel and State Librarian of Indiana; special agent of the Postoffice Department for Indiana and Illinois. Died near Indianapolis, March 18, 1857.

Samuel C. Sample was born in Maryland; moved to Indiana and settled in South Bend; elected as a Whig to Congress for one term, from 1843 to 1845.

A notably able delegation was chosen by the people of Indiana to represent them in the Twenty-ninth Congress, from 1845 to 1847:

1. Robert Dale Owen.
2. Thomas J. Henley.
3. Thomas Smith.
4. Caleb B. Smith.

5. William W. Wick.
6. John W. Davis.
7. Edward W. McGaughey.
8. John Pettit.
9. Charles W. Cathcart.
10. Andrew Kennedy.

Edward W. McGaughey was twice elected to Congress, from 1845 to 1847, and from 1849 to 1851. He was a campaigner of considerable resourcefulness and ingenuity.

Charles W. Cathcart was twice elected to Congress from the Laporte district. Upon the death of Senator James Whitcomb, October 4, 1852, Governor Wright appointed Mr. Cathcart to serve as Whitcomb's successor until the Legislature would effect an election. Cathcart took his seat December 6, 1852, and held it until "relieved" by John Pettit, January 18, 1853. Thus the Whitcomb seat in the Senate had three different occupants during the six-year term.

In the Thirtieth Congress (1847 to 1849) Indiana was represented by these gentlemen:

1. Elisha Embree.
2. Thomas J. Henley.
3. John L. Robinson.
4. Caleb B. Smith.
5. William W. Wick.
6. George C. Dunn.
7. Richard W. Thompson.
8. John Pettit.
9. Charles W. Cathcart.
10. William Rockhill.

New names in this list are those of Elisha Embree, John L. Robinson, Geo. G. Dunn and William Rockhill.

Elisha Embree was a native of Lincoln county, Kentucky; came with his father to Indiana in 1811; practiced law at Princeton; served as circuit judge from 1835 to 1845; elected to Congress as a Whig; defeated as candidate for re-election. Died at Princeton, February 28, 1863.

John L. Robinson was conspicuous in Indiana politics for twenty years. Born in Mason county, Kentucky, May 3, 1814, he came to Indiana when eighteen years of age, locating in Rush county, where he made himself useful in a country store. By and by he engaged in business for himself, but success did not crown his efforts. His mind concerned itself more with the study of human nature and the current of events than with figuring out a reasonable profit on the commodities usually sold in a country store. And in those days a country store was a great place for expounding doctrines, cultivating public sentiment and espousing various causes. John L. Robinson was a master hand at this. It didn't take long for him to establish a local reputation for political sagacity and shrewdness. When but twenty-six years of age his name was placed on the Van Buren electoral ticket in 1840. He was no mere figurehead in this assignment. He went on the stump and acquitted himself so masterfully as to astonish both friend and foe. Though the party with which he affiliated was overwhelmingly defeated in that campaign, John L. Robinson had an abiding faith that a turn in affairs political was but a question of time. And he was right about this. Two years after the defeat just narrated he was triumphantly elected clerk of Rush county. Before he had completed his second term he was elected to Congress and twice re-elected thereafter. Upon the accession of Franklin Pierce to the Presidency, Robinson was appointed United States Marshal of Indiana. In this position he was enabled to wield considerable influence throughout the State. And he availed himself of it to the utmost. He was closely allied with Senator Bright and proved himself a most efficient lieutenant to that adroit political chieftain, who in turn greatly appreciated the services rendered. In terms of affection, Bright spoke of Robinson as "a very brother." Bright's friendship for Robinson was put to a severe test when the latter got the notion into his head that he wanted to be Governor of Indiana. Another dear friend of Bright's, Ashbel P. Willard, nursed a similar ambition. The matter was finally adjusted to the satisfaction of all concerned by an agreement that Bright should keep hands off and let Willard and Robinson fight it out between themselves. They did, and Willard won. Robinson had his reward in being reappointed to the United States marshalship, which position he retained up to the time of his death at his home in Rushville, March 21, 1860.

One who knew Mr. Robinson intimately, personally and politically, thus summed up his character: "Of all the public men I ever knew, he was farthest removed from the time-server and the demagogue. He despised political intrigue, chicanery, dissimulation, tergiversation, untruth and injustice, and held with Jefferson that 'an honest heart is the first blessing, a knowing head is the second.' . . . His marked decision of character, his clear judgment, his unselfish devotion to the popular cause, his unflinching faith in the masses of his party, his pre-eminent abilities as the advocate and defender of popular rights, combined to make him, as acknowledgedly he was, the heart and head leader of the Democracy of Indiana."

George G. Dunn was born in Kentucky in 1813; moved to Indiana; admitted to the bar and practiced in Bedford; was elected prosecuting attorney, and in that capacity proved himself a terror to evildoers and criminals. Served in both Houses of the Legislature and was at two different times elected to Congress—first as a Whig and later on as a sort of combination candidate. As the product of political mongrelism he did very much as he pleased, supremely indifferent as to whether school kept or not. He was a strong man, and was at one time in partnership with Richard W. Thompson. Died at Bedford, September 24, 1857.

William Rockhill was a native of New Jersey, where he was born February 10, 1793. Had a limited education. Located at Fort Wayne, and was elected a member of the Thirtieth Congress. He served but one term. Died at Fort Wayne, January 15, 1865.

Of the Indiana delegation to the Thirty-first Congress (1849 to 1851) all but one were Democrats. The solitary exception was Edward W. McGaughey. It was a strong delegation and consisted of these widely-known gentlemen:

1. Nathaniel Albertson.
2. Cyrus L. Dunham.
3. John L. Robinson.
4. George W. Julian.
5. William J. Brown.
6. Willis A. Gorman.
7. Edward W. McGaughey.
8. Joseph E. McDonald.
9. Graham N. Fitch.
10. Andrew J. Harlan.

Nathaniel Albertson was born in Virginia, moved to Greenville, Ind., and was elected as a Democrat to Congress. Served but one term.

A truly remarkable man was Cyrus L. Dunham. Briefly told, his record shows him to have been born at Dryden, Tompkins county, New York, January 16, 1817. He was distinctively self-educated. Upon his removal to Indiana he located at Salem, Washington county, where he studied law and in course of time was admitted to the bar. He engaged in agricultural pursuits and was made prosecuting attorney of the circuit court, in which position he distinguished himself by his absolute fearlessness. He established quite a reputation as a criminal lawyer and became famous as a public speaker of unusual power and eloquence. In 1846 he was elected a member of the Legislature and re-elected the year following. While serving in this capacity he became quite active in support of a bill to authorize the holding of a convention to frame a new State Constitution. In 1848 he was a Cass and Butler elector. The next year he was nominated for Congress by the Democracy of the second district and triumphantly elected over William McKee Dunn by a majority of 485. Two years later he was re-elected by a majority of 963 over Roger Martin. In 1852 he defeated Joseph G. Marshall, one of the ablest and most highly esteemed men in the State, by a majority of 931. when Know-Nothingism caused a sort of political dementia in 1853 and 1854, Dunham made his fourth race, his competitor being George G. Dunn, and was beaten by 1,660 votes. This ended Dunham's Congressional career. When Daniel McClure resigned as Secretary of State, Governor Willard appointed Mr. Dunham to fill out the unexpired term, ending the latter part of 1860. It was in the early part of that year that Mr. Dunham conceived the idea of competing with Thomas A. Hendricks for the nomination for Governor. Dunham was a supporter of the Buchanan administration, while the great body of the Indiana Democracy upheld Stephen A. Douglas in the Kansas-Nebraska fight. It soon became apparent to Mr. Dunham that the Buchanan-Bright faction was in a hopeless minority. Gracefully he accepted the situation and in a singularly eloquent speech he moved the unanimous nomination of Thomas A. Hendricks.

Soon after the breaking out of the civil war Cyrus L. Dunham organized the Fiftieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers and took it to the front. After serving about a year, faithfully and heroically fighting for his country, ill-health compelled him to resign and retire from the service. Upon his return from the field he located in New Albany and resumed the practice of law. In 1864 he was elected to the Legislature and took a leading part in the proceedings of that body. In 1871 he was elected judge of the Floyd and Clark Circuit Court. While holding this office he removed to Jeffersonville, remaining a resident thereof until death ended his eventful career, November 21, 1877.

One of the most remarkable men sent to Congress from Indiana was George Washington Julian. He was the second native Indianian to be elected to Congress. In his biography it is stated that he was born near Centerville, Ind., May 5, 1817; attended the common schools; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1840; member of the State House of Representatives in 1845; delegate in the Buffalo Freesoil convention, and Van Buren elector in 1848; candidate for Vice-President on the Freesoil ticket in 1852; delegate to the National Republican Convention in Pittsburgh in 1856; elected as a Freesoiler to the Thirty-first Congress (March 4, 1849-March 3, 1851); elected as a Republican to the Thirty-seventh, Thirty-eighth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth and Forty-first Congresses (March 4, 1861-March 3, 1871); supported Tilden and Hendricks in 1876; appointed by President Cleveland Surveyor-General of New Mexico December 13, 1886, and served four years. Died in Irvington, a suburb of Indianapolis, July 7, 1899.

Willis A. Gorman was born near Flemingsburg, Ky., January 12, 1816; pursued an academic course; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1835, and began practice in Bloomington, Ind.; Clerk of the Indiana Senate 1837-1838; Major and Colonel of Indiana Volunteers in the Mexican war; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-first and Thirty-second Congresses (March 4, 1849-March 3, 1853); Territorial Governor of Minnesota 1853-1857; delegate to the Constitutional Convention of Minnesota in 1857; practiced law in St. Paul, Minn., 1857-1861; entered the Union army; Colonel First Minnesota Infantry April 29, 1861; Brigadier-General of Volunteers September 7, 1861; mustered out May 4, 1864; elected city attorney of St. Paul in 1869. Died in St. Paul, Minn., May 20, 1876.

Joseph Ewing McDonald became distinguished in his adopted State as one of its ablest lawyers, most sagacious and courageous politicians, and a statesman of the highest type. Born in Butler county, Ohio, August 29, 1819; moved with his mother to Indiana in 1826; apprenticed to the saddler's trade in Lafayette, Ind.; attended Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind., but did not graduate; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and commenced practice in Crawfordsville; Prosecuting Attorney 1843-1847; elected to the Thirty-first Congress (March 4, 1849-March 3, 1851); elected Attorney-General of Indiana in 1856 and re-elected in 1858; moved to Indianapolis in 1859; unsuccessful candidate for Governor of Indiana in 1864; elected to the United States Senate, and served from March 4, 1875, to March 3, 1881. Died in Indianapolis, June 21, 1891.

A most remarkable career had Andrew Jackson Harlan, who was born near Wilmington, Clinton county, Ohio, March 29, 1815; attended the public schools; studied law, and was admitted to the bar; moved to Marion, Ind.; Clerk of the Indiana House of Representatives in 1842 and a member 1846-1848; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-first Congress (March 4, 1849-March 3, 1851); re-elected to the Thirty-third Congress (March 4, 1853-March 3, 1855); moved to Dakota Territory in 1861; Member of the Territorial Legislature in 1861, and served as Speaker; driven from the Territory by the Indians and settled in Savannah, Mo., and resumed the practice of law; member of the Missouri Legislature and served three years as Speaker; moved to Wakeeney, Kan., in 1883; postmaster of Wakeeney four years; removed to Savannah, Mo., in 1892. Died in Savannah, Mo., May 19, 1907.

The last delegation to be sent to Washington under the census of 1840 and the apportionment made thereunder was a distinguished and influential one in the Thirty-second Congress (1851 to 1853). It was composed of—

1. James Lockhart.
2. Cyrus L. Dunham.
3. John L. Robinson.
4. Samuel W. Parker.
5. Thomas A. Hendricks.
6. Willis A. Gorman.
7. John G. Davis.

8. Daniel Mace.
9. Graham N. Fitch.
10. Samuel Brenton.

James Lockhart was born in Auburn, N. Y., February 13, 1806; moved to Indiana in 1832; studied law, was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Evansville in 1834; Prosecuting Attorney of Vanderburg county 1841-1842; Judge of the Fourth Judicial District 1845-1851; Delegate to the State Constitutional Convention of 1850; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-second Congress (March 4, 1851-March 3, 1853); re-elected to the Thirty-fifth Congress, but died before the assembling of the Congress in Evansville, September 7, 1857.

Samuel W. Parker was born in Jefferson county, New York, September 9, 1805; was graduated from Miami University, Ohio, in 1828; studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Connerville, Ind.; held several local offices; member of the State House of Representatives 1836-1841; State's Attorney for two years; elected as a Whig to the Thirty-second and Thirty-third Congresses (March 4, 1851-March 3, 1855); Presidential Elector 1844-1856.

Thomas A. Hendricks was born near Zanesville, Ohio, September 7, 1819; moved with his parents to Madison, Ind., then to Shelby county in 1832; pursued classical studies and was graduated from South Hanover College in 1841; studied law in Chambersburg, Pa.; was admitted to the bar in 1843, and began practice in Shelbyville, Ind.; State Representative in 1848 and a State Senator in 1849; member of the State Constitutional Convention of 1851; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-second and Thirty-third Congresses (March 4, 1851-March 3, 1855); Commissioner of General Land Office 1855-1859; unsuccessful Democratic candidate for Governor in 1860; moved to Indianapolis in 1860; elected United States Senator, and served from March 4, 1863, to March

Daniel Mace was born in Pickaway county, Ohio, September 5, 1811; attended the public schools; studied law, was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice in Lafayette, Ind.; member of the State House of Representatives in 1836; Clerk of the State House of Representatives in 1837; United States Attorney for Indiana 1849-1853; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-second and Thirty-third Congresses (March 4, 1851-March 3, 1855); re-elected as a Republican to the Thirty-fourth Congress (March 4, 1855-March 3, 1857); appointed postmaster of Lafayette by President Lincoln. Died in Lafayette, July 26, 1867.

Samuel Brenton was born in Gallatin county, Kentucky, November 22, 1810; minister of the gospel 1830-1848; suffered a paralytic stroke in 1848 and compelled to abandon the ministry; appointed Registrar of the Land Office in Fort Wayne, Ind., 1848; elected as a Whig to the Thirty-second Congress (March 4, 1851-March 3, 1853); elected as a Republican to the Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Congresses and served from March 4, 1855, until his death in Fort Wayne, March 29, 1857. His second Congressional race was made against Congressman Ebenezer M. Chamberlain, of Goshen, who was strongly opposed to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, but nevertheless defeated as a candidate for re-election. A fusion of the Know-Nothings and anti-slavery men proved too strong to be overcome by Judge Chamberlain. *

DOCTOR, EDITOR, COUNTY AND STATE AUDITOR.

The last State Auditor chosen by the Legislature, under the 1816 constitution, was Dr. Erastus W. H. Ellis, for many years editor and publisher of the Goshen Democrat. He was one of the truly able men of the State who deserved all he ever got from the party which he served so ably for a quarter of a century. He first located with his father at Mishawaka, then moved to South Bend, and from there to Elkhart. This was in 1837. In January, 1839, he was induced by the owners of the Democrat to become its editor at a salary of $200 a year and board, which amounted to two dollars a week. The circulation of the Democrat then was about 400. During the Van Buren campaign in 1840 Dr. Ellis conducted a campaign paper called the Kinderhook Dutchman. It had a circulation of 1,200. He also issued the St. Joseph County Democrat during the Van Buren campaign. In August, 1841, he was elected Auditor of Elkhart county and re-elected in 1846. This proved quite helpful to him in his newspaper career. He continued to audit and edit until January, 1850, when the Legislature elected him to the more lucrative position of State Auditor. During his term of office he, in connection with John S. Spann, established a weekly paper called The Indiana Statesman. It attained a circulation of 2,000 and lived two years. By reason of his pronounced anti-slavery extension views the Bright forces defeated him in convention when he sought a re-nomination for the office of State Auditor. In 1855 Dr. Ellis severed his connection with the Democratic party. He joined the newly organized anti-slavery party, was nominated for State Auditor in 1856, and defeated with the rest of the ticket. For a while he edited a campaign paper called We, the People. It had a circulation of 7,000. He filled several minor positions under State authority, became very poor and returned, penniless, to Goshen, where he was installed as editor of the Goshen Times. In 1858 he was again elected Auditor of Elkhart county and re-elected in 1862. By Governor Morton he was appointed a member of the Peace Commission that was to avert war between the North and South. He served as Draft Commissioner and assisted in organizing troops for the Union army. Dr. Ellis was married three times and had an interesting family of children. He died at his home in Goshen October 10, 1876; was at the time serving as postmaster of that inviting little city.

JUDGES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Under the Constitution of 1816 the Judges of the Supreme Court were appointed by the Governor, such appointment being subject to the approval of the Senate. The appointments for the first bench were made by Governor Jennings, whose choice fell upon James Scott, John Johnson and Jesse L. Holman. The following year he named as Johnson's successor Isaac Blackford, who served continuously from 1817 to 1853—thirty-six years in all. This is without a parallel in the history of the State. His record during all these eventful years entitled him fully to every word said in commendation of his great work by a writer who knew him well, William Wesley Woollen:

ISAAC BLACKFORD.

Thirty-Six Years On the Supreme Bench.

"Isaac Blackford, for thirty-five years a judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana, was born at Bound Brook, Somerset county, N. J., November 6, 1786. When sixteen years old he entered Princeton College, from which, four years afterward, he graduated with honor. He then commenced the study of the law in the office of Colonel George McDonald, where he remained a year, and then entered the office of Gabriel Ford, where he continued his legal studies. In 1810 he received his license, and two years afterward left New Jersey and came to Dayton, Ohio. He remained there but a short time, and then came to Indiana. He stopped at Brookville a while, and then went to Salem and located. On the organization of Washington county, in 1813, he was chosen its first Clerk and Recorder. The next year Mr. Blackford was elected Clerk of the Territorial Legislature, which office he resigned on being appointed Judge of the First Judicial Circuit. He then removed to Vincennes, and in the fall of 1815 resigned the judgeship and opened a law office. The next year, 1816, he was elected a representative from the county of Knox to the first Legislature under the State government. There were many men in that body who afterward became distinguished in the history of Indiana, among them James Noble, Amos Lane, John Dumont, Williamson Dunn, Davis Floyd, Samuel Milroy and Ratliff Boon; but even at that early day Judge Blackford's reputation for judicial fairness was so well established that he was chosen Speaker without a contest. The next year Governor Jennings appointed him a judge of the Supreme Court, a position he graced and honored for the next thirty-five years.

"In 1853, his term as Supreme Judge having expired, he opened an office at Indianapolis for the practice of law. He had been so long on the bench that he was ill at ease when he went into court with a case. His effort to get into practice was not successful, and in a short time he measurably abandoned it.

"Judge Blackford was not at home at the bar, and he longed to be again upon the bench. The opportunity soon came. In 1855, on the organization of the Court of Claims at Washington, President Pierce appointed him one of its judges. He held this office until his death, December 31, 1859. He discharged its duties in a way that added luster to a name already illustrious, and died the best known and most eminent jurist Indiana has ever produced.

"When Judge Blackford's death became known at Washington a meeting of the Indiana Congressional delegation was held to take action upon it. Albert G. Porter, then the representative from the Indianapolis district, in a speech delivered on that occasion, said:

It is hardly possible, sir, for persons who reside in an old community to appreciate the extent to which, in a new country, the character of a public man may be impressed upon the public mind. There is not a community in Indiana, not a single one, in which the name of Judge Blackford is not a household word. He has been identified with our State from the beginning. He may almost be said to be a part of our institutions. Judicial ability, judicial purity, approaching nearly to the idea of the divine, private worth, singularly blending the simplicity of childhood with the sober gravity of age—these were represented, not simply in the mind of the profession, but in the universal popular mind of Indiana, in the person of Isaac Blackford.

"At the same meeting General William McKee Dunn, then the representative from the Madison district, said:

For more than a quarter of a century Judge Blackford occupied a seat on the Supreme Bench of our State. He has done more than any other man to build up our jurisprudence on the broad foundation of the common law. His reports are not only an honor to him, but to the State of Indiana also. It has been well said here that he was an "upright judge," and not only was he so in fact, but so careful was he of his judicial character, and so regardful of all the proprieties of his position that he was universally recognized and esteemed as "an upright judge."

Indiana is proud of her great jurist, but today she mourns the loss of one of her most eminent citizens, and now by her united delegation in Congress claims that all that is mortal of Isaac Blackford may be entrusted to her care and have sepulture in her bosom. Let his body be borne back to the State with whose judicial history his name is inseparably connected, and there at its capital let him be buried, where those from all parts of the State who have so long known, revered and loved him may visit his tomb and pay affectionate tribute to his memory.

"On Thursday, January 13, 1860, while the Democratic State convention was in session, Governor Willard announced to the convention that the remains of Judge Blackford had reached Indianapolis and were then lying in the Senate Chamber. He also said that the Judge's funeral would take place that afternoon, and invited the delegates to view the remains and attend the funeral.

"In 1825 Judge Blackford was a candidate for Governor of Indiana, but was defeated by James Brown Ray by a majority of 2,622 votes. Subsequently he was a candidate for United States Senator, and was beaten by William Hendricks by a single vote.

"Judge Blackford was very careful in his expenditure of money. He seldom parted with it without an equivalent.

"Judge Blackford had an only son, George, whose mother died in giving him birth. The father was wrapped up in his boy. He was not only an only child, but he was the only hope of perpetuating the Blackford name. This boy, this child and companion of the cloistered jurist, sickened and died while at Lexington, Ky., under medical treatment of Dr. Dudley. His father went to Lexington, and after seeing his boy laid away in his tomb, returned to his home. It was in the summertime, and he reached Indianapolis in the middle of the night. Instead of going to his room in the Circle, he went to the residence of Henry P. Coburn, and, without knocking, opened the door and entered the house, a house in which he was ever welcome. Soon afterward one of Mr. Coburn's sons was awakened by the stifled sobs of the mourner. He arose from his bed and, lighting a candle, beheld Judge Blackford, walking the floor and sobbing as though his heart would break. Not a word was said. The young man knew the cause of the great grief of his father's friend, and having no wish to intrude upon its sanctity, left the room. Judge Blackford remained at Mr. Coburn's for several days, and during the time held no conversation with anyone. He took his meals in silence, and when they were over returned to his room. When narrating this incident, General John Coburn said to the author: 'I have seen grief in all its forms; have seen the mother mourning for her son; have seen the wife at the grave of her husband, and heard her sobs, but I never saw such appalling agony as Judge Blackford exhibited that night at my father's house.'

"Judge Blackford had a room in the old building which used to stand in the Governor's Circle, in which he lived for many years. It was plainly furnished, but it contained everything necessary for his comfort.

"One who knew him well says he paid as much attention to a comma as to a thought. He has been known to stop the press to correct the most trivial error, one that few would notice. The late Samuel Judah, desiring to have a decision delayed, once asked him the correct spelling of a word he knew would be in the opinion. The Judge answered, giving the usual orthography. Mr. Judah took issue with him and argued that the spelling was not correct. The Judge at once commenced an examination of the word, dug out its roots and carefully weighed all the authorities he could find. He spent two days at this work, and before he got through the court had adjourned and the case went over to the next term.

"In politics Judge Blackford was originally a Whig, but in 1836 he supported Van Buren for the Presidency, and afterward acted with the Democracy. He hated slavery, and during his whole life his influence was against it. Although the ordinance ceding the Northwestern Territory to the United States provided that slavery should never exist in the Territory or the States formed from it, it was covertly introduced into the Territory. Laws were passed authorizing the bringing of negroes into the Territory and providing for apprenticing males until they were thirty-five years old and females until they were thirty-two. Children of colored persons born in the Territory might be apprenticed until the males were thirty and the females twenty-eight years old. It was also provided that slaves found ten miles from home without permission of their masters might be taken up and whipped with twenty-five lashes. Congress was petitioned to suspend the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787, prohibiting slavery in the Territory, but happily without effect. General Harrison was Governor of the Territory, and approved of all these measures. He had about him, and enjoying his confidence, Waller Taylor, Thomas Randolph, and other immigrants from Virginia, who were pro-slavery men of the most decided cast. Judge Blackford hated slavery in all its forms and early allied himself with the free State party led by Jonathan Jennings. He held General Harrison responsible for the effort to make Indiana a slave Territory, and when the General became a candidate for President, in 1836, Judge Blackford refused to support him. His action in this matter put him outside the Whig party and into the Democratic—a position he maintained while he lived.

"His legal opinions were prepared with the greatest care and precision. They were written and rewritten until they were brought to his critical standard. So, too, with his reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court, eight volumes of which he published. Each syllabus was wrought out as a sculptor chisels his marble. He did not report all the decisions of the court; many were omitted. Those only were published which he regarded as sound and just on the general principles of the law. The result of this was his reports are authority wherever the courts recognize the common law as their rule of action. Since they were published a law has been passed compelling a report of all the opinions of the court. There have been so many contradictory opinions given since then that the authority of our highest court is not, relatively, as high as it was when its decisions were only known through Blackford's Reports. Judge Blackford's reports were short and sententious, his style being clear and faultless. He did not write essays or treatises in his opinions, but treated of the essence of the case, and of nothing more.

"Without favor, fear or affection he held up the scales of justice before the world. His spotless rectitude and unswerving justice made his name a household word in Indiana, a State whose judicature he found in swaddling clothes and left clad in beautiful raiment."

THE OTHER JUDGES.

Judges Scott and Holman were by Governor Ray denied reappointment in 1830 on account of their refusal to aid that ambitious public functionary in his effort to secure a seat in the United States Senate. Stephen C. Stephens, a pronounced Abolitionist, and John T. McKinney, a Whig, were named as successors. Both encountered considerable opposition to their confirmation, but the Governor finally won out. Dewey and Sullivan were generally considered strong jurists. Governor Whitcomb named Judges Perkins and Smith, both of whom adorned the bench.

So far as Judge Holman was concerned his retirement from the Supreme Bench of the State did not prove a detriment. Three or four years afterward (in 1835) President Jackson appointed him as Judge of the United States Circuit Court for Indiana. He was the second judge of the court and served until his death, on March 28, 1842. Judge Holman was a native of Danville, Ky., being born in that city October 24, 1784. He received a common school education in Kentucky and then studied law under Henry Clay at Lexington. At the age of twenty-six he moved to Indiana and settled for life on a farm near Aurora. He was one of the very first men in the State to bring his slaves (inherited by his wife) across the Ohio river and emancipate them. In 1811 he was Prosecuting Attorney, and in 1814 became a member of the Territorial Legislature. In 1831 he was an unsuccessful candidate for United States Senator, being defeated by John Tipton by one vote. He is described as a particularly careful, laborious, exact judge. It is said that a more conscientious man never lived. He had no enemies and he yet never shirked a duty. Judge Holman loved nature and books and was a preacher of the gospel. In denominational affiliation he was a Baptist. He was the father of William S. Holman, for many years the ever-faithful and vigilant watchdog of the nation's treasury.

EXPANSION OF UNCLE SAM'S DOMAIN

FRUIT OF DEMOCRATIC FORTITUDE, FORESIGHT AND WISDOM

TAKEING a retrospective view, measuring discerningly and dispassionately the achievements of American statesmanship during the first half century of the Republic's existence, there is presented to the appreciative eye this inspiring picture of the importance—commercially, economically or geographically—as the causes of most any war in that same time.

The first territorial acquisition of the United States was that of Louisiana from France. It was the largest real estate deal ever accomplished by friendly nations. The United States paid approximately $15,000,000 for more than 875,000 square miles of territory.

GROWTH OF THE UNITED STATES.

*Annexed by treaty.

In striking contrast to Europe's history of territorial aggrandizement is the record of the growth of the United States. Not a piece of land has been added to our domain unless compensation in some kind was made.

But not only in its acquisition of territory has the United States proved its high national morality to the congress of nations. In every international affair in which we have participated we have shown a regard for weaker nations, and a disregard for the opinions of strong ones.

The history of the relations between the United States and Great Britain in the last hundred years is a testament to the efficiency of arbitration, when two nations really desire a peaceful settlement. The disputes over the Maine boundary, the fishery claims, the Oregon dispute, the Klondike frontier difference, the regulation of pelagic sealing, were all of as much

Spain had acquired Louisiana in 1763 when France retired from America. It controlled the mouth of the Mississippi river, the free passage of which early became a point of dispute with the United States. By 1802 a temporary settlement was made, when the United States learned of the secret treaty of San Ildefonso, whereby Spain gave Louisiana back to France.

More disputes about the river followed. Feeling ran high in the new Republic. Jingoism advocated war with France to force better treatment. President Jefferson believed France might be persuaded to sell the island of New Orleans and that strip of the present Mississippi and Alabama between the thirty-first parallel and the Gulf of Mexico. The boundary of the United States then stopped at the thirty-first parallel.

Robert R. Livingston, the American minister in Paris, was instructed to propose that matter to Napoleon, then first Consul.* James Monroe was sent to assist Mr. Livingston. France received the proposal with disfavor. War talk was heard again in the United States, when suddenly Napoleon, through Talleyrand and Marquis de Marbois, his minister of finance, offered to sell to the Republic not only the island and small strip of land, but the entire province of Louisiana.

The first price asked was 120,000,000 francs, with the assumption of all the province's debts by the purchaser. America might have bought at that price, but as Napoleon was anxious to replenish his war chest to fight England, he lowered his terms. Ultimately the price was fixed at $15,000,000, and April 30, 1803, the province of Louisiana became American.

The wording of the treaty conveying Louisiana was vague, and soon the United States became embroiled with Spain over the strip between the gulf and the thirty-first parallel. Spain claimed that territory belonged to Florida, then a Spanish province, and had never been retransferred to France.

Spain maintained its position, and in 1810 the inhabitants of the western part of the strip rebelled, organized an independent republic and then asked to be annexed to the United States. American troops took possession without any annexation formalities. In 1812 the area of American control was extended farther East. After England used Florida for a military base in the war of 1812, the dispute between Spain and the United States became more acute, and finally a conference was held to adjust all difficulties.

It resulted in Florida being ceded to the United States, Spain releasing all claim to the strip mentioned before. In return the United States agreed to take over all claims of American citizens against Spain up to $5,000,000 and pay some expenses and debts of the province, all aggregating about $5,500,000. The United States also gave up its claim to some territory west of the Sabine river in the present Texas.

The United States made several efforts to acquire Texas before it was annexed. In 1827 an offer of $1,000,000 was made. Two years later $5,000,000 were offered.

Mexico refused. In 1836 the Mexican provinces of Texas and Coahuila seceded and organized an independent republic under the name of Texas. It tried repeatedly to enter the United States, but not until 1845 was the annexation completed and the Republic of Texas disestablished. No money was paid for Texas, but the people of the State were rewarded by the increased protection they enjoyed as a part of the United States. Later the State was paid $10,000 for lands ceded to the general Government in the adjustment of its boundaries.

With Texas the United States also acquired a quarrel with Mexico over the territory between the Rio Grande and Nueces river. The Texas declaration of independence had named the Rio Grande as the southwestern boundary. Mexico claimed the more northern stream was correct. The United States chose to uphold the Texas contention, which brought on the Mexican war of 1846-48.

Uncle Sam's action in that war rather smacks of conquest, but he sugar-coated the forcible seizure of New Mexico and California by paying Mexico for them. The price was $18,250,000, $3,250,000 of which was to liquidate spoliation claims of American citizens against Mexico.

Some writers have tried to show that the United States contemplated only seizing the strip between the Nueces and Rio Grande when the war began, but the exigencies of the struggle made it necessary to take other land. Such attempts are futile. The United States took California and New Mexico by force, justifying its action by the knowledge that a great rich region was kept undeveloped by a backward nation, and paying a gold compensation. Had a European nation been in Uncle Sam's place in 1848, Mexico would have been stripped not only of land, for which it was paid, but money as well. Mexico was paid $3,000,000 down and $12,000,000 in four annual payments.

During the Mexican war the United States also acquired clear title to another large and valuable tract of land—Oregon Territory. England laid some claim to it, but an arbitration conference awarded it to the United States in 1846.

In 1854 the United States made its last acquisition of contiguous territory. In that year a strip of land, now known as the Gadsden purchase, was acquired. Mexico was given $10,000,000 for it, an excellent price. It provided a way for a trans-continental railroad.

The contemplation of such a record is well calculated to arouse in Democratic breasts a spirit of exuberance and exultation. With pardonable pride it may be referred to as a splendid vindication of Democratic judgment and fortitude in holding out determinedly against the whimsical, hysterical and at times vicious attitude of the Whigs in opposing both the annexation of Texas and the war against Mexico. Steering clear of that which might be considered vainglorious boastfulness, there is abundant justification for bringing to popular attention the magnitude of that marvelous territorial expansion under which a mighty nation thrives and prospers between two great oceans. In fitting terms the splendor of this achievement is vividly brought within the grasp and comprehension of the present generation by a veteran Democratic journalist who for many years championed and vitalized Democratic doctrines in Indiana. His admirable production richly merits a conspicuous place in this volume:

ACHIEVEMENTS OF DEMOCRACY.

(By Major Geo. E. Finney, Editor of the Martinsville Democrat.)

"There are times and occasions when opponents of Democracy opprobriously apply such terms as 'Bourbon,' 'negative quantity,' and 'unprogressive plodders' to the party that prides itself as having had Thomas Jefferson as its founder. By way of rejoinder it may be said that in only one particular are the Democrats Bourbons. They early learned and imbibed the spirit of the constitution. Its meaning in the early days is in no sense different from its meaning now. To that instrument they have clung through all the changing years. As to it they have learned nothing new, nor have they forgotten its spirit and its teachings. Thus far and no farther are they Bourbons.

"A 'negative party'? Let's see. It put its impress upon the Declaration of Independence; it materially assisted in originating the Government, providing those wise measures and supporting them embodied in the constitution under which the country has passed through one hundred and twenty-five years of unexampled prosperity and happiness; under which the country has been brought safely through every trouble that is likely to frown upon us, and under which, aided by superb statesmanship, indomitable courage and confidence in man's ability for a patriotic self-government, it has avoided the rock upon which other countries have split. While these are material achievements whose influence envelop us by night and make the air around us pure by day, they are not such things as those upon which a measure may be put and their value calculated by dollars and cents, or their extent measured by leagues and furlongs. But the party is to be credited with large achievements of this character, too, as—

"Take a map of the United States, trace a line beginning near Fernandina, Fla., on the north line of that State, west, with an offset to the north at Chattahoochee river to the Mississippi, thence with that river to its source, and over a stretch of country still further north till the line intersects Rainy Lake river, near its issuance from the Lake of the Woods; from this point east along the lake line, St. Lawrence river and the northeast boundary to the ocean, thence along the coast line to the place of beginning. Within this boundary is found the original area of the United States, embracing 827,080 square miles of territory.

"The total area in square miles of the United States (excluding Florida and Alaska) is 2,967,226. Deduct from this grand total the original area, in square miles thus—2,967,226 minus 827,080, and there results 2,180,146. These figures represent the territory which, through the clear foresight and the splendid diplomacy of the Democratic party, was acquired and, without war or conquest, added to this country.

"Though Florida was acquired by purchase as a result of a compromise on the Rio Grande-Sabine river boundary line dispute under a Democratic President, yet it is excluded from the count for the reason that the purchase was accomplished during the 'era of good feeling'—a notable period when no political parties were battling for supremacy—and therefore the Democracy is not entitled to exclusive credit. Nor is Alaska, because that icicle was the gift of the Republican party. But all the contiguous accessions besides the Democratic party gave to the country, and all of this splendid heritage was acquired in the face of opposition, some of it reaching if not to treasonable, at least to most unpatriotic, utterances.

"A magnificent domain in itself! Its northern boundary stretches out for sixteen hundred miles before reaching the Pacific; its coast line eighteen hundred miles; its southern line two thousand miles, and its river line the whole length of the Mississippi and more. Within this boundary is found a land of varied condition, but most of which contains elements of wealth to the people and to the Government. Its auriferous ores glisten in the eyes of the world; the products of its grazing grounds reach the sea and cross it; its golden cereal is quoted in the world's great marts; its luscious fruits gladden the palates of the peoples of many climes, and its grand scenery attracts the lovers of the beautiful from far and near. Upon every league of this vast expanse—from the mouth of the Father of Waters to the far-away Cape Flattery, from the Gila to the Lake of the Woods—the Democratic footprint is seen and the sign-manual of the party of Jefferson is writ in characters of unfading glory.

"The area of accessions is more than two and a half times larger than the original country, conquered from England. In a national sense the value of this achievement cannot be computed, but a few minutes' thought will open the mind to its vast importance. In the absence of this addition of territory, the Mississippi and an imaginary line north of its source would have been its boundary on the west, and the great breadth of lands between it and the Pacific coast owned and occupied by foreign peoples. He that has read history, even very recent history, will recognize at once the danger of such a line in case of trouble with national neighbors, and the cost of maintaining defenses along such a stretch of boundary, both in times of peace as well as war. The clear foresight of Jefferson appreciated this danger and sought to avert it. Again, to our country had been invited the oppressed people of other nations to find asylum and home within our borders. And the people came. It was easy enough to see that in the coming years more territory would be needed, and this thought added strength to the purpose.

"Following in the steps of Jefferson, the later Democracy saw safety, national security and commercial value in pushing the boundary farther west, for on the sea line a boundary was to be found, secure in its permanency, dependable in its strength and economical in its keep, in that it would require few fortifications and its liability to incursions be negligible. It requires little fancy to conjure up the succession of quarrels, brawls, raids and disturbances of various kinds that always characterize the people along such a boundary as that which Jefferson saw. As a testimony to this contemplate the late and present condition on our Mexican border. Then would we sigh with a vain regret over the 'what might have been' if the tide had been taken at its flood. But, thanks to the Democratic party, such imaginings were anticipated. The wisdom of its leaders dictated the course that was to redound to the glory and welfare of the Nation. Schooled in the revolution, their minds expanded with the happy close of the great struggle, and they saw with a prescient eye the grand possibilities of the years to come.

"When the young man has studied the parties with a view to choosing party affiliations, and has, as well as he may, mastered the principles and policies of the contending parties of today, he will feel a pride in allying himself with the Democracy. In the contemplation of its grand and worthy past, he will feel that he has in some sort a part and parcel in its grand achievements."

PROPHECIES OF WOE GONE AWRY.

Viewing with supreme satisfaction the events that brought about the immense expansion of Uncle Sam's territory, it may not be amiss to note the predictions of woe that were elicited as a result of the firm stand taken by the statesmen who championed the policy of a greater American Union. After the occupation of California by the United States, Sidney Smith predicted that "This marks the end of the great American Republic, for a people spread over such a vast area, having such diversified interests and separated by such natural barriers, cannot hold together."

His logic was perfect and his conclusions eminently correct, but for a totally unexpected occurrence—the invention of the telegraph. The telegraph was in use then, but no one saw even dimly its possibilities.

The necessity of binding together the peoples of vast nations by means of rapid communication had been worrying the world for some time. The Russian government went so far as to build 220 semaphore towers from the Russian frontier to St. Petersburg, by way of Warsaw, 1,200 miles. Thirteen hundred operators were employed, and a semaphore, on the plan of the present railway signal, but with many more arms, was used.

In 1832 similar systems were in use in France and Prussia and one word could be signaled from Paris to Toulon, 475 miles, in twelve minutes. These systems were hardly established, at tremendous expense, when Professor Morse knocked them into a cocked hat.

What a howl was raised when Jefferson consummated the celebrated Louisiana Territory purchase. When its ratification came up in Congress Josiah Quincy of Massachusetts rose and tore hair. Jefferson was an "idiot" and a "madman," and Massachusetts was going to secede if this monkey business went any further.

"This constitution never was intended to be and never can be strained to lay all over the wilderness of the West without essentially affecting the rights and consciences of its proprietors," he declared. "Why, sir, I have heard of six new States, and some say there will be, at no great distance of time, more. It was not for them that this constitution was adopted. You have no authority to throw the rights and liberties of the people of the United States into a hotchpot with the wild men on the Missouri, or the mixed, though more respectable, Anglo-Hispano-Gallo-Americans who bask on the sands of the Mississippi. New States are intended to be formed beyond the Mississippi. There is no limit to man's imagination on this subject short of California and the Columbia river."

The "wild men on the Missouri" constitute a mighty force. They are an important factor in the galaxy of States. Their number is counted by millions. But please don't judge harshly of Josiah Quincy. How could he, in the days of his activity, have foreseen the networks of railroads, the myriads of telegraph poles and wires, the wondrous performance of the telephone and the other cords which are yet to make the Columbia and the Hudson next door neighbors?

Viewing ever so kindly and considerately the dire predictions made by some of the sages of the remote past, let us not lose sight of the comforting fact that not a single slave territory or new slave State was carved out of all the vast territory annexed and acquired from Mexico! Verily, poor prophets were the politicians and statesmen who, in those days, protested so vehemently against the expansion championed and accomplished by the party of Jefferson, Jackson and Polk.

INDIANA'S SECOND CONSTITUTION

THE FIRST ONE SEEMINGLY SATISFIED THE PEOPLE FOR THIRTY-FIVE YEARS

TAking into consideration the fact that the framers of Indiana's first constitution required only nineteen days wherein to perform the task assigned to them, it must be conceded that they quite succeeded in meeting the wishes of the people whom they served. Provision had been made in that document for subsequent changes at relatively short intervals, yet the people indicated their unwillingness to avail themselves of that privilege by waiting thirty-five years before they supplanted the old with the new.

The assumption is thus warranted that the men who made the Constitution of 1816 did a good job, not alone for the immediate present and the near future, but for a succeeding generation. Moreover, their product must have given unfeigned satisfaction to the wise men at Washington, in congress assembled, for that august body not only placed its stamp of approval upon the newly-made constitution, but relieved the people of the infant commonwealth of the necessity of passing thereon by popular vote. That no false notion may find lodgment in the Hoosier mind as to this having been an exhibition of partiality and favoritism the further statement is vouchsafed that Ohio at the time of its admission into the Union was favored in like manner. Congress evidently believed in those days that when the people of a Territory knocking for admission into the Union are authorized to select the men charged with the framing of their future organic law, such selection ought to be made with the understanding that their acts shall be final and not subject to approval or rejection by the populace.

That this belief was founded upon reason and sound judgment is evidenced by the excellence of the work actually done. Both Ohio and Indiana got along very well for many years with their respective State constitutions, though neither document had first been submitted to popular vote.

Whether the Constitution of 1851 is a marked improvement upon the Constitution of 1816 is neither the purpose nor the province of this publication to determine. There is just one phase to which attention is being directed, and that is whether the welfare of the State was enhanced by making State officers other than Governor and Lieutenant-Governor elective by the people. To reach a just conclusion with reference to this, let comparisons be instituted and let the verdict be rendered in conformity with actual experience—the only real test. The question to be passed upon is whether a better class of men have been chosen for Secretary of State, Auditor and Treasurer under the Constitution of 1851 than were chosen under the provisions of the Constitution of 1816?

Discussion of the relative merits of the two methods of choosing State officials has developed a pronounced sentiment in favor of the system in operation in Pennsylvania since the adoption of that State's new constitution in 1872. To Charles R. Buckalew, for many years the idolized leader of the Keystone Democracy, is mainly due the credit for having brought about the change under consideration. In all its history, Pennsylvania never had a long list of State officers to choose by popular vote. Under the present system the people of Pennsylvania elect only four State officers, to wit: Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Treasurer and Secretary of Internal Affairs, besides Judges of the Supreme and Appellate Courts. Secretary of State, Auditor, Attorney-General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, etc., are all appointed by the Governor. These officials constitute the Governor's Cabinet. This Cabinet is, in so far as feasible, patterned after the President's Cabinet at Washington. It has worked excellently in Pennsylvania, so much so that during a period covering four decades not even a suggestion has been ventured to supplant it with some other plan or system. The official business of the State is transacted far more expeditiously and efficiently than under the elective system, and the Governor is afforded far greater opportunity to devote his time and attention to matters properly pertaining to his office than is possible in our State. If enlightenment on this subject is needed, let any one spend a day at the State House at Indianapolis and make note of the innumerable trivial things that are from day to day thrust upon the attention of Governor Ralston. Under the so-called Federal (or cabinet) plan all matters are referred to the proper department and attended to by the proper person. Three or four of our Indiana Governors have had their lives shortened by the tremendous pressure brought on them as a result of the onerous and destructive system in vogue at our State Capitol.

But the real purpose of these pages is to record the manner and circumstances under which the Constitution of 1816 was discarded and the Constitution of 1851 brought into existence. As tersely set forth in Moore's "A Century of Indiana," the change was brought about for these reasons and in this manner:

"Feeling that the State had outgrown its first constitution, and the need of many changes being apparent, the people voted affirmatively in 1850 upon a proposition to call a constitutional convention. The convention convened at Indianapolis, October 7, 1850, and continued in session until February 10, 1851. It was composed of one hundred and fifty delegates, and the wisdom of their work in framing a new constitution is generally recognized. The constitution framed and adopted by the convention was later ratified by the people at the polls and became the fundamental law of the State. It went into effect November 1, 1851. The vote upon its adoption stood—109,310 yeas and 26,755 nays. A separate ballot was taken on the thirteenth article, which resulted in its adoption by substantially the same vote.

"The thirteenth article forbade the coming into the State of any negro or mulatto; made contracts entered into with any such void and provided fines against citizens who should employ or otherwise encourage negroes to remain in the State. Fines so assessed were to be set aside as a fund for colonizing any negroes already in the State, or their descendants, who should be willing to immigrate. This article was stricken out by an amendment ratified by vote of the people in 1881.

"The new constitution also limited the suffrage to white voters and provided that only white males over the age of twenty-one years should be considered in fixing the basis of representation in the General Assembly. By amendments adopted in 1881 the word 'white' was stricken out wherever it appeared in the constitution, thus ending discrimination between the races and admitting the negro to the franchise and full rights of citizenship.

"Among the important changes made by the new constitution from the provisions of the old were: The power of appointing supreme court judges was taken from the Governor, and all judicial officers were made elective by the people; the Secretary, Treasurer and Auditor of State were made elective by the people instead of by the Legislature; sessions of the Legislature were made biennial instead of annual; the Legislature was forbidden to pass local or special laws; a system of general banking laws was provided for and the State prohibited from becoming a stockholder in any banking or other corporation."

The making or amending of a constitution has for years engaged popular attention in Indiana to such an extent that a complete history of the circumstances attending the creation of the present organic law will surely be highly prized by every reader of this volume, especially when mention is made that this historical review emanates from the pen of Prof. Logan Esarey of the University of Indiana:

WHY CHANGES ARE IN ORDER.

"By the terms of the Constitution of 1816 it was provided that every twelve years a referendum vote should be taken on the advisability or necessity of calling a constitutional convention. It was the generally accepted theory then, as laid down in the writings of Jefferson, that one generation had no moral or legal right to bind by constitutional limitation a succeeding generation. It is hardly probable that the framers of the constitution intended by this provision to prevent the citizens of Indiana from calling a constitutional convention any time they chose. It is more probable that it was intended by this referendum to insure each generation two chances of holding a convention in spite of an opposing General Assembly. It must be kept in mind that the immediate followers of Jefferson looked with favor upon the constitutional convention as one of the most effective institutions of popular Democracy.

"There appears to have been very little demand for a new convention for a long time after 1816. As one of the opponents of calling a convention, George W. Julian said in 1847: 'The people of Indiana are attached to their constitution. It is the work of their forefathers. Under it for thirty years they have enjoyed a degree of prosperity unsurpassed by any State in the Union.'

WHAT A REFERENDUM REVEALED.

"The cause for calling a constitutional convention among English-speaking people is always found to be insistent and acting through considerable periods of time. The American people generally have not lightly called into activity such revolutionary bodies. There has always been some deep-seated dissatisfaction. There were several minor defects in the working of the State and local governments under the first constitution, but the chief ground of complaint was the working of the General Assembly. This body had led the State into a gigantic system of internal improvements in which the State had lost more than $12,000,000. The State became deeply involved in debt. Its bonds were hawked about the Eastern markets as low as 17 cents on the dollar. A gang of hungry office holders had been, and still were, robbing the State, and the General Assembly seemed unable or unwilling to shake them off. The annual meetings of the Assembly seemed to be an unnecessary expense and the annual elections kept the people in a political turmoil. Moreover, the General Assembly was neglecting the affairs of the State and giving its time and attention to hundreds of petty private affairs. A reading of the titles of the special laws of any session will give one an idea of the petty jobbery that was carried on by means of special laws.

"With all this dissatisfaction the demand for a convention, if we are to take the votes on the subject as evidence, was not strong. There is scarcely any mention of the vote on the subject up till 1846. A referendum had been taken in 1823, only seven years after the constitution went into effect. The vote was decisive against calling a convention. In 1828, four years later, the regular twelve-year referendum was taken with a similar result. During the following twelve years there was little agitation on the subject. The General Assembly of 1845, however, took up the subject. There was a spirited demand by a few energetic members for a convention. They succeeded in passing a law authorizing a referendum on the subject at the ensuing August election. This was six years earlier than the constitution demanded, but the friends of the movement urged with force that the people had an undeniable and inalienable right to call a constitutional convention whenever they pleased.

DEMOCRATS FAVORED CHANGE.

"The result of this referendum vote was that out of a total of 126,133 votes cast at the State election there were 33,173 for a convention and 28,843 opposed. A majority of all the voters had not expressed themselves on the subject.

"When this vote was reported to the General Assembly it provoked a serious debate. It was generally agreed that the vote was not decisive and that it did not warrant the General Assembly in calling the proposed convention. Many members favored submitting the question again to a popular vote at the next August election. Other members opposed all agitation on the subject as calculated to bring political disquiet and unrest. The times, it was pointed out, were especially dangerous. The State was almost bankrupt, taxes were high and times were hard. Of all times the present, it was urged, would be the worst to agitate a change in the fundamental law.

"In spite of the efforts of a determined group of members the question was not favored by the General Assembly. It is noticeable that what might be called the professional politicians avoided taking sides in this discussion. The referendum in 1846 was not mentioned in the leading papers, and evidently was not discussed on the stump. The Governor, in reporting the result of the vote in his annual message, made no recommendation that might be construed into a position.

"The demand for a convention, however, did not cease. The Democratic party in general favored the proposition. The court practice, they said, was especially costly. Probate courts and associate judges were regarded as worse than useless; they were meddlesome. The justices had once been the chief officers of the county, but since a board of commissioners had taken their duties, they had become petty politicians, valuable only to those who wished to bribe a court or corrupt a jury.

POLITICAL JOCKEYING AND LOG-ROLLING.

"Many good citizens, regardless of party, looked upon the appointing power of the Governor as a source of much evil. They thought that such officers as the Auditor, Treasurer and other State officers should be elected by the people rather than by the General Assembly. The recent attempt by the Governor to barter nominations to the Supreme Court for a seat in the United States Senate had given a concrete point to the general demand to limit the appointing power of the Governors. By 1849 Governor Whitcomb, sure of his promotion to the United States Senate, came out openly for a convention in his annual message. He, no doubt, put his finger on the weakest point in the government under the old constitution when he emphasized the evil of private and local legislation. In the annual volumes of laws for the previous four or five sessions the local laws had outnumbered the general five or six to one. In the volume of 1849 there are 343 acts published as 'local laws' and 273 as 'general laws.' Of the latter more than 200 are strictly 'local.' The time of the whole session was consumed in political jockeying and log-rolling. The annual volume of laws noted above contained 616 laws and 37 joint resolutions.

APPROVED BY POPULAR VOTE.

"The General Assembly of 1848 took up the question and passed an act submitting the question of calling a constitutional convention to the voters. A large majority of the votes cast at the ensuing August election were in favor of calling a convention. The following General Assembly, by act approved January 18, 1850, ordered an election of delegates. The election was held at the same time and in all essential parts was the same as an election of members of the General Assembly. There were 150 delegates chosen from the same districts as the members of the House and Senate except in two unimportant districts.

"There was little interest in the campaign as far as electing delegates was concerned. It was hoped by many to make the elections nonpartisan, but such was not the case as a rule. It seems true, however, that the Whigs took considerably less political interest in the election than the Democrats.

WHAT WHIGS FAVORED.

"A caucus of the Whig members of the General Assembly declared in favor of a constitutional convention and especially urged that the following changes be made in the constitution: All officers should be elected by popular vote; the General Assembly should be prohibited from borrowing money except for urgent necessities; the county seminary funds should be transferred to the fund for common schools; the General Assembly should meet biennially; local legislation should be prohibited; the number of officers should be reduced and the establishment of new ones forbidden; a homestead exemption should be provided, and more encouragement should be given to agriculture, mining and manufacturing.

"In the county of Marion the Whigs offered to divide the ticket equally and make no contest, but the Democrats refused. In Jefferson county the Whigs compromised on a ticket of two Whigs and one Democrat. There were many instances in which fusion tickets were elected without contest, but fusion was not general. Of the fifty delegates from senatorial districts thirty-three were Democrats and seventeen were Whigs; of the one hundred delegates from representative districts sixty-four were Democrats and thirty-six Whigs. Of the fifty State Senators elected at the time thirty-three were Democrats and seventeen Whigs; of the Representatives sixty-two were Democrats and thirty-eight Whigs. It will thus be seen that the political affiliations of the General Assembly and the constitutional convention were the same.

MEN OF PROMINENCE ENLISTED.

"The delegates, 150 in number, assembled in the Capitol building October 7, 1850, and were organized by the Secretary of State, Charles H. Test. They were a representative body of citizens. The best-known men of the State at the time, however, were not present. From our distance one would say that Robert Dale Owen, Alvin P. Hovey, Thomas A. Hendricks, W. S. Holman, Schuyler Colfax and Horace P. Biddle were among its most distinguished members, but they were young and entirely without reputation at the time. The really distinguished men of the convention, as they gathered together for the first time, were Thomas D. Walpole, Abel Pepper, Daniel Kelso, James G. Reed, David Kilgore, Ross Smiley, Michael G. Bright, William M. Dunn, George W. Carr, David Wallace, Jacob Page Chapman, James Rariden and John I. Morrison. Seventy-five of the members had served in the General Assembly, thirteen of whom had sat in the last session. Twenty-five more made this the stepping stone to later legislative service. Fourteen saw service in the United States Congress, two later became Governors, while one was an ex-Governor. There were seven well-known editors, three of whom came from Indianapolis. The great lawyers of the State were noticeably absent. A widespread prejudice against educated men existed at the time. There were three graduates of the State University and perhaps as many more were graduates of other colleges.

SOME OBJECTIONABLE FEATURES.

"The spirit of Jackson controlled the convention. Daniel Read, a delegate of Monroe and a professor of the State University, referred to Jackson as 'a man of as remarkable sagacity as ever lived.' As a consequence of this it was attempted to strengthen Democracy among the people by bringing the Government nearer the voter. The Secretary, Treasurer and Auditor of State, formerly appointed by the General Assembly, were made elective. To these were added the new office of Superintendent of Public Instruction to be filled by popular election. Besides the above the Judges of the Supreme and Circuit Courts were made elective by the people for six-year terms. The Prosecuting Attorneys and the local justices, all formerly appointed, were made elective, the former by the voters in the judicial circuit and the latter by the voters of the township. In the county the voters were made the electors of a Clerk of the Circuit Court, an Auditor, Recorder, Treasurer, Sheriff, Coroner and Surveyor for each county. The General Assembly was given permission to establish other elective officers, a power which it has used immoderately. Some of these officers so elected were eligible only for one term, but the majority were permitted to hold for two consecutive terms. In dealing with the suffrage elections and office holding, the general principles of Jacksonian Democracy then prevalent were applied. In general the convention made the most liberal application of the principles of manhood suffrage and popular elections.

"It was accused in many places of playing politics by allowing unnaturalized citizens to vote after one year's residence. Senator Jesse Bright made this criticism.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST NEGROES.

"In dealing with the negroes, both free and slave, the convention illustrated the confused political notions of the times. It re-enacted the provisions of the ordinance of 1787 with a brusqueness that indicated an absolute majority of Abolitionists; yet the provisions refusing negroes the right to vote or even to settle in the State are, in spirit, directly contradictory to the above enactment. Not only these provisions, but the speeches of the members on the question of slavery, show the utmost diversity of opinion. Not less than forty set speeches on slavery, few of them dealing with any question before the convention, were made by the members.

"In the article on the legislative department two important changes were made, both dictated by the overwhelming proof of experience. One change was the substitution of biennial for annual sessions of the General Assembly. The other forbade the General Assembly making special or local laws.

"In this field the granting of divorces by the General Assembly had occasioned most hostile criticism. For years the churches had opposed this exercise of power by a legislative body. A former General Assembly had invested the State courts with power to try divorce bills, but the Assembly could not divest itself of the power and the abuse continued.

POPULAR INTEREST AROUSED.

"The convention adjourned Monday morning, February 10, 1851. It had been in session eighteen weeks. No event in the State's history had received as much attention and publicity. The daily papers and many of the larger weeklies published the proceedings entire from week to week or from day to day. Innumerable articles by citizens in praise or condemnation of the work appeared in the papers. Answers by the members in defense were equally plentiful. Editorials explained the work of the convention day by day and gave the editors' opinions of its value. It was an eighteen weeks' course in political science for the citizens of the State.

"The completed constitution was read at the last session of the convention on the morning of February 10. It appeared at once on the front pages of the newspapers, many of which repeated its publication in the three or four succeeding issues. The convention ordered 55,000 copies of the constitution—50,000 in English and 5,000 in German—printed for distribution. These appeared early in March.

"The convention had suggested that the new constitution be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection at the next August election. The General Assembly affirmed this suggestion February 4, 1851, and the Governor's proclamation followed immediately, directing the election officers to carry the order into effect.

FAVORED BY BOTH PARTIES.

"There was no organized opposition to the ratification. Both parties favored the new constitution. At the ensuing election every county gave an affirmative majority but Ohio. Starke county cast a unanimous vote for the constitution. The total vote was 113,230 for and 27,638 against ratification, a majority of 85,592 out of a total vote of 140,868. The vote for the exclusion of colored persons was substantially the same, being an affirmative vote of 113,828 out of a total vote of 135,701. Three counties, Lagrange, Randolph and Steuben, voted against negro exclusion. The total vote on the constitution was little short of that cast for Congressmen. The total vote in the ten Congressional districts was 148,529. That there was no partisan opposition to the constitution is shown by this vote. The Democrats carried the State at this election by a majority of only 9,469.

"The new constitution went into operation November 1, 1851. The General Assembly elected in August, 1851, met as directed by the old constitution. The first general election under the new constitution was held in October, 1852, the old officers holding until the newly elected ones were qualified and took their positions according to law. There was no jar in the operations of the State government during the change.

"One of the objections urged at first against a constitutional convention was that it would cost an enormous sum of money at a time when the State was almost bankrupt and could ill afford to spend any money except for the most urgent need. The total expense for the eighteen-week session, as shown by the State Treasurer's report was $85,043.82."

If it be true, as contended by John Quincy Adams, that "the will of the people is the end of all legitimate government on earth," then there can be no diversity of opinion as to the necessity of the "will of the people" being soundly formed and thoughtfully executed. When this is expected to be done, the character, stability and judgment of the electorate must have greater consideration than has been bestowed upon the same for decade upon decade. Lincoln, who always spoke tenderly and affectionately of the "plain people," and who for many years sustained very close relations to the masses, felt constrained to admit that "the people wobble," but qualified the gentle accusation by saying that "they finally wobble right." When this ensues, as Colonel Geo. B. Lockwood interprets, the demagogue disappears, the fame of the opportunist withers, the reputation of the political coward dies. But what about the mischief wrought while the people wobbled?

Burke was eternally right when he declared that "government is a contrivance of human wisdom to provide for human wants." Again is thus pressed upon public attention the desirability and necessity of an alert electorate, the safeguard of a Republic. But, bear in mind, alertness can neither be created by legislative enactment nor instilled into the electorate by constitutional provision. It will have to be evolved from a citizenship of tested virtue, of nobility of purpose, of patriotic aims, and of good common sense. An alert electorate will be guided by sound leadership instead of being swayed by the sophistry of glib-tongued demagogues. Reason must count for more than seductive plausibility; stern truth for more than evanescent sentimentalism.

As some viands are unpalatable to epicures, so stern truth is distasteful to persons who care to burden their minds only with things that accord with their fancy. Unmindful of such aversion, Professor William James is entitled to being accorded a respectful hearing while shouting these solemn truths into the public ear:

"The human individual lives usually far within his limits. He possesses powers of various sorts which he habitually fails to use. He energizes below his maximum and he behaves below his optimum. . . . Compared with what we ought to be, we are only half awake. Our fires are damped, our drafts are checked. We are making use of only a small part of our possible mental and physical resources."

The right to vote is a privilege, not a natural prerogative; a delegated authority. It is conferred upon individuals by constitutional ordinance. The privilege thus accorded ought to be sacredly regarded. It probably would be were it not so common. But, however regarded, it is the essence of governmental authority. Its debasement, debauch or decadence would presage the inevitable downfall of free institutions.

Now let us look at some of the inconsistencies traceable to the indifference of the electorate. By an overwhelming majority of the popular vote the draft of a constitution was ratified in Indiana, in the year 1851, which contained a clause that conferred upon aliens residing within the State one year the right to vote upon having made a declaration of intention to become a citizen, in conformity with the naturalization laws of the United States. About that time the Know-Nothing movement was making considerable headway, so that within a few years it became a controlling factor in Indiana politics. Then formal declaration was made by the then dominant party organization "that we are in favor of the naturalization laws of Congress with the five-year probation, and that the right of suffrage should accompany and not precede naturalization." Now, why did these people fail to assert themselves when a new constitution was being framed and adopted? There was no pressure brought upon the constitutional convention by persons of foreign birth to make voters of aliens upon a one-year's residence in the State. It is entirely within the bounds of reason and probability to say that not a half-dozen aliens settled down in Indiana because of this extraordinary grant of the elective franchise. Reasoning persons of foreign birth never complained of the five-year probationary period established under our naturalization laws. On the contrary, they commended and lauded it when a proscriptive cabal temporarily gained ascendancy in some commonwealths by demanding that the probationary period be extended to twenty-one years and that Catholics be rendered ineligible to public office. Wisconsin, with its immense German, Norwegian and Scandinavian population, a few years since abolished the one-year abomination and limited the right to vote to citizens of the United States duly naturalized or to the manner born. Michigan did practically the same thing when it passed under a new constitution. In Indiana alone, among all the States of the central West, the mistake of sixty years ago continues as a mockery to the high prerogative of citizenship.

Perhaps an even more flagrant inconsistency was enacted in our neighboring State of Ohio. During the sixties, several years after the Civil War, an amendment to the constitution to strike out the word "white" was submitted to popular vote and defeated by over 50,000. On the very heels of this popular rejection of negro suffrage the vote of Ohio was recorded in favor of the fifteenth amendment, establishing negro suffrage in every State in the Union—including the entire mass of ignorant ex-slaves in the cotton States of the South. A more flagrant assault upon intelligent voting never was perpetrated in this or any other country. To cap the climax, just as soon as the fraudulent ratification of the fifteenth amendment was officially proclaimed, the very party that had brought about the prostitution of the ballot passed an act by Congress absolutely abolishing the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia by making all municipal offices appointive by a commission designated by the President. This action was prompted by the fact that with the aid of disreputable whites in the city of Washington negro domination could and doubtless would have been established at the capital of the Nation. Such an innovation would, in the eyes of the Jacobins then in control of the legislative branch of the Government, have been entirely in order in Louisiana, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi, but was adjudged intolerable in the District of Columbia.

No ism has ever failed to find champions and supporters, no matter how absurd it may have been, measured by any standard of reasoning or common sense.

Recall the commotion caused by the Rev. William Miller of Vermont during the early forties, when he issued his statement that he had received a divine command to announce the second coming of Christ about the year 1843—how many people devoted all their time to preparing themselves for the ascension to heaven in white robes, sacrificing their property, and doing all manner of foolish things. Cogitate over the folly of owners of orchards chopping down their apple trees during the Washingtonian crusade against liquor so as to guard against the product of the orchard being converted into cider. Behold the thousands of beguiled men and women following "Divine Healer" Schlatter from day to day and professing to have been freed of all manner of diseases and ailments by simply touching the raiment of that shrewd impostor. Contemplate for a moment the large number of dupes who poured their shekels into the capacious receptacles of the Illinois charlatan, John G. Schweinfurth, who by artful methods made himself appear as an image of Christ. Peruse the statistics emanating from several of the governmental departments at Washington setting forth how vigilant officials in the service of Uncle Sam had in a single year saved gullible men and women more than one hundred and eighteen million dollars. Imagine for a moment the insecurity of life and property if for a single day or week the protecting arm of the law's vigilant and faithful sentinels were off duty. All this furnishes ample reason why there is so much "wobbling" wherever and whenever glib-tongued charlatans and unscrupulous demagogues manage to get the ear of the dear people. And thereby is furnished cogent reason why safe, sound, trustworthy leadership is so much needed in every locality, in every village and hamlet, in every town and city, in every county and district—a leadership that instills wholesome sentiment into the public mind and furnishes incentive to right-thinking and right-doing; a leadership, not for self-aggrandizement and spoliation, but a leadership whose chief purpose and highest aim is to promote the general welfare and to foster the common good. Such leadership does not go upon the assumption that politics is the science of getting 51 per cent. of the votes by hook or crook. It has a higher conception of politics. It believes in honesty being the best policy and in right making might.

In the maddening race for building up large centers of population—big cities—too many people forget all about the notes of warning sounded by Jefferson. That wise patriot and far-seeing statesman more than a hundred years ago described large cities as being “pestilential to the morals, the health and the liberties of men.” Several of the New England States, recognizing the soundness of the Jeffersonian view, safeguarded themselves against the pernicious effects of such massing together by rendering it impossible for large cities to gain the mastery in legislative assemblies and thus control the domestic policies of these commonwealths. The Empire State of the Union inserted a clause in its constitution making it impossible for the city of New York to gain the ascendancy in the General Assembly, no matter how greatly its number of inhabitants might exceed that of the rest of the State. A Senator, discussing this feature of legislative apportionment, made bold to declare that in his opinion a typical country gentleman in the interior of New York ought by right to count for as much as at least a half-dozen dwellers in the slums of the Bowery. And no one in that body took issue with this Senator on that proposition. The people of Indiana will be amenable to the charge of gross indifference to the State’s highest interests if they do not in good time safeguard themselves in some way against being dominated by large centers of population. The history of the world amply verifies the declaration of Dr. Francis E. Clark that “no Nation was ever overthrown by its farmers.” Let the so-called rural population and the inhabitants of the thrifty towns and smaller cities bear in mind that if popular delusion should ever succeed in foisting upon this Commonwealth a State-wide primary election law it would be easily within the power of the five larger cities to control, through combination, the nomination of every candidate on the State ticket. The powerful influence of money in politics is so demoralizing and pernicious that its destructive effects are quickly felt wherever exerted to any considerable extent. With clear vision the sturdy New England patriot, Samuel Adams, espied what was coming when in 1789 he gave expression to this pregnant thought: “We have achieved a great liberty; we have wrought out a great constitution; but my only fear is that our people, who are now poor and simple and love liberty because they have made sacrifices for it, will after a while grow rich and will prefer their riches to their liberty.”

Fittingly there may be added to this verified apprehension the recent lamentation of the venerable Dr. Abraham Kuyper, ex-premier of the Netherlands and advisor to Queen Wilhelmina: “The world has mocked God! The nations have forgotten and ignored Him. Even in Christian circles there were departures from Him that ruleth over earth and skies. And now this God, mocked, forgotten and ignored, fills the hearts of men with terror. The mightiest among them tremble.”

THE CONVENTION SYSTEM

SELFISH AND CORRUPT PRACTICES BY POLITICAL MANIPULATORS ITS WORST FOE

CONVENTION—literally, a coming together—derives its politico-social meaning from the old Roman “Conveetu populi”—the gathering of the people. It is applied to extraordinary, or, at least, occasional gatherings, rather than to the regular and more frequent meetings. Thus, a fraternal society has its local lodges and meetings, but the larger conventions occur only once in one or more years; and a State has annual or biennial sessions of its Legislature, but its constitutional conventions are far apart.

In nations wherein the ultimate sovereignty is vested in the people, the convention is the method by which this sovereignty is peacefully exerted; the people either directly or through delegates taking matters into their own hands and at their pleasure modifying or entirely changing the form of government. Political economists recognize two classes of these conventions—the revolutionary, which alters the form, and the reconstructive, which only amends it. Of the former class are the “Constituent Assemblies” of France. The first which grew out of the assembling of the State’s generals overthrew the monarchy and proclaimed a Republic; and there have been ten others since, making of France in alterations an empire, kingdom and republic back and forth. England has had three conventions. The first was at Runnymede, when the assembled barons reconstructed the government so as to limit the power of the king; the second was the revolutionary convention in 1660 which set aside the Commonwealth and recalled Charles the Second to the throne; the third was the reconstructive convention of 1689, which, assuming the kingdom in existence though the king was in exile, called William of Orange to reign conjointly with Mary his wife, but placed additional restraints upon the royal prerogatives.

In this country there have been many conventions of both kinds. At the very time the English convention was calling William and Mary to the throne, the Massachusetts colony was holding a revolutionary convention which deposed Governor Andros, overthrew the government he had set up and restored the Charter rights. Immediately preceding the war for Independence, several of the colonies, separately, or working together, held conventions of the revolutionary character, all tending to a change of government. The Continental Congress that issued the Declaration of Independence was a perfect example of the revolutionary convention.

The convention which framed the Federal Constitution was reconstructive. It did not attempt to change the essential principles of the Government, but only “to form a more perfect Union.” In the orderly development of our Nation, the conventions which formed the first constitutions of the several States may be termed revolutionary, inasmuch as they change the government from territorial to State, while the successive conventions that amend the constitutions are reconstructive, because, although they change details, they leave the general structure undisturbed.

At present the most common use of the term “convention” is in connection with political parties—particularly the declaration of their principles and the nomination of their candidates. It has been seen that in the earliest years of the Republic no conventions were held or needed, so far as national affairs were concerned. The views of the Federalists and Anti-Federalists were known by the position they took on the Constitution, and the platform of the Republican party was embodied in Jefferson's letter to Washington. As to candidates, there were none but Washington, until he retired, and then Jefferson and Adams were universally recognized as representatives of their respective parties.

In State elections there was a very common assent that the members of the Legislature, having been chosen by the people, might very properly gather in caucus or convention to name the candidates. By analogy the same practice was transferred to Congress in the matter of naming candidates for President. These legislative and congressional caucuses, as they were called, were in reality reconstructive conventions, in which the legislators, acting as delegates for the rank and file of their respective political parties, named the candidates for their support. It was not until the caucus, becoming a "close corporation," had been made the instrument for the accomplishment of selfish purposes, that the people overthrew it and established the later system—conventions constituted for the sole purpose of formulating party principles and nominating candidates.

The earliest of these conventions were decidedly revolutionary. Some of them took the form of mass meetings and impromptu gatherings, and they all resulted in overturning the old order of things and in the organization of new parties. The first made Jackson President and formed the Democratic party. Then in 1832 a convention presented the anti-Mason party to the country, and two or three years later the Whig party was similarly brought into being. In 1855-6 the second Republican party was formed by a series of revolutionary conventions, very similar in character to those which brought forth the Democratic party nearly a third of a century earlier. All the "third parties" have had their beginnings in the same way.

After the political party is organized, the conventions that formulate its principles and nominate its candidates are reconstructive. They pass resolutions and put forth platforms to adapt the party policy to new conditions that arise, and they seek to nominate candidates that will meet the popular approval.

For all these purposes the convention is the ideal method. Properly constituted, it represents the whole body. Its "coming together" is not simply the physical meeting of the delegates; it is a commingling of minds. It furnishes an opportunity for comparison of views and discussion of men and measures which ought to result in the wisest possible action. When the political unit for which the convention acts is small the whole body of electors may "come together." Such were the New England town meetings copied into several States. There the people got together, talked over the public needs, debated questions of policy, discussed the fitness of candidates, and finally passed upon all the measures, and elected the officials for the ensuing terms—a sort of constitutional convention, legislative body and electoral college blended in one.

But with greater population and larger units of territory, the direct action of the electors became impossible, and the delegate body a necessity.

While the nominating convention retained its original and proper character of representing its constituents and seeking to promote their best interests, it was a powerful instrument for good in the political party. It combined the wisdom of all into unified action.

But abuses arose. The selfishness of party backers seeking personal advantage rather than the good of either party or country, led them to attempt the control of conventions. Too often, notably so in localities where a nomination is equivalent to an election, they succeeded. By means of "snap caucuses" and corruption of delegates they subverted the will of the people and "bossed" the convention, making it subservient to their own ends. This state of affairs has existed to a far greater extent in the Republican than in the Democratic party, by reason of the fact that the former, until a few years ago, has had much more to do with the distribution of the loaves and fishes than the latter. Unfortunately, a deplorably large number of voters has come to regard the distribution of loaves and fishes as the chief function of party organization.

Naturally the people revolted and the convention fell into disrepute. Hence a substitute has been sought in the primary elections. But this is a cumbrous method. It leaves out entirely the consultations and discussions which were the foundation of the convention's strength. Then, too, the primary election is not free from the defect which lies at the bottom of boss control of the convention—the indifference of the people except on extraordinary occasions.

If the people would turn out at the caucuses and elect proper delegates to the convention, control by corrupt bosses could not occur, and experience so far indicates that the voters are just as indifferent in the ordinary primary election. The "short ballot" which restricts the elective offices to a few may be a remedy, by giving the people a little better chance to know what they are doing instead of leaving them to vote in the dark, as most have to at present. But the real cure of all the evils of representative government is an alert, intelligent electorate, and the best way for it to act is through the properly constituted conventions.

The customs and instincts of the American people tend toward the placing of representatives between themselves and the selection of their candidates. Whenever a primary election law runs counter to this instinct it becomes null and void in some way or other. The people will get around it by conferences or "unofficial" conventions. The underlying common sense of the electorate demands the consultation and discussion of platforms and candidates, which can be secured only in a delegate convention. It is proper that such convention be safeguarded as far as possible against corrupt or selfish control, but the surest safeguard is to be found in a patriotic electorate, vigilant and intelligent in selecting the delegates that constitute the convention.

RENOMINATION OF GOVERNOR WRIGHT

INDIANA'S MATCHLESS ORATOR, ASHBEL P. WILLARD, CHOSEN AS HIS RUNNING MATE

HE Indiana Democracy met in State convention at Indianapolis February 24, 1852. Colonel A. C. Pepper of Ohio county was made temporary chairman and C. S. Horton of Switzerland county temporary secretary.

A committee on permanent organization having been selected, its recommendation of the following-named permanent officers was unanimously approved by the convention:

President—Judge Thomas L. Smith, of Floyd county.

Vice-Presidents—Ethan Allen Brown, Ohio; Gamaliel Taylor, Jefferson; Wm. Rockhill, Allen; Z. Tannehill, Bartholomew.

Secretaries—James Elder, Wayne; John B. Norman, Floyd; Austin H. Brown, Marion. (These three gentlemen were editors of influential Democratic newspapers.)

Robert Dale Owen presented this resolution, which was unanimously adopted amidst vociferous applause:

“Resolved, That this convention nominate as Democratic candidate for Governor for the next term, Joseph A. Wright.”

For Lieutenant-Governor, Ashbel P. Willard of New Albany was nominated by practical unanimity.

The remainder of the State ticket was made to consist of these selections:

Secretary of State—Nehemiah Hayden, Rush.

Auditor of State—John P. Dunn, Perry.

State Treasurer — Elijah Newland, Washington.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—W. C. Larabee, Putnam.

Supreme Judges—Wm. Z. Stuart, Cass; Andrew Davidson, Decatur; Samuel E. Perkins, Marion; Addison L. Roach, Parke.

Editorially, the Indianapolis Sentinel spoke in these commendatory terms of the action of the convention:

“Our present popular Governor is the Democratic nominee. He has resided in the State thirty-five years. Unaided by wealth, influence or name, he has risen from the humble bricklayer—the orphan boy—to his present position. At twenty-two he entered the State Legislature as a Representative from Parke county. He served one term in the State Senate, and afterwards as a member of Congress from the Vigo district. Elected to his present position over his popular and worthy competitor by a majority of 9,778, he is again presented for the suffrages of the people of Indiana. His name is a tower of strength. The hearts of the people are with him and for him. The young Whig lawyers with sleek heads and flowing beards may denounce him with their vituperation and abuse to their heart's content. The honest farmers and working men are with him.”

The compensation of State officers in those days was certainly moderate. In a speech delivered in the House of Representatives, May 19, Robert Dale Owen recommended that the annual salaries be fixed at these figures: Governor, $1,500; Supreme Judges, $1,200; Circuit Judges, $1,200; State officers, $1,200; Librarian, $700. This was an increase of $200 each in the salaries of eighteen officers and much less than the maximum talked of at the time, which was, Governor, $2,500, etc.

DEMOCRATIC ACHIEVEMENT.

With pardonable pride, the Indianapolis Sentinel pointed to the splendid record made by Governors Whitcomb and Wright in extricating the State from the financial dilemma into which it had fallen under Whig administration. Here is a sample of the Sentinel's encomiums:

"When the Democrats were called to administer the State government, her credit was prostrated; no interest was paid upon her debt, and so dark and gloomy was the future that the fearful thought of repudiation was springing up in various parts of the State. The State debt was then almost $17,000,000 and the interest was increasing with fearful rapidity. But look at the change which eight years has made. The State now owes less than $7,400,000; her credit is sustained in every market and the dark thought of repudiation has given place to the bright hopes of freedom from indebtedness. $2,424,000 has been paid in money, and in redeeming the outstanding scrip from circulation, the remainder by the transfer of the Wabash and Erie Canal."

SAD OCCURRENCE.

On the night of the convention the Hon. Ethan Allen Brown, when returning to the evening session, fell over an obstruction and injured his hand. He was obliged to leave the convention and return to his hotel. His hand continuing to bleed, a physician was summoned, and shortly after his arrival Mr. Brown died. Death was caused by the bursting of a blood vessel. Mr. Brown had just been chosen as delegate-at-large to the National Convention at Baltimore.

GOVERNOR WRIGHT'S ATTITUDE ON THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

Governor Wright never was and never could be a champion of the institution of slavery. But he was at the same time a conservative as to the manner of dealing with the slave question. He recognized the fact that slavery existed when the Union was formed; that its existence was recognized by law, and that under the law slaveholders had rights that could neither be ignored nor violated with impunity. His chief concern at that time was to preserve the peace and to avert sectional strife. In order that his attitude with reference to the then pending issues might be fully understood, he declared himself thus in a statement published in the Sentinel of December 5, 1851:

"Indiana holds him an enemy to the well-being of this Republic who pursues any course tending to widen the breach between the North and the South. Minor questions sink into insignificance compared to the great paramount duty of every American citizen, the preservation and integrity of the American Union.

"Each and all of the laws constituting that compromise which has been as oil cast upon the troubled waters are assented to and have been carried out so far as they apply to us, in word and letter, according to the strictest judicial construction, by citizens of our State. This has been cordially and with as near an approach to hearty unanimity as any measure enacted to reconcile similar sectional differences can ever be expected to receive.

"Indiana desires to see the compromise made under the Constitution and expressly framed to carry into effect its provisions, remain undisturbed. We say to the South, as well as to the North, that these measures must stand—that this sectional controversy must not again be opened up—that time is an element which enters into everything that is valuable, must test their wisdom of efficacy—that from whatever quarter of the Union efforts shall be made to revive this sectional agitation, Indiana is against it.

"Nor will she by her votes countenance those who favor the opening afresh in any manner, under any pretense, the questions so recently and so happily disposed of—let us hope forever. Our duty is plain; abide by the past, sustain the measures faithfully, cease agitation and trust for the future to the intelligence and patriotism of the people under the guidance of Providence."

This doubtless accurately expressed the sentiment of a vast majority of Indiana's inhabitants, with but few exceptions. The radical anti-slavery element represented by George W. Julian had no notable strength outside the Julian district. Democrats and Whigs were in entire accord with Governor Wright's views, as set forth in the foregoing declaration.

DEMAND FOR ROBERT DALE OWEN.

Prior to the convening of the Democratic State Convention in February, public expression was given to a pronounced sentiment in favor of making Robert Dale Owen Superintendent of Public Instruction. A strong editorial on that subject appeared in the Louisville Journal, then edited by Geo. D. Prentice. In this editorial were set forth various cogent reasons why, in the opinion of Mr. Prentice, Indiana should place at the head of its educational interests a man of Mr. Owen's superior qualifications. This article was reproduced in the Sentinel with favorable comment. The publication of these commendatory references to Mr. Owen prompted that gentleman to declare, in a communication printed in the Sentinel of December 23, that "on account of private arrangements connected with his duties to his family he could not be a candidate for the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction at the February convention." In the same letter he protested vigorously against the exclusion of ministers of the gospel from school positions, saying the schools are "secular and not religious institutions." He also objected emphatically to any exclusion being made on account of any particular religion. The latter objection was evoked by the rising spirit of Know-Nothingism that had taken strong hold in some of the larger cities of the Union.

POLITICS MAKES STRANGE BED-FELLOWS.

This trite saying was strikingly exemplified in the earlier period of political contention. Judge Turpie had some such experiences when he engaged in joint discussions with some of his competitors. But perhaps the most notable of these close associations was that unctuously related by one of the candidates for Lieutenant-Governor in 1852. The rival aspirants for this office were Ashbel P. Willard of New Albany and "Billy" Williams of Warsaw. Both were remarkably effective stump speakers. Willard was highly educated and an ideal orator. Williams was deficient in education, but irresistible as a natural orator before a popular audience. During the seventies, when representing the Tenth district in Congress, "Billy" told the writer of the time he had with Willard while going through the arduous task of a series of joint discussions. One of these wordy combats took place in a locality where hotel accommodations were scant. It became necessary for these two distinguished disputants to occupy the same bed. Both were jolly good fellows. Notwithstanding the fact that they belabored one another at a lively rate in their fiery speeches, a strong personal friendship had sprung up between them. "Both of us felt tired," the inimitable Billy said in the course of his narrative, "so it wasn't long after we had gone to bed that Willard began to snore in stentorian tones. Pretty soon he would turn over, throw his leg over me and exclaim, 'Billy, of all the audacious liars I ever encountered, you are entitled to be enrolled on top of the list.' Complacently falling asleep, repeating his snoring with reinforced vigor, and again throwing his leg over me, he drawled out, 'Billy, how can you stand up before an intelligent audience and unfold yourself as a very prince of liars?' Again giving himself over to the sleep of the righteous, Willard soon again unconsciously set his snoring apparatus in motion. For the third time he threw his leg over me, this time accompanying that performance with this tribute to my veracity: 'Well, Billy, you are without doubt the sleekest liar I have ever come across.' How many times he reiterated these testimonials during the night I am unable to say. I was tired, exhausted, and became oblivious to all that happened or didn't happen during that memorable night of joint bed occupancy. When we got up in the morning there were no signs of anything unpleasant having occurred. Continuing our battle of words, we fought it out to the bitter end. Willard had the satisfaction of beating me by a little over 15,000, while I had the satisfaction of doing considerably better than the head of the ticket, who was defeated by over 19,000. Yes, those were great days, with great doings. As a public speaker he was simply a wonder. He preferred outdoor to indoor speaking. When he got warmed up to his subject he would first divest himself of his coat, then of his collar, then of his vest. One afternoon he was making a speech in a Quaker settlement. It began to rain. People put up their umbrellas, but, enchanted by Willard's oratory, they stayed and eagerly drank in the words as they fell from his eloquent lips. As the rain descended thicker and heavier, the orator stopped abruptly, appealing to his audience to adjourn the meeting. With astonishing unanimity the crowd shouted, 'No, go on!' Speaking was renewed. The audience was spell-bound. Three times Willard appealed to his hearers to bring the meeting to a close. To each request the audience thundered back an emphatic No! Straightening himself up to his full height, Willard exclaimed: "The more rain, the more corn; the more corn, the more whisky; the more whisky, the more Democrats. Let'er rain!" Willard finished his speech. Most of his hearers were soaked by the rain, but they considered themselves amply compensated for the discomfort experienced by the matchless oratory of their nominee for Lieutenant-Governor."

As the inimitable and incomparably good-natured "Billy" related these incidents in his political career his countenance was illuminated as if he had been reminded of one of the most pleasing events of his life.

The campaign made by Governor Wright and Mr. Willard was both brilliant and effective. The result was a sweeping Democratic victory, as attested by the official figures:

Not only did the Democrats elect every candidate on their State ticket by decisive majorities, but they secured a good working majority in both Houses of the Legislature. In this body they had 34 Senators and 57 Representatives. Of the eleven members of Congress they secured ten. The only Whig nominee that escaped defeat was Samuel W. Parker, in the Fifth district. The delegation to the Thirty-third Congress was made up of these distinguished gentlemen:

1. Smith Miller, Patoka.
2. Wm. H. English, Lexington.
3. Cyrus L. Dunham, Valley Farm.
4. James H. Lane, Lawrenceburg.
5. Samuel W. Parker, Connersville.
6. Thomas A. Hendricks, Shelbyville.
7. John W. Davis, Rockville.
8. Daniel Mace, Lafayette.
9. Norman Eddy, South Bend.
10. Ebenezer M. Chamberlain, Goshen.
11. Andrew J. Harlan, Marion.

Smith Miller was born in North Carolina, May 30, 1804; engaged in farming at Patoka, Gibson county, Indiana; served as member of the Legislature and was twice elected to Congress. Died near Patoka, March 21, 1872.

William Hayden English was the third native Indianian to be elected to Congress. Born in Lexington, Scott county, August 27, 1822; pursued classical studies in the University of Hanover; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1846; principal clerk of the Indiana House of Representatives in 1843; clerk in the Treasury Department at Washington, 1844-1848; secretary of the Indiana Constitutional Convention in 1850; four times elected to Congress as a Democrat, serving from 1853 to 1861; took a conspicuous part in the contest over the admission of Kansas into the Union; located in the city of Indianapolis during the Civil War; engaged in banking; became president of the First National Bank; aided the Government in a financial way. In 1880 he developed Presidential aspirations, but the State convention instructed the delegation to the Cincinnati convention steadfastly to support Thomas A. Hendricks. Four years before Mr. English earnestly and energetically supported Tilden and Hendricks. Upon the nomination of General Winfield Scott Hancock to the Presidency, Mr. English was nominated for Vice-President. He retained the chairmanship of the Democratic State Committee and conducted a systematic campaign. Though considerable enthusiasm was aroused in behalf of Hancock and English, the disappointment of Democrats who had demanded the renomination of the ticket of 1876 was felt so keenly that the Indiana Democracy went down in defeat both in October and in November. Mr. English had become one of the State's wealthiest men, and died at his home in Indianapolis, February 7, 1896. His son, William E., during the eighties served part of a term in Congress. The free silver issue in 1896 caused him thereafter to affiliate with the Republicans.

James Henry Lane was born in Lawrenceburg, Ind., June 22, 1814; attended the public schools; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1840, and began practice in Lawrenceburg; member of the City Council; served in the Mexican war; Colonel of the Third Indiana Volunteers, June 25, 1846; mustered out June 24, 1847; recommissioned Colonel of the Fifth Indiana Infantry October 22, 1847; mustered out July 28, 1848; appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers for service in the Civil War December 18, 1861, and appointment was canceled March 21, 1862; elected Lieutenant-Governor 1849; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-third Congress (March 4, 1853-March 3, 1855); moved to Kansas Territory in 1855; member of the Topeka Constitutional Convention; elected to the United States Senate by the Legislature that convened under the Topeka Constitution in 1856, but the election was not recognized by the United States Senate; president of the Leavenworth Constitutional Convention of 1857; elected as a Republican to the United States Senate in 1861, and re-elected in 1865, and served until his death by suicide near Fort Leavenworth, Kan., July 11, 1866.

Norman Eddy was born in Scipio, N. Y., December 10, 1810; was graduated from the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1835; went to Indiana and located in Mishawaka and practiced medicine there until 1847; studied law, moved to South Bend in 1847 and practiced law; State Senator in 1850; held several local offices; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-third Congress (March 4, 1853-March 3, 1855); defeated for re-election; Colonel of the Forty-eighth Indiana Regiment of Volunteers during the Civil War; Collector of Internal Revenue 1865-1870; elected Secretary of State in 1870. Died in Indianapolis, January 28, 1872.

Ebenezer Mattoon Chamberlain was born in Orrington, Me., August 20, 1805; attended the public schools; studied law; moved to Connersville, Ind., in 1832, where he completed his studies; was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Elkhart county in 1833; member of the State House of Representatives in 1835-1837; judge of the Elkhart Circuit Court for nine years; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-third Congress (March 4, 1853-March 3, 1855); was strongly opposed to the repeal of the Missouri compromise; resumed the practice of law in Goshen. Died there March 14, 1861.

TIDAL-WAVE YEAR FOR DEMOCRACY

NOMINATION OF PIERCE AND KING RATIFIED AT THE POLLS BY OVERWHELMING MAJORITIES

WHILE the Indiana Democratic Convention held at Indianapolis, February 24, did not specifically instruct its delegates to the National Convention, as usual, held in Baltimore, June 1, 1852, it adopted with the utmost unanimity these resolutions:

“Resolved, That Joseph Lane, the State legislator, the gallant general, the Territorial Governor, tried in the council chamber, tried in the tented fields, tried in the executive chair, and never found wanting, is, of the people of Indiana, the first choice for the Presidency. While we repose entire confidence alike in his administrative capacity, in his firmness, in his honesty of purpose and in his unswerving devotion to Democratic principles, at the same time desiring above all things union and harmony in the support of the nominee of the National Convention, let the choice of the majority fall as it will, and fully trusting the judgment and devotion to principles of our delegates to that convention.

“Resolved further, That we leave said delegates untrammelled by instructions as to persons to act as their convictions of right and propriety at the time may dictate.

“Resolved, however, That in casting the vote of the State for President, the said delegates be instructed to give it, throughout, as a unit and not by separate districts; the name of the person so voted for to be at all times determined by the majority of the votes of said delegates.

“Resolved, That if General Joseph Lane be the Democratic nominee for President of the National Convention, we pledge to him the vote of Indiana—of that State the honor of whose sons he has so nobly vindicated—by a majority, as we confidently hope and truly believe, of 25,000 votes.”

It is worthy of special mention that these resolutions were reported by an exceptionally strong committee of which the renowned Robert Dale Owen was chairman and Oliver P. Morton a conspicuous member from the “Quaker district.” Four years later the same Morton headed the first Republican State ticket as its nominee for Governor, and ten years later Robert Dale Owen was credited with having furnished the strongest argument submitted to President Lincoln in support of the urgent appeal that he issue a proclamation for the emancipation of four million slaves. At this very convention both Owen and Morton expressed the utmost satisfaction over the various compromises entered into to propitiate the slave power and condemning all further agitation that might in any way disturb amicable relations between North and South.

Upon one of Indiana’s delegates-at-large, Congressman John W. Davis, was conferred the distinguished honor of being selected as permanent chairman of the convention. And very creditably did Dr. Davis acquit himself in that position. He, with a number of other delegates, loyally supported General Lane for the Presidential nomination, but at heart these gentlemen were for Stephen A. Douglas. When the balloting showed steady gains for “The Little Giant,” the Indiana delegation abandoned Lane and went over to Cass as a compromise. Particularly active in behalf of General Lane was Congressman John L. Robinson, ably aided by the Brights. These gentlemen were especially hostile to Senator Douglas, whose defeat was of far greater importance to them than the nomination of any one of the other aspirants, except Lane.

All the signs of the times pointed unerringly to signal Democratic victories in 1852, both in Indiana and the country at large. This in itself was an incentive to extraordinary effort in behalf of the leading candidates and accounts for the tenacity with which their supporters adhered to the favorite sons from various parts of the Union. The friends of General Cass, convinced that the battle in 1848 was lost through no fault of his but rendered inevitable on account of the colossal blunder committed in inciting the friends of Martin Van Buren to open revolt, were especially solicitous that the Michigan statesman be afforded another opportunity in a fairer race and under more auspicious circumstances. But the decree of fate determined otherwise. General Cass developed considerable strength, but the persistent efforts of the followers of Buchanan, Douglas and Marcy made it impossible to bring his vote beyond the 131 point. Thirty-three times the Indiana delegation cast its vote solidly for General Joseph Lane, but throughout that balloting only one delegate from some other State came to his support. The name of Franklin Pierce had not been mentioned until the thirty-fifth ballot. He started then with 15 votes, rose to 30 on the next, then dropped to 29, and stayed at that through eight ballots. Then he rose to 44, 49, 55, then came the stampede that gave him nearly the entire vote of the convention and secured his triumphant nomination.

Inasmuch as Joseph Lane was the first Indiana Democrat presented for a Presidential nomination, a brief review of his eventful career would seem to be demanded. He was a native of Buncombe county, North Carolina, where he was born in the year 1801. In 1814 his father's family emigrated to Kentucky, and two years afterward crossed the Ohio river and located in Warrick county, Indiana. Alternately young Lane worked in the county clerk's office and in a dry goods store. Before he was twenty-one years old he was elected to the Legislature, and he had to wait until he became of age before he could take his seat. For over twenty-five years he served the State as a member of either the House of Representatives or the Senate of the Indiana Legislature. When the Mexican war broke out he resigned his seat in the State Senate, where he was then serving, and joined the command of Captain Walker as a private. When the Second Indiana Regiment was organized he was made Colonel, and on July 1, 1846, he was made Brigadier-General by President Polk. During the war he served with distinction under Taylor and Scott and he commanded at the battle of Huamantla. Soon after the close of the war he was appointed by President Polk Governor of the Territory of Oregon. In 1850 he was removed from that office by President Taylor, but the next year was elected as a delegate from Oregon to Congress and continued as such until the State was admitted to the Union, when he became Senator. In 1860 he was nominated for the Vice-Presidency by one wing of the Democratic party on a ticket with John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky.

Mr. Lane died in 1881 in the forest region of his beloved adopted State, poor in purse, but rich in the esteem and confidence of his countrymen.

ALABAMA NOMINATED FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.

On the second ballot William K. King of Alabama was unanimously nominated for the Vice-Presidency.

The party platform adopted was worded precisely as that of 1848. Two additional planks were added—one approving the compromise measures patched up by Clay, Webster, Fillmore, Crittenden, Douglas, etc. The final declaration was to the effect "that the Democratic party will resist all attempts at renewing in Congress, or out of it, the agitation of the slavery question, under whatever shape or color the attempt may be made." The nomination of General Franklin Pierce was very generally greeted with enthusiasm, especially by the younger element of the party. Most of the Free-soil Democrats who had rallied to the support of Van Buren and Adams in 1848 enlisted under the banner of Pierce and King and contributed their mite to the sweeping victory the following November.

The remainder of the story of 1852 is easily narrated. Confused, chagrined and demoralized, the Whigs met in Baltimore on the 16th of June, with every State represented. John G. Chapman of Maryland was made the presiding officer.

As narrated by Col. A. K. McClure, "the Southern delegates fortified themselves before the meeting of the convention by a caucus declaration of the party platform, and it was an open secret that if the convention accepted the platform, enough Southern men would support Scott to give him the nomination. They knew that Fillmore could not be elected and that Webster was even weaker than Fillmore, and they were willing to accept Scott, who was the candidate of the anti-slavery element of the party, if the compromise measures were squarely affirmed by the party convention, while Scott was willing to accept the nomination with any platform the convention might formulate. Fillmore had carried the compromise measures and forced the Whigs to accept them in the party platform, but the insincerity of that expression was manifested by the refusal to nominate Fillmore, and by the nomination of Scott, who represented the anti-compromise Whigs of the country. There were 53 ballots for President, but during the long struggle there was but little exhibition of ill-temper. Scott started with 131 to 133 for Fillmore and 29 for Webster, and ended with 159 for Scott to 112 for Fillmore and 21 for Webster."

The nomination of General Scott was made unanimous, and William A. Graham of North Carolina, who was then serving as Secretary of the Navy under the Fillmore administration, was considerably given a unanimous nomination for Vice-President on the second ballot.

The platform adopted by the convention declared that—

"The Union should be revered and watched over as the palladium of our liberties."

"As the people make and control the Government, they should obey its constitution, laws and treaties as they would retain their self-respect and the respect which they claim and will enforce from foreign powers."

"The Federal and State Governments are parts of one system, alike necessary for the common prosperity, peace and security, and ought to be regarded alike with a cordial, habitual and immovable attachment."

"The series of acts of the Thirty-second Congress, the act known as the Fugitive Slave Law included, are received and acquiesced in by the Whig party."

THE FREESOIL PARTY AGAIN IN EVIDENCE.

The Free-soil Democrats held their national convention in Pittsburgh on the 11th of August. Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, presided. Without the formality of a ballot, Senator John P. Hale of New Hampshire was nominated for President and Congressman George W. Julian of Indiana for Vice-President. Reiterating the declaration of 1848, the platform declared that—

"Slavery is a sin against God and a crime against man, which no human enactment nor usage can make right."

"The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 is repugnant to the Constitution; we therefore deny its binding force on the American people and demand its immediate and total repeal."

"Slavery is sectional and freedom national."

"We recommend the amicable settlement of (international) difficulties by a resort to decisive arbitrations."

"The Free Democratic party is not organized to aid either the Whig or Democratic wing of the great slave compromise party of the Nation, but to defeat them both."

On the popular vote the Democrats had 1,838,169; the Whigs 1,380,576; Free Democracy 156,149. Of the electoral vote Pierce and King had 254; Scott and Graham 42; Hale and Julian none. Scott and Graham carried four States: Kentucky, 12; Massachusetts, 13; Tennessee, 12; Vermont, 5.

Badly as the grizzly warrior, Scott, was defeated in this contest, it will be observed that he carried twice as many States as, fifty-six years later, were carried by William Howard Taft. No comparison is to be made between these two men as to fitness and qualification. The vote of Indiana stood: 95,340 for Pierce, 80,901 for Scott, 6,929 for Hale—total, 183,170.

Franklin Pierce was by far better fitted for the Presidency than was his chief competitor. Born in Hillsboro, N. H., November 23, 1804; graduated from Bowdoin College in 1824; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1827; member of the State House of Representatives 1829-1833; served as Speaker 1832-1833; twice elected to Congress; elected to the United States Senate and served from March 4, 1837, to February 28, 1842, when he resigned. Resumed the practice of law in Concord; served in the Mexican war as Colonel; commissioned Brigadier-General in March, 1847, and remained in Mexico until the close of the war. In 1850 he was chosen a member of the Constitutional Convention and made president of that body. His triumphant election to the Presidency in 1852 marked the beginning of the end of the Whig party.

FORTY-TWO DAYS A UNITED STATES SENATOR

UP to the time when Benjamin F. Shively was elected to the United States Senate it was commonly remarked that no man living north of the Wabash river had served in the upper branch of Congress. Had that declaration been so modified as to render it that no man residing north of the Wabash had, prior to Mr. Shively's selection, been elected a United States Senator, the accuracy of the statement would have been incontestable — though the somewhat qualifying statement should not be lost sight of that three United States Senators were chosen from Logansport, which is located along the Wabash, in the persons of John Tipton, Graham N. Fitch and Daniel D. Pratt, and one from Lafayette, also a Wabash river town, in the person of John Pettit.

Governor Whitcomb was elected to the United States Senate in 1848 and took his seat in that body March 4, 1849. He was not in robust health, grew steadily worse, and died October 4, 1852. Governor Joseph A. Wright appointed as Whitcomb's successor a former Congressman from the northern part of the State, Charles W. Cathcart, of Laporte county, who took his seat upon the assembling of Congress, December 6, 1852. When the Legislature of 1853 assembled a lively contest ensued over the selection of a candidate for the temporarily filled Senatorship. For some unexplained reason no effort was made to secure the nomination of Mr. Cathcart by the legislative caucus. The friends of Governor Wright rallied to the support of Judge John Pettit, of Lafayette, while the adherents of Senator Bright did their utmost to secure the caucus nomination for Dr. Graham N. Fitch, of Logansport. The vote stood 54 for Pettit and 46 for Fitch. Pettit was duly elected January 11 and took his seat just one week later, viz., January 18, 1853. Then Charles W. Cathcart was relieved of Senatorial duties, his service extending over exactly forty-two days. Having previously served two terms as Representative in the Lower House, he enjoyed a distinction not often conferred upon national legislators. His career as man and public official is replete with interest and presents instructive information as to the possibilities of forging ahead in this land of unsurpassed opportunity.

Charles W. Cathcart was born on the island of Madeira, July 24, 1809. Received a good education in the Catholic schools of the country where he was born, and in his early years took to the sea and became a master of the science and art of navigation. He worked as a ship carpenter, going once to Greenock, Scotland. Meantime his parents had come to reside in Washington, D. C., where, after various adventures on sea and land, Charles joined them, and went to work for the chief clerk in the General Land Office. That engagement opened his eyes to the advantages of the great West, so in 1831 he came to Indiana, reaching the State on foot. He went first to the community of Robert Dale Owen at New Harmony, with whom he seems to have been acquainted. Hearing there of the beauties and attractions of the northwestern part of the State, he resumed his journey and reached Laporte county. He first located at South Bend, worked awhile at Niles, then settled in Laporte county, completed the survey on the Michigan road lands under Judge Polk, which had been undertaken by his son, Adam Polk, afterwards Sheriff of Laporte county, and when the land sale at Logansport took place he purchased the lands in New Durham township where ever afterward he had his home. Being a carpenter, he worked at his trade in and about Laporte, and had several interesting experiences during the Blackhawk war. Mr. Cathcart was afterward appointed clerk in the Land Office at Laporte by John M. Lemon, receiver, whose daughter, Josephine, he made his wife. After his marriage Mr. Cathcart engaged extensively in farming, at which he was very successful. At the time of his death, August 22, 1888, he was justly regarded one of the county's foremost farmers.

In 1835 Mr. Cathcart became a Representative in the State Legislature, issuing during his campaign a frank statement of his position, which was published in the Michigan City Gazette. He ran for State Senator on the Democratic ticket in 1840, but was defeated, and was defeated for Representative in 1843, but was chosen district elector in the Polk and Dallas campaign of 1844. He served in Congress from 1845 to 1847, defeating Judge Sample, of South Bend, and was re-elected in 1847, in this contest defeating Daniel D. Pratt, who later on became a United States Senator. Mr. Cathcart was appointed United States Senator in place of James Whitcomb, deceased, serving from December 6, 1852, to January 18, 1853. He was pitted against Schuyler Colfax for Congress in 1860, but was unsuccessful. In the following canvass he took the stump as a War Democrat in advocacy of Mr. Colfax's Congressional candidacy, and his efforts proved quite a factor in that gentleman's election. Though not what is commonly called an orator, Mr. Cathcart was a power on the stump. When the war broke out he promptly took the side of his country, and his patriotism was manifest throughout the entire struggle for the preservation of the Union.

THE SLAVERY QUESTION AND THE VARIOUS COMPROMISES

NONE OF WHICH SEEMED TO HAVE POSSESSED COHESIVE QUALITY

AMONG the difficult problems which confronted the founders of this Republic in establishing a new power among the nations of the earth and making its government conform to the new ideals that had been evolved in the New World, none were more difficult of solution than the question of slavery and that of the proper spheres of State and Federal authority. Both problems were attacked in the true English spirit of opportunism and compromise—an endeavor to surmount the present difficulty and satisfy all parties. It is a noteworthy fact that both these problems were finally solved at the same time and by the same means—the force of arms.

In the earlier days, however, there was greater difference of opinion on the respective authority of the State and the Nation than there was on the slavery question. Even during Washington's first administration party lines were drawn between Federalists and anti-Federalists, and more intense partisan bitterness has never existed than was manifested by these two organizations before the close of the eighteenth century.

Slavery, on the other hand, was recognized by all as an evil and an anomaly in a free government, and the only differences that existed were as to the best methods of securing its ultimate extinction. The best exposition of the feelings and purposes of the fathers on this question is given in the address issued by the Democratic legislators of New York State at the close of the session of 1848. It has been termed the "First Gun for Freesoil," and was the joint production of Samuel J. Tilden, Martin Van Buren and the latter's son, "Prince" John. By ample quotations it showed that there was no sectionalism in the attitude of the founders of the Republic in regard to slavery. All considered it as an evil and looked to its ultimate elimination. The only differences of opinion were as to the means of bringing about the desired result.

The ethical side was epitomized in the words of Jefferson: "I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just." Patrick Henry voiced the wish and faith of all in these words: "I believe the time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil. Everything we can do is to improve the opportunity, if it happens in our day; if not, let us transmit to our descendants, together with our slaves, a pity for their unhappy lot and an abhorrence of slavery." The practical mind of Washington suggested the method of action: "I can only say there is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do to see a plan adopted for the abolition of slavery. But there is only one proper and effectual mode by which it can be accomplished, and that is by the legislative authority; and this, so far as my suffrage will go, shall not be wanting."

The plan of Washington was put into effect. The abolishment of slavery within its borders was conceded to be the affair of each State. But the matter of importation of slaves and the status of the institution in the territories was vested in the general Government. The Federal Constitution, which is the organic law of the Nation, provided that the slave trade might be abolished at the end of twenty years; and it was so terminated by Congressional action. Indeed, so careful were the framers of the Constitution to avoid even a recognition of the system that the word "slave" or "slavery" does not appear in it, "because," in the words of Madison, "they did not choose to admit the right of property in man;" moreover, by giving a three-fifths representation for the persons held in servitude, the Constitution lifted the bondmen above the grade of mere chattels, and one of the first acts of Congress was to reaffirm the "Ordinance of 1787"—written by Jefferson—prohibiting slavery forever in the territory, ceded by Virginia, north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi. In 1793 the first Congressional action towards allaying ill-feeling between the States resulted in the enactment of a law providing for the return of fugitives from one State into another. This law was popularly known as the "fugitive slave law," although its provisions related to fugitives from justice or involuntary servitude.

From the beginning the ethical consideration of the question of slavery was complicated by the financial interests involved. The respite of twenty years given the African slave trade was a concession to the shipowners and slave traders of the northern cities, and the abolition of slavery in the northern States was much facilitated by the fact that slave labor did not prove profitable in that section. Neither was that kind of labor particularly profitable at the South until after the invention of the cotton gin. But for the mechanical genius of Whitney, it is possible that the "opportunity" hoped for by Patrick Henry might have arrived during the lifetime of Jefferson, and slavery might have been abolished by the voluntary action of all the States, according to the plan suggested by Washington.

The rapid growth of the cotton industry having given impetus to slavery in the South, Congress, in its legislation for the Territories, recognized the institution in that part of the country lying south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi. The State of Louisiana was also admitted in 1812 with a constitution authorizing slavery. The States just north of the cotton-producing region also found it profitable to raise slaves for sale to the Southern planters. In the meantime an abolition sentiment had been growing in the northern States. The North had not only freed its own slaves, but was becoming active in opposition to any further extension of slavery in the Union. Out of this conflict of interests and ethical views a variety of opinions as to the system was developed and tenaciously maintained North and South. The unanimity of opinion held by the founders of the Republic was replaced by a diversity of views in which each sought to justify his own on moral grounds. One class believed in the right of a superior race to dominate an inferior one and boldly asserted that slavery was not only a humane institution, but had divine sanction as a civilizing instrument to elevate the negro from his native state of savagery. This view was held by influential religious organizations at the South and proclaimed from the pulpit and through the press. It was also held by these that the slave was better off than the free negro "running at large." Another class deprecated the existence of slavery, but contended that since it had been an established institution from the formation of the Union, there should be no interference with it. Still another class held that since slavery existed lawfully in certain States, legal protection of the property rights of the slaveholder was proper and necessary, but that there must be no extension of slavery into new territory. Then there was a fourth class, insignificant in numbers, it is true, but insistent in proclaiming its views, which held that slavery was wholly and totally wrong, "the sum of all villainies," and that, therefore, it had become a public duty to abolish the institution. In the course of the controversy the foremost champions of this last view were William Lloyd Garrison, Joshua R. Giddings, Gerrit Smith, Wendell Phillips and Owen Lovejoy.

In addition to the moral and economical aspects of the controversy, political complications arose. The slaveholding interests demanded that equality of representation should be maintained in the Senate—that is, that for every free State admitted there should be a corresponding one permitting slavery. This balance of power had remained until 1820, when Maine and Missouri applied for admission into the Union. Missouri was formed out of the "Louisiana Purchase," to which the North claimed that the provisions of the Ordinance of 1787 should be applied. The South, however, insisted that if Maine were admitted as a free State, Missouri should also come in as a slave State. The controversy became very bitter; but the matter was finally adjusted by admitting the two on the basis of the Southern demand, but accompanying their admission with a solemn compact that all other territory west of the Mississippi and north of the parallel of the south line of Missouri should be placed under the inhibition of the Ordinance of 1787; that is, it should be forever free. This measure became known as the "Missouri Compromise." Jefferson did not approve of the compromise. "I consider it," he said, "the knell of the Union. A geographical line coinciding with a marked principle, moral and political, once conceived and held up to the angry passions of men will never be obliterated." Prophetic words! The obliteration was secured only through the blood of thousands of Americans.

While agitation and discussion both within and without the halls of Congress waxed hot and bitter, no action of importance affecting the slavery question was taken until the war with Mexico rendered probable the acquisition of territory from that country. It is true that Texas, having secured her independence, had been on her own request admitted into the Union as a slave State, as also had been Arkansas, but there had been Northern States admitted also. The war with Mexico had, indeed, grown out of the admission of Texas.

Inasmuch as slavery had been abolished in Mexico, the question as to the territory to be obtained from that country involved leaving things as they were, or the establishment of slavery in communities where it did not exist—and anti-slavery feeling in the North was thoroughly aroused. In 1846, when the bill appropriating money for the expenses of the war was before the House of Representatives, David Wilmot, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, offered an amendment providing that slavery should be forever prohibited in any territory that might be acquired as the result of the war. This was the famous "Wilmot Proviso." It was adopted by the House but rejected in the Senate.

In 1848 the Democratic State Convention of New York adopted the principle of the Wilmot Proviso and passed resolutions protesting against the establishment of slavery in any of the Territories. This action of the New York Democracy awakened bitter antagonism in pro-slavery circles and resulted in sending a contesting delegation from the Empire State to the Democratic National Convention. That convention, after two days' deliberation, resolved to admit both delegations from New York, each with half the vote of the State. This proposition was indignantly declined by the Van Buren men, whereupon the "Hunker" contestants, headed by Daniel S. Dickinson, though sitting in the convention, took no part in the voting. General Lewis Cass was nominated for President. Then followed the Freesoil Democratic party with Van Buren as the nominee for President and Charles Francis Adams for Vice-President. The result was the election of the Whig candidate, Zachary Taylor.

In the meantime the struggle increased in bitterness. California, rapidly filling up with miners, mostly from the North, was asking for admission into the Union, and the population of Oregon had become sufficient to entitle it to territorial government. Texas was putting forth claims to part of the ceded territory, and the question whether slavery should be recognized in territorial governments had become very acute.

The Clayton Compromise, brought forward in 1848, proposed to leave the question of slavery in the territory involved to the decision of the Supreme Court. The Senate approved the compromise, but the anti-slavery House of Representatives rejected it. Finally, early in 1850, Henry Clay brought forward his compromises, which, after eight months, were enacted into laws, which resulted in the admission of California as a free State; the organization of Oregon as a Territory with slavery prohibited; the establishment of territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico without restrictions as to slavery; the area of Texas reduced, she being paid $10,000,000 for the loss of territory; the forbidding of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and the enactment of a stringent fugitive slave law. Neither side was fully satisfied with these compromises and their adoption helped to seal the fate of the Whig party.

Within two years propositions came for organizing a territorial government in the country west of Missouri. These resulted in an enabling act for the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, which was passed in May, 1854. This act, taking the Clay compromises as a precedent for leaving the question of slavery to the verdict of the people of the Territory, repealed the old Missouri Compromise and established the principle of what was by some termed "popular sovereignty" and by others "squatter sovereignty." Strife between the North and the South for the settlement of Kansas resulted in a civil war in the Territory and was a potent factor in forming the Republican party, whose chief tenet was that set forth in the Free-soil convention which nominated Van Buren in 1848, namely, that there must be no slave Territories and no more slave States.

Finally, to cap the climax of causes for irritation at the North, came the "Dred Scott Decision," delivered by Chief Justice Taney, of the United States Supreme Court, in the latter part of the year 1856. Dred Scott was a negro, who had been taken as a slave to Fort Snelling, in the Louisiana Territory, held there for several years, and had there married his wife, brought there in the same manner. They were then taken to Missouri and held as slaves, two children being born to them. In 1854 Dred Scott brought suit for the freedom of himself and family, basing his claim on the fact that they were unlawfully held in servitude at Fort Snelling because of the prohibitive clause of the Missouri Compromise. The suit passed through three inferior courts and reached the Supreme Court in December, 1855. It was reargued the next spring, but the decision was deferred until after the Presidential election of 1856. The decision, concurred in by six of the eight justices of the Supreme Court, was accompanied by an elaborate opinion from the Chief Justice. It held that two questions were involved:

First, was Dred Scott, even if free, being a descendant of Africans imported as slaves, a citizen of the United States, competent to bring suit in the courts? This question the court decided in the negative, and the Chief Justice, in his opinion, declared that at the time the Federal Constitution was adopted, and for a hundred years before, the practice of all civilized nations was based on the theory that the negroes were an inferior race fit only for bondage, and that "the black man had no rights which the white man was bound to respect."

The second question was whether the section of the Missouri Compromise forbidding slavery in the Louisiana Territory, on which was based the claim for freedom, was constitutional. This question also was answered in the negative, and Dred Scott's claim to freedom was denied. Moreover, the six justices declared that Congress had no power to exclude slavery from any Territory of the United States. It is worthy of note that this declaration is directly opposed to the opinion expressed by Samuel J. Tilden, "That Congress has no power to establish or permit slavery in the Territories."

By a singular coincidence of circumstances this "Dred Scott Decision" was made absolutely nugatory. Before it was rendered the negro family had been purchased by an anti-slavery man and made free; also, in 1854, the Missouri Compromise had been repealed. The decision, however, had a powerful effect upon the fate of slavery. It furnished the text for animated and earnest discussion throughout the North, particularly exemplified in the debate between Lincoln and Douglas in the Illinois Senatorial campaign of 1858. This discussion rallied the North to the support of the doctrine promulgated by the Freesoil Democratic Convention in 1848, which was now embodied in the rallying cry of the new Republican party—"No more slave States; no slave Territories."

As a result of fifty years of discussion, controversy and compromises, public sentiment had finally become divided along these lines: (1) Recognition of slavery in the States where it legally existed, but denial of the right to take slaves into the Territories and a demand that no more slave States be admitted into the Union. (2) Slavery being a recognized institution, the question of its introduction to be left to the people of the organized Territories.

(3) Slaves being recognized as property, the slave owner to be protected in taking his slaves where he should choose. It will be seen that the final decision was made without reference to any of these views. Slavery was wiped out of existence as a result of the unreasonableness and arrogance of the slave power.

The election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency in 1860 was followed by the great Civil War between the pro-slavery and the anti-slavery States. This war finally solved the two great problems which had confronted the founders of the Nation. The authority of the general Government was made supreme and the right of secession denied. Slavery was abolished, first, partially as a war measure, and, finally and completely, according to Washington's plan, "through legislative action" in the organic law of the Nation by the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution.

In this connection it is interesting to recall the origin of slavery, and particularly its establishment in this country. Slavery is doubtless as old as society. It is founded upon the law of force—that the weaker must submit to the stronger. Justinian, in his Institutes, refers its origin to three sources, viz., captivity in war, purchase of the individual for a price paid himself, and birth from a slave mother. African slavery is traceable to the first and third of these sources.

Slavery was introduced into this country by the sale of twenty negroes in Virginia from a Dutch man-of-war in August, 1620. So little favor did it find that at the end of fifty years there were scarcely 2,000 slaves in the colony. In 1699 the General Assembly passed the first of a succession of acts—twenty-three in all—prohibiting the importation of negro slaves; but every one of these acts was vetoed by the royal Governors, and one of the complaints against the King of Great Britain by the colonists was that he had prevented the people of this country from putting a stop to the injurious traffic. It is noteworthy, too, that one of the earliest acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, after the Declaration of Independence, was to pass a law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the State. This was, as a matter of history, the first legislation in the civilized world "setting the seal of reprobation upon that opprobrium of modern civilization," the African slave trade.

It occurred nearly thirty years before Great Britain took like action.

Thus it is seen that the introduction and maintenance of slavery in the colonies was against the wishes and in spite of the opposition of the colonists. It was due to the avarice of British slave traders and of owners of British slave ships, and was akin to the similar selfish policy which led England to make the new world the dumping ground for her criminals.

UNEXPECTED UPHEAVAL IN 1854

AND THE CAUSES THAT LED THERETO—SLAVERY, LIQUOR, KNOW-NOTHINGISM AND GENERAL DISCONTENT

IN the year 1854 the Democracy of Indiana held its State Convention in the balmy month of May (on the 24th). The attendance, as usual, was large. On motion of J. W. Borden, Lieutenant-Governor Ashbel P. Willard was made temporary chairman. Upon taking the chair, he delivered a characteristic speech—one that thrilled the great convention and aroused unbounded enthusiasm.

The honor of officiating as permanent presiding officer was conferred upon Senator Jesse D. Bright. The hearty greeting accorded him upon being presented to the convention bore eloquent testimony to the esteem in which he was held by his political associates.

As Vice-Presidents, these gentlemen were named: Richard Raleigh, Elisha G. English, John L. Spann, A. C. Pepper, James Osborn, J. M. Gregg, John S. Davis, Jacob Walker, A. L. Wheeler, J. C. Van Olman and Mr. Johnson.

On motion of B. R. Edmonston, Elijah Newland, of Washington county, was by acclamation renominated for State Treasurer.

On motion of General James R. Slack, of Huntington, William C. Larrabee was in like manner renominated for Superintendent of Public Instruction.

FIRST DEFEAT AFTER A DECADE.

After the stunning defeat in 1840, the Democrats of Indiana enjoyed an uninterrupted succession of victories, beginning with the triumphant election of James Whitcomb to the Governorship, in 1843. Every State election held thereafter signified a Democratic victory. Four gubernatorial elections resulted in the choice of Democrats—in placing at the head of the State government such faithful and efficient public servants as James Whitcomb and Joseph A. Wright, both elected to two successive terms. Notwithstanding the conceded excellence of their administrations, conditions arose that, at the time, were susceptible of being thoughtlessly construed to mean a vote of censure, but which in calmer moment was pronounced one of those strange manifestations which Mr. Lincoln mildly and considerably termed "wobbling."

A combination of circumstances led to the popular verdict of 1854. The repeal of the Missouri Compromise, brought about largely through the efforts of Stephen A. Douglas in the almost desperate hope and expectation of calming the rising storm of slavery and anti-slavery agitation; a renewal of the intensely bitter fight against the liquor traffic; the rapid spread of that political eruption known as Know-Nothingism, and a liberal sprinkling of indefinable discontent—all these irritations on the body politic contributed to the remarkable upheaval that led to what in effect amounted to a recantation of the verdict of 1852.

Edward E. Moore speaks thus of the manner in which the Fusion movement accomplished its purpose for the time being:

“Governor Wright’s administration was signalized by a great agitation. Several local and special acts dealing with the liquor traffic were passed by the Legislature of 1850, and in 1853 a general law, with local option features, was enacted. This latter fell under the condemnation of the courts on grounds of unconstitutionality, and the people, already impatient because of the evils of the traffic, seemed especially provoked at the result. So in 1854, rallying all the temperance forces of the State, and uniting all elements of opposition to the Democratic party, which at its convention had declared against temperance legislation, the temperance people succeeded in electing a full State and legislative ticket on a prohibition platform. The enthusiasm was tremendous. And when the Legislature met in 1855 it proceeded to pass a State-wide prohibition law, and the Governor, though a Democrat, signed it. But before the task of putting it in operation had proceeded very far this law also was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

“Largely because of the overshadowing importance now assumed by the slavery question the temperance agitation gradually subsided, but it never entirely ceased. Through spasmodic movements of different kinds and the continuous efforts of temperance societies and parties, the agitation has been kept continually before the people for more than a hundred years. It began before the days of Statehood. The evils of intemperance were especially marked in its influence upon the Indians. They would barter anything they possessed for the white man’s ‘fire water,’ and it not only affected their temper, making them troublesome and dangerous to deal with, but destroyed them physically. Stronger temperance documents than the messages and State papers of some of the early Governors would be hard to find.”

The Fusion convention was held Thursday, July 13, at Washington Hall, Indianapolis. Thomas Smith, of Ripley, a former Democratic member of Congress from the Fourth district, had been selected for president of the convention at a preliminary meeting, held the night before, presided over by Jacob P. Chapman, with John L. King, of Madison, as secretary.

Smith was a pronounced opponent of slavery extension. Associated with him were a number of other hitherto prominent Democrats, among them Oliver P. Morton, Dr. E. W. H. Ellis, Dan Mace, M. C. Garber, H. L. Ellsworth, ex-commissioner of patents, Capt. John A. Hendricks and others of that type. Most of these men subsequently became permanently identified with the newly organized Republican party.

In taking the chair, President Smith commented on the causes which had called together so vast a concourse of people. “It was,” he said, “the uprising of the masses determined to pursue the dictates of their own sense of right rather than the behests of party leaders.” He had been a Democrat all his life and was no less a Democrat now. No man had a right to say that the repeal of the Missouri Compromise was a Democratic measure so far as the sentiments of the majority of the Democrats in the free States were concerned. They were opposed to it; it had never been submitted to them; they had not and would not give their sanction to it. Forty-three of the Democratic members of Congress out of the eighty-nine members from the free States had voted for it. What right had any party to say it was approved by the majority of the Democrats from the free States?

Col. Smith, in the course of his address, spoke approvingly of the Ordinance of 1787 and its influence on the great Northwest. Rev. George B. Jocelyn, a Methodist minister, made his first political speech on this occasion, while Hon. H. L. Ellsworth and Capt. John A. Hendricks, both of whom had taken part in the recently held Democratic convention, repudiated the platform adopted at that time.

The official vote, as cast in the election of 1854, was:

FOR SECRETARY OF STATE.

| | | |
|------------------------------------|--------|--------|
| E. B. Collins, Dearborn, Fusion... | 98,259 | 12,623 |
| Nehemiah Hayden, Democrat..... | 85,636 | |

FOR AUDITOR OF STATE.

| | | |
|-----------------------------------|--------|-------|
| Hiram E. Talbot, Putnam, Fusion.. | 91,812 | 5,604 |
| John P. Dunn, Democrat..... | 86,208 | |

FOR TREASURER OF STATE.

| | | |
|-----------------------------------|--------|--------|
| W. R. Noffsinger, Parke, Fusion.. | 97,726 | 12,134 |
| Elijah Newland, Democrat..... | 85,592 | |

FOR SUPREME COURT JUDGE.

| | | |
|------------------------------------|--------|--------|
| Samuel B. Gookins, Vigo, Fusion... | 96,386 | 11,029 |
| Alvin P. Hovey, Democrat..... | 85,357 | |

FOR SUPT. OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

| | | |
|-----------------------------------|--------|--------|
| Caleb Mills, Fusion..... | 99,857 | 14,022 |
| William C. Larrabee, Democrat.... | 85,835 | |

Noffsinger received 23,367 votes on ballots bearing an incorrect initial. A bitter controversy arose over reputed efforts to prevent his taking the office, but the Governor issued to him the commission without compelling legal action.

It is worthy of note that Alvin P. Hovey, at the time of his nomination for Supreme Judge, was a member of the Supreme Court by appointment of Governor Wright. Addison L. Roache resigned from that body and was succeeded by Hovey, who entered upon duty May 8, 1854. The Democratic State Convention, which met on the 24th day of the same month, nominated Hovey for that position. At the general election that year, October 10, Samuel B. Gookins, nominee of the Fusionists, was elected over Hovey and served until 1857, when he was succeeded by James L. Worden. Democrat.

Addison L. Roache resigned from the Supreme Court bench May 8, 1854. Alvin P. Hovey was appointed his successor. At the next general election, held October 10, Hovey, who had been given the Democratic nomination, failed of election with the rest of the Democratic ticket.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

Not only did the Fusionists elect their entire State ticket and a majority of the General Assembly, but they also succeeded in electing nine of the eleven members of Congress. Only two of the eleven Democratic Congressional nominees escaped defeat. These were Smith Miller, in the First, and Wm. H. English, in the Second district. In the Lafayette district the Fusionists bodily captured Dan Mace, whom the Democrats had three times sent to Congress, and made him the Fusion nominee—and elected him with a majority of 2,519. Among the Democratic Congressional candidates who went down in defeat were Thomas A. Hendricks, in the Sixth district, beaten by 478 votes, and Wm. S. Holman, in the Fourth, defeated by Will Cumback. Only two of the nine districts that sent Democrats to Congress in 1852 stood firm. These were the First and the Second, re-electing Smith Miller by 813 and William H. English by 586. Two of the eleven—English and Cumback—were natives of Indiana. The delegation was made up of these gentlemen:

1. Smith Miller, Patoka.
2. William H. English, Lexington.
3. George G. Dunn, Bedford.
4. William Cumback, Greensburg.
5. David P. Holloway, Richmond.
6. Lucien Barbour, Indianapolis.
7. Harvey D. Scott, Terre Haute.
8. Daniel Mace, Lafayette.
9. Schuyler Colfax, South Bend.
10. Samuel Brenton, Fort Wayne.
11. John U. Pettit, Wabash.

THE ISSUES INVOLVED IN THE 1854 CONTEST.

With a view to enabling the discerning reader to gain a fair understanding of what was involved in this contest and brought about such drastic results, the platforms of the opposing parties are herewith reproduced in their entirety:

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1854.

"Resolved, That the Democrats of Indiana fully approve of the principles of the act extending the laws of the United States over and organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas.

"2. Resolved, That we concur in the opinion that it is not properly within the jurisdiction of Congress to determine the provisions of the constitution of a State, further than to require that it be a republican form, but on the contrary, that the people do possess the right and power to adopt such form of government as they may deem best suited to their views and wants, and that this right shall be recognized as one of the fundamental principles of self-government.

"3. Resolved, That this convention is distinctly opposed to that provision of the Nebraska and Kansas bill commonly known as the Clayton amendment, which made a distinction between native born and foreign inhabitants, who may be residents of the Territories, and feel gratified that the efforts of the democracy have been successful in expunging that odious feature from the act.

"4. Resolved, That intemperance is a great moral and social evil, for the restraint and correction of which legislative interposition is necessary and proper, but that we can not approve of any plan for the eradication or correction of this evil that must necessarily result in the infliction of greater ones, and that we are therefore opposed to any law upon this subject that will authorize the searching for or seizure, confiscation and destruction of private property.

"5. Resolved, That we regard all political organizations, based upon the single idea of temperance reform, as dangerous to the perpetuity of our republican form of government by withdrawing the attention of the people from the great political principles upon which it is founded, and that we most earnestly appeal to our fellow Democrats throughout the State to adhere, in the selection of members of the Legislature, to the practice of choosing such men as will make these great principles of Democratic policy, under the influence of which this country has been brought to its present elevated and prosperous condition, paramount to all other considerations.

"6. Resolved, That we have full faith and confidence in the wisdom, patriotism and ability of Franklin Pierce, President of the United States, and that we fully approve of the principles laid down in his inaugural message and his message to Congress, and that we most truly and cordially endorse the general policy of his administration as carried out in conformity with the principles laid down in said message.

"7. Resolved, That Judge Douglas, of the United States Senate, is entitled to and receives our hearty thanks for so ably advocating the principles of non-intervention, as contained in the Kansas and Nebraska bill, and that we cordially endorse the action of our Senators and Representatives in sustaining the same.

"8. Resolved, That the Democracy of Indiana, still adhering to the Constitution of the Confederacy, openly and avowedly condemns any organization, secret or otherwise, that would aim to disrobe any citizen, native or adopted, of his political, civil or religious liberty."

PEOPLES' PLATFORM (REPUBLICAN), 1854.

"Whereas, We, the freemen of Indiana, without respect to party, and actuated by a common devotion to our Republic, and a common reverence for its founders, have assembled ourselves together in commemoration of the passage of the ordinance of July 13th, 1787, consecrating the Northwest Territory to freedom; and,

"Whereas, The unanimous adoption of said ordinance by the Representatives of all the States in the Union at that date clearly evinces that opposition to the extension of slavery, to the extent of constitutional power, was the fixed policy of our fathers; and,

"Whereas, We regard the recent repeal of the eighth section of the 'Missouri Compromise' as a gross and wanton violation of the faith of the Union, plighted to a solemn compact, restricting the extension of slavery; therefore,

"Resolved, That we are uncompromisingly opposed to the extension of slavery; and further, that we utterly deprecate and repudiate the platform of principles adopted by the self-styled Democratic convention on the 24th day of May, last, endorsing and approving the Kansas-Nebraska iniquity.

"Resolved, That we will waive all former party predilections, and, in concert, by all lawful means, seek to place every branch of the Federal Government in the hands of men who will assert the rights of freedom, restore the Missouri Compromise and refuse, under all circumstances, to tolerate the extension of slavery into Territories secured to freedom by that compromise.

"Resolved, That we regard intemperance as a great political, moral and social evil—a legitimate subject of legislation—and that we are in favor of the passage of a judicious, constitutional and efficient prohibitory law with such penalties as shall effectually suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage.

"Resolved, That we utterly condemn the abusive attacks which have recently been made from various quarters on the protestant ministry of the country. We cherish with gratitude and pleasure the memory of their patriotic zeal in the Revolutionary struggle, and we recognize in the ministry of the country the worthy sons of such illustrious sires."

The anti-liquor movement began during the forties. It had assumed formidable proportions in 1848 and culminated in the election of a Legislature that had the disposition to deal drastically with the evil of intemperance. Several causes contributed to the creation of a pronounced sentiment in opposition to the liquor traffic. Quite a number of men high in office were notoriously intemperate in their habits. Some of them, otherwise held in high esteem, were retired to private life on account of their fondness for liquor. A man of extraordinary oratorical powers, chosen to represent Indiana in the Senate of the United States, shot his brother-in-law while both were in a state of intoxication. Malaria was quite common in Indiana, and the popular remedy was quinine and whisky. In agricultural pursuits whisky was considered an indispensable adjunct to harvesting. Snake bites were of frequent infliction, and whisky was the popular antidote. A "bracer" before breakfast was regarded an absolute necessity in many households. There were no internal revenue laws in those days, and a country store without whisky for sale was indeed a rarity. All these usages and practices had their effect. Popular education was too slow a process to lessen the evils of intemperance, so the conclusion was reached that the right course to pursue in the premises was to legislate. This was done. For the same reasons that Governor Thomas A. Hendricks approved the drastic Baxter law of 1873, Governor Joseph A. Wright signed the temperance legislation that came to him for approval or rejection during his second term of office. But the Supreme Court, elected by the people in 1852, made short work of this sort of legislation by declaring it to be unconstitutional in its main provisions. The grounds upon which this was done is briefly yet comprehensively set forth in this epitome, carefully formulated by the Hon. James E. McCullough, Assistant Attorney-General:

GROUND'S UPON WHICH LAWS WERE DECLARED UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

"The local option law was an enactment of March 4, 1853, and the prohibition law was approved February 16, 1855. The said local option law provided for taking a vote by townships annually at the April election on the license question, and that without the consent of a majority of the legal voters of the proper township 'for license,' none could issue. In connection with the affirmative vote a bond was also required by the applicant for license. So much of this act as made the issuing of a license depend upon the favorable vote of the township was held unconstitutional in Maize vs. The State, 4 Ind. 342. The decision of the court was based on the ground that the legislation was obnoxious to the sections of the constitution, which respectively provide as follows:

Section 25, Article 1: No law shall be passed, the taking effect of which shall be made to depend upon any authority, except as provided in this constitution.

Section 26, Article 1: The operation of the laws shall never be suspended, except by authority of the general assembly.

Section 22, Article 4: Local laws for the punishment of offenders and for the regulation of county and township business, are expressly forbidden.

Section 23, Article 4: Whenever a general law can be made applicable all laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the State.

"The holding of the court, in substance, was that so much of the legislation as made the legality of a license in a township depend upon the vote of the people was to make the taking effect of the law depend upon that vote, which, under the constitution, the Legislature was unauthorized to do. The court further says: 'If we regard the act of March, 1853, in force from its passage, as is claimed in argument, then we conceive it to be in conflict with Section 26 of Article 1. That section reads: "The operation of the laws shall never be suspended except by authority of the General Assembly."' As already indicated, the court also holds the act is in violation of the local law clause of the constitution above quoted.

"In the case cited, while the court holds that the local option feature of the legislation is void, it holds that the statute may nevertheless stand as a license law with the local option feature eliminated. However, in the case of Meshmeier vs. The State, 11 Ind. 483, the court overruled so much of the former decision as held that any of the act in question was valid, and held that the whole act fell in consequence of the local option feature being so connected with the other provisions of the act, as that a part could not be held valid and a part invalid.

"The prohibitory law of 1855 was held void in Beebe vs. The State, 6 Ind. 501. The decision in this case may be said to be based upon the ground that the legislation in question is ultra vires the Legislature of the State under the constitution thereof. The court says, on page 510: "The first section of the first article (of the constitution) declares that all men are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Under our constitution, then, we have some rights that have not been surrendered, which are consequently reserved and which government cannot deprive us of unless we shall first forfeit them by our crimes.' Several sections of the constitution are quoted by the court for the purpose of showing that the legislative power of the State under the constitution is not at all unlimited. For instance, the section providing that 'the privilege of the debtor to enjoy the necessary comforts of life shall be recognized by wholesome laws;' the section against 'passing a law impairing the obligation of contracts;' the section against 'any law restraining the free interchange of thought and opinion,' etc.

"These sections were quoted by the court in support of its position to the effect that the Legislature had by no means been given unlimited power over the unalienable rights of citizens or others within the State, and it is held that among these rights is that of acquiring property, selling or disposing of the same and using the same, and that intoxicating liquors are property, and were so regarded at the adoption of the constitution, and hence the right to manufacture, sell or use the same is one of the rights not taken away by the constitution, nor is power given to the Legislature to take the same away."

THE KNOW-NOTHING CRUSADE

THE PROSCRIPTION OF FOREIGN-BORN RESIDENTS AND OSTRACISM OF CATHOLICS

URING the early fifties a new party sprang up to hinder and harass the progress of national understanding and to defer the solution of the great problem that threatened the security of the American Government.

Party strife, resulting from violent contentions over State rights and abolition, could not fail but produce political movements inimical to sane reasoning and humane thinking. A mistaken sense of patriotism, a gross misconception of the requisites of true American citizenship, produced in these troublous times a peculiar organization known as the Know-Nothing party. As its name implies, it fostered sentiments, narrow and provincial, hostile to every internal instinct, and incompatible with the spirit of political freedom that characterized the founders of the great American Republic. It was directed first and essentially against Catholic influence, or Romanism, as this alleged danger was called. Its organization was founded on secrecy, luring the ready followers of formalism, such as enjoy connection with societies whose chief charm lies in rituals, oaths and vows of a more or less doubtful meaning.

Later the Know-Nothings turned their efforts more directly against the foreign-born element of our population. It is but just to acknowledge that many a sincere man was attracted into this circle of agitators who posed as the friends of liberty, and incidentally as the champions of the Southern slave. Then, too, not a few of the anti-slavery men supported the Know-Nothings in the hope of hastening the dissolution of the old Whig party and winning support for the Republican party, which a few years later was preparing to assume control of the Federal Government. The name of the Know-Nothing party had gradually given way to that of the American party. The organization continued to flourish under this more euphonious appellation without having changed any of its original tenets. Various demonstrations of ill-will against the foreigners, as well as a number of bloody assaults made on these inoffensive people, aroused strong resentment in certain quarters against these smug defenders of their self-interpreted Americanism.

The fact that foreigners sought protection within the fold of the Democratic party, by whom they were cordially received, began to arouse the opponents to slavery and the adherents of the Republican party to the danger that threatened their own political security. This unwarranted outburst of nativism had to be combated by some dignified expression of disapproval from a respectable source. One of the Republican leaders, Henry Wilson, United States Senator from Massachusetts, at one time said to have belonged to the now offensive party, turned his whole energy to defeat a measure, submitted by his own Legislature to a vote of the people, which provided that no foreigner should have the right to vote until he had been for two years a citizen of the United States. He and Edward L. Pierce, later the biographer of Charles Sumner, invited Carl Schurz, the great representative of adopted citizenship, to attend a public dinner given at Boston on the anniversary of Thomas Jefferson's birthday. This particular day was chosen in harmony with the rejuvenated Jefferson States Rights principle that had been revived in defense of the new fugitive slave law. The real object of Mr. Schurz's presence was to arouse a demonstration against the nativistic tide and save the State for nobler work. The dinner was held at the Parker House and was attended by the gentlemen already named in this connection, as well as by John A. Andrew, later War Governor of Massachusetts; Governor Boutwell, Frank Bird, Samuel Bowles and others. Denunciations of the fugitive slave law and the narrow-minded spirit of nativism were freely uttered by these champions of liberty and helped to pave the way for a larger and more striking gathering that took place a few days later, on April 18, 1859, at Faneuil Hall.

Carl Schurz was on this evening the speaker of honor and availed himself of the opportunity to voice in matchless oratory the sentiments that made him the ideal son of a great Republic, born though he was on foreign soil. In his memoirs Mr. Schurz apologizes for this wonderful outburst of feeling and excuses it on the plea of youth and the strength of emotions as yet uncurbed in the consciousness of the untold possibilities of civil liberty in America. It is to be regretted that the speech may not be reproduced verbatim, as every word breathes loyalty, devotion and a boundless love for the land of his adoption.

The first paragraph must suffice to indicate the spirit:

"A few days ago I stood on the cupola of your State House and overlooked, for the first time, this venerable city and the country surrounding it. Then the streets, and hills, and waters around me began to teem with the life of historical recollections—recollections dear to all mankind—and a feeling of pride arose in my heart, and I said to myself, 'I, too, am an American citizen.' There was Bunker Hill, and Charlestown, and Lexington and Dorchester Heights not far off; there the harbor into which the British tea was sunk; there the place where the old liberty tree stood; there John Hancock's house; there Benjamin Franklin's birthplace. And now I stand in this grand old hall, which has so often resounded with the noblest appeals that ever thrilled American hearts, and where I am almost afraid to hear the echo of my own feeble voice. Oh! no man that loves liberty, wherever he may have first seen the light of day, can fail, on this sacred spot, to pay his tribute to Americanism. And here, with all these glorious memories crowding upon my heart, I will offer mine. I, born in a foreign land, pay my tribute to Americanism? Yes; for to me the word 'Americanism,' true Americanism, comprehends the noblest ideas which ever swelled a human heart with noble pride."

Then follows a clear description of the first train of emigrants that left his home on the Rhine among the famous Seven Mountains, of the deep impressions that the sad farewell made upon his young heart and of the words of love and reverence that all spoke when they mentioned "that great and free country where a man could be himself."

He pointed out to his enraptured listeners how from the vigorous elements of all civilized nations a new and youthful Nation had been created; how this great Nation rested on the principle that all men are created equal and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. He showed how our political existence lifts the lowliest of the human family from degradation and inspires them with the elevating consciousness of equal human dignity; it accepts "the most conservative, for it makes a common cause of individual rights;" how the equality of rights becomes a mutual protection among men; "the general identity of interests is the one thing that guarantees the stability of Democratic institutions;" "equality of rights embodied in general self-government is the great moral element of true Democracy; it is the only reliable safety-valve in the machinery of modern society;" . . . "there is our safety; there, and nowhere else." And we have our difficulties. There are many who are incapable of independent thought, cramped perhaps by religious and other teachings not in accordance with the requirements of true Democracy. Heterogeneous elements, unfair aspirations and furious passions may apparently threaten, but the "genius of true Democracy will arise and restore calm. It is ideal to say that inexperienced people must first be educated to self-government. To this sophistry the fathers of this Republic oppose the noble doctrine that liberty is the best school for liberty, . . ." In this vein he continued, resting his case not on the emotional side of his heartfelt plea, but moving step by step through the rational and judicial aspects of a great cause on which rests the perpetuity of our institutions.

The wonderful appeal did not fail in its mission. He carried conviction and faith into the minds and hearts of his listeners, and proved that lofty ideals have their place in the plain business of popular legislation and statecraft. He likewise struck a blow at intolerance that has made it easier since to speak a kind word for the humble and the neglected. That a larger life, politically speaking, has grown from these practical precepts is evident on all sides. As the spirit of Know-Nothingism may never for long raise its head from the shadows to which it has been relegated, it still behooves us all to share the vigils of the true patriot who seeks above all to cultivate the spirit of tolerance and fair play in the land in which it can above all others be preserved inviolate for all time.

In Indiana Know-Nothingism took deep root for a time. To the credit of the Democratic leaders generally be it said, few of them faltered when this intolerant crusade was at fever heat. David Turpie gives this interesting account of what happened during that trying period:

"Although not a candidate in 1854, yet I was an active participant in the canvass then made, as in all the campaigns from 1848 onward. The opposition was at this time called the People's party, but the nominations, the active organization and movements of the party, were all controlled by clandestine association within its lines, known as the Order of Native Americans, commonly called Know-Nothings. Our canvass was made upon the principles of the Democratic platform as then announced. Our majorities in 1852 had been large and general; there was apparently no violent opposition to the course of our administration at Washington, and on the face of things success seemed probable. The public campaign of our opponents was a mere pretense; it dealt to some extent with current issues, but disclosed nothing of their real designs and policy. We felt, as the canvass proceeded, that there was something ajar in popular opinion, a subdued though quite an active commotion, but we were unable to divine its causes or to locate its effects. It became known from various sources that there were numerous defections from our ranks, and it was surmised that these made additions to the lodges of native Americans, which sprang into existence on every side, yet the personnel of these converts was known only to the brotherhood of the order, which, in its first obligation, bound the new member to conceal and deny his membership. It was not until after the election that we learned with certainty the aims and objects of this wide-spread combination.

"The result of the election in October, 1854, afforded us a good deal of information, and much more chagrin. A tidal wave of great force and rapidity had swept over our former constituencies. It had submerged the highest and dryest places in the political reserves; it had scorned calculation, laughed at prediction and tossed aside apportionments like chaff before the whirlwind. We were beaten on the State ticket, in the Legislature, in almost two-thirds of the counties, and if there had been anything else to lose we should have lost it.

"When, however, the Legislature met, which had been elected by these methods, when it had enacted the Maine law and other statutes quite as obnoxious to the people of the State, a reaction set in and the ebb became as swift and strong as the flood had been in their favor. Both Whigs and Democrats abandoned their connection with the order, revealed and denounced its hidden dogmas and designs, which now were made public and notorious.

"This movement had commenced in hostility to the Roman Catholic church, but soon comprised all foreign-born and naturalized citizens in its proscription. Catholics were to be subject to a special test oath of allegiance, and foreign-born citizens must reside twenty-one years in the United States before their admittance to the franchise; offices of trust and profit were to be held only by native-born Americans; all other citizens were to be excluded by law as ineligible. Americans must rule America. The passions and prejudices of mankind were inflamed to the highest degree by the most incredible rumors, circulated in the occult councils of the lodges. This led to many acts of brutal violence, and the scenes of bloody Monday, a frightful day of massacre and burnings, were heralded as a victory at the polls of true-born Americans against the rule of foreigners and aliens.

"The Democratic party immediately assailed and denounced this policy of exclusion, appealing to that liberal and generous spirit of the people which, from the beginning, had been so often shown in the legislation of our State. This appeal was not made in vain. Our success in Indiana in 1856 was even more complete than it had been in 1852; it resulted in the final overthrow of those influences of bigotry and persecution which had, by their stealthy approach, acquired for a brief period an apparent ascendancy.

"The prominent figure in the great campaign against Know-Nothingism was Lieutenant-Governor Ashbel P. Willard. . . . He was a wonderfully gifted orator. Before a popular audience his good humor was invariable. Neither question, interruption nor contradiction caused him the least annoyance; calmly he awaited the proper moment, swiftly delivered his answer or retort—the assailant vanished. With this constancy of self-control he was not otherwise lacking in emotion or sensibility; indeed, to use the phrase of the good people of that day, he was known to be uncommonly tender-hearted. The opposition made the objection to his selection as Governor that he would empty every cell in the penitentiary; that he could not resist importunity nor repel the prayer of sympathy. Sometimes he noticed this objection in telling his hearers that although he might not be so strict in the exercise of the pardoning power as some of his predecessors, yet he would take good care during his administration to see that no Know-Nothing received the benefit of the executive clemency. The crowd laughed and cheered, and the objection was forgotten. . . .

"In dealing with the dogmas of the so-called Native American Order, he sketched briefly, at the close, the lives and characters of Carroll and of Arnold, ending with a single sentence of contrast: 'Benedict Arnold was a Protestant, a native-born American and a traitor. Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, was an Irishman, a Catholic and a patriot.' This passage, much noted at the time, may be even now not unworthy of remembrance."

The most violent anti-Catholic demonstrations that occurred during this proscriptive movement were those at Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati and Louisville. What were in those days known as "Plug Uglies" had identified themselves with the Know-Nothing organization in some of these cities. They were a lot of coarse, brutal, ill-bred desperadoes who had absolutely no regard for personal rights or religious freedom. On the slightest pretext they would make violent assaults upon peaceable individuals whose only offense was that of having been born on the other side of the ocean or of worshiping in a church hated by these ruffians. It was unsafe even for Protestants to hold church or Sunday-school picnics if the membership thereof chanced to be mainly of foreign-born men and women. To such extremes were these acts of ruffianism carried that fair-minded Americans of commanding influence in their respective localities felt impelled to raise their voices in unmistakable tones against this flagrant violation of real Americanism. From North and South, from East and West, were sent forth vigorous protests against this proscriptive, oath-bound, intolerant order.

Perhaps the most lucid, logical and exhaustive treatment that was made of the Know-Nothing, or native American, propaganda is found in a letter written by Governor Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, in September, 1854, of which the following is an epitome, or rather an abridgment, for his own words are almost exclusively used:

"I do not think that the present state of affairs in this country is such as to justify the formation, by the people, of any secret political society.

"The laws of the United States—Federal and State laws—declare and defend the liberties of our people. A people free in every sense—free in the sense of Magna Charta and beyond Magna Charta; free by the surpassing franchise of American charters, which makes them sovereign and their wills the source of constitutions and laws.

"In this country at this time does any man think anything? Would he think aloud? Would he speak anything? His mind is free; his person is safe; his property is secure; his house is his castle; the spirit of the laws is his body-guard and his houseguard; the fate of one is the fate of all, measured by the same common rule of right; his voice is heard and felt in the general suffrage of freemen. Would he propagate truth? Truth is free to combat error. Error herself may stalk abroad and do her mischief, and may make night itself grow darker, provided truth is left free to follow, however slowly, with her torches to light up the wreck! Why, then, should any portion of the people desire to retire in secret and by secret means to propagate a political thought, or word, or deed by stealth? If it be good, why not make the good known? Why not think it, speak it, write it, act it out openly and aloud? Or is it evil which loveth the darkness rather than the light?

"Here is proposed a great primary, national organization, in its inception—what? Nobody knows. To do what? Nobody knows. How organized? Nobody knows. Governed by whom? Nobody knows. How bound? By what rites? By what test oaths? By what limitations and restraints? Nobody, nobody knows! All we know is that persons of foreign birth and of the Catholic faith are proscribed; and so are all others who don't proscribe these at the polls. This is certainly against the spirit of Magna Charta.

"Our condition of freedom at home shows no necessity for such a secret organization with its antagonism to the very basis of American rights. The proportion of native born to foreigners in the country is as eight to one, and a large part of the latter are already naturalized citizens. The proportion of Protestants to Catholics is twenty-one to one. What is the necessity for this master majority to resort to secret organization against the minority? To retire in secret with such a majority, does it not confess to something which dares not subject itself to the scrutiny of knowledge? Cannot the Know-Nothings trust to the leading Protestant churches to defend themselves and the souls of all the saints and sinners, too, against the influence of Catholics? Can't they trust the patriotism and fraternity of natives to guard the land against immigrants? As to their religion, I ask them, Why not rely on God? And do the Know-Nothings imagine that pride and love of country are so dead that secret organizations are necessary to beget a new-born patriotism to protect us from foreign influence?

"Now, in defense of our people, I say for them that no people on earth are more possessed with nationality as a strong passion than the people of the United States of North America. Nowhere have any people such certainty of the reward of vigilance; nowhere have they such freedom of self-government; nowhere is there such trained hatred of kings, lords and aristocrats; nowhere is there more self-independence or more independence of the Old World and its traditions—in a word, nowhere is there a country whose people have, by birthright, a title of what our people have to make them love that land which is their country and that spot which is their home. No! As long as the memory of George Washington lives, as long as there is a 22nd of February or a Fourth of July, as long as the everlasting mountains of this continent stand and our Father of Waters flows, there will be fathers to hand down the stories to make our hearts glad and mothers to sing 'Hail Columbia' to their babes—and that song is not yet stale. There is no need of a secret society to revive a sinking patriotism in the hearts of our people.

"And who would have them be selfish in their freedom? Freedom! Liberty! Selfish and exclusive! Never! Is there any necessity from abroad for such a secret political organization? Against whom and against what is it leveled? Against foreigners by birth. When we were as weak as three millions we relied largely on foreigners by birth to defend us and aid us in securing independence. Now that we are twenty-two millions strong, how is it we are become so weak in our fears as to apprehend we are to be deprived of our liberties by foreigners? Verily this seemeth as if the Know-Nothings were reversing the order of things, or that there is a different feeling from that of fear arising from a sense of weakness. It comes from a proud consciousness of over-weening strength, which would say to the friends of freedom abroad, 'We had need of you when we were weak, but now we are so independent of you that we are not compelled to allow you to enjoy our republican privileges.' But this secret organization is leveled not only against foreigners by birth, but against the Pope of Rome. There was a time when the very name 'Papa' frightened us as the children of a nursery. But how now with the papacy shorn of its temporal sovereignty? The idea of the Pope's domination at this day is as preposterous as that of the return of the Gunpowder Plot. Protestants and natives are here both free and strong. Do they wish in turn to persecute and exclude the down-trodden of the earth? God forbid.

"As a Nation we are but seventy-eight years of age. And the ancestors of this people, about two centuries ago, were foreigners, every one of them coming to the shores of this country to take it away from the aborigines and to take possession of it by authority, directly or indirectly, of the Papal power. His Holiness, the Pope, was the great grantor of all the new countries of North America. Foreigners, in the name of the Pope and Mother Church, took possession of North America, to have and to hold the same to their heirs against the heathen forever! And now already their descendants are for excluding foreigners and the Pope's followers from an equal enjoyment of this same possession. Much of the early settlement was due to the force and constraint of religious inhabitants. Puritans, Huguenots, Cavaliers, Catholics, Quakers, all came to the Western wilds, each in turn persecuted and persecuting for opinion's sake.

"The American Revolution made a new era to dawn—the era of liberty of conscience. Is it now proposed that we shall go back to the deeds of the dark ages of despotism? I trust that a design of that intent shall remain a secret buried forever.

"Our laws sprang from the necessity of the condition of our early settlers. The neglect of the mother country left the settlers self-dependent and self-reliant until they were thoroughly taught the lesson of self-government. They knew privation, fatigue, endurance, self-denial, fortitude—and were madmen at arms—cautious, courageous, generous, just and trusting God. They had an unexplored continent to subdue and they needed population, more fellow-settlers, more foreigners to immigrate and aid them in the task of founders of empire. They grew and thrived until they were rich enough to be taxed, and wise enough to perceive that taxation without representation is tyranny. The attempt of Great Britain to impose such taxation and their resolve never to submit to it brought on the alternative of war, and they all, foreigners and natives, Catholics and Protestants, took the dire alternative, united as a band of brothers, and declared their dependence on God alone. And they entered to the world a complaint of grievances—a Declaration of Independence. One of their first complaints was that King George was striving to prevent the population of the country by obstructing the naturalization of foreigners. Another was that they had made a vain appeal for justice to their British brethren, because of which they were driven to hold them as the rest of mankind—'enemies in war, in peace friends.' Then finally to uphold their liberties they mutually pledged 'their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor.' And who are they that, relying on the same God, made this solemn pledge? There was Hancock the Puritan, Penn the Quaker, Rutledge the Huguenot, Carroll the Catholic, Lee the Cavalier, Jefferson the Free-thinker. There were representatives of all the signers, and the signers were representative of all the people of all the colonies. Did not this pledge bind them, bind us, their heirs, forever to faith and hope in God and to charity for each other—to tolerance in religion and to mutuality in political freedom?

"But this organization is not only opposed to the spirit of our institutions, but seeks to annul the letter of our laws and constitutions. For the Virginian, the Declaration of Rights adopted June 12, 1776, is the fundamental law. This instrument declares that 'no man or set of men are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services, which, not being descendible, neither ought public offices to be hereditary.' Yet these Know-Nothings seek to confine all offices to native Protestants. The Declaration of Rights further asserts that 'all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love and charity toward each other.' But this secret society puts a penalty upon the Catholic, to say nothing of its lack of Christian charity.

"Know-Nothingism also seeks the amendment of the naturalization laws of the Nation and therein contravenes American spirit and practice. One of the best fruits of the American Revolution was to establish for the first time in the world the human right of expatriation. Prior to our separate existence as a Nation of the earth the despotism of the Old World had made a law unto themselves whereby they could hold forever in chains those of mankind who were so unfortunate as to be born their subjects. In respect to birthright and the right of expatriation, and the duty of allegiance and protection, and the law of treason—crowned heads held to the ancient dogma, 'Once a citizen, always a citizen.' If a man was so miserable as to be born the slave of a tyrant, he must remain his slave forever. He could never renounce his ill-fated birthright, never forswear the allegiance that bound him to its chains, and could never expatriate himself to a better country. If America beckoned to him to fly to her for freedom and give to her the cunning and the strength of his right arm to help work out her destiny, he must obtain permission and passport or be regarded as a fugitive from justice. But the foreigners came, and early in the Revolutionary war some of the best blood of the colonies were hung by the king's forces, under the maximum of 'Once a citizen, always a citizen.' Only Washington's threat of retaliation on British prisoners stopped the barbarous, arbitrary practice. At last our struggle ended and George III was compelled to renounce his claim for our allegiance. Still Europe was loth to give up its dogma, but the Fathers boldly defied her and placed in the constitution the authority of Congress 'to establish a uniform rule for naturalization.' The rule was established, and this great land made one vast asylum for the oppressed of every other land, and under its provisions the best blood of Europe has come to our shores, received protection and repaid our fostering care by helping to upbuild our Nation. These immigrants have become in every respect American citizens, endowed with all our freedom. They have been free to fight for the flag and they have fought for it with a bearing and sense of patriotic duty which prove them worthy fellow-citizens. The war of 1812 was partly due to our assertion of the right of expatriation by the foreigner and his naturalization by this Government. Does this secret organization, which opposes naturalization, wish to uphold the claim of England against that of the United States? Yet that is the logical result of its position in regard to foreigners.

"Again, Know-Nothingism strikes at the very equality of citizenship by denying to the Catholic or the foreign-born the right to be eligible to office. If these are granted citizenship and yet proscribed from office, they must be rated as an inferior class—an excluded class. The law, it is true, does not exclude them. Would the Know-Nothings, if they had the power, formally enact such exclusion? At present for them, by secret combination, to make this class unequal, to impose a burden or restriction on their privileges which the law does not, is to set themselves up above the law and to supersede by private and secret authority, intangible and irresponsible, the rule of public, political right.

"There is no middle ground in respect to naturalization. If we let foreigners be naturalized and don't extend to them equality of privileges, we set up classes and distinctions of persons wholly opposed to republicanism. The Federal Constitution especially provides that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States. The Know-Nothing violates the Constitution every time he refuses to vote for a candidate because he is a Catholic. Protestantism, in the days of the Reformation, protested against secrecy; it protested against shutting out the light of truth; it protested against proscription, bigotry and intolerance. It loosened all tongues and fought the owls and bats of night with the light of meridian day. The argument of the Know-Nothings is the argument of silence. The order ignores all knowledge. And its proscription can't arrest itself within the limit of excluding Catholics and naturalized citizens. It must proscribe natives and Protestants both, who will not consent to unite in proscribing Catholics and naturalized citizens. Nor is this all; it must necessarily extend itself to the business of life as well as to political preferments. Witness the dismissal of schoolmistresses from the schools of Philadelphia, and carpenters from a building in Cincinnati.

"But Know-Nothingism is also opposed to the faith, hope and charity of the gospel. Protestants did not oppose proscription because it was a policy of Catholics, but they opposed Catholics because they employed proscription. Proscription, not Catholics, was the odium to them. Here, now, is Know-Nothingism combating proscription with exclusiveness. Toleration by American example had begun its march throughout the earth. It trusted in the power of truth, had faith in Christian love and charity and in the certainty that God would decide the contest. Here, now, is an order proposing to destroy the effect of our moral example.

"Again, it is against the peace and purity of the Protestant churches, and in aid of priestcraft within their folds to secretly organize orders for religions combined with political ends. The world outside of the churches will be set at war with the sects who unite in this crusade against tolerance and freedom of conscience and of speech. Freemen will not submit to have the Protestant any more than the Catholic churches attempt to influence political elections. Protestant priestcraft is cousin-german to Catholic, and the worst union that could be devised is that of church and State. The State will prostitute and corrupt any church which is connected with it, and any State church will enslave any State.

"Know-Nothingism is against free civil government by instituting a secret oligarchy beyond the reach of popular and public scrutiny and supported by blind instruments of tyranny bound by test-oaths. Nobody knows who constitute the supreme council of the order or how many there are or where they are. Their adherents are sworn to secrecy. Their blows cannot be quarreled against, for they strike not boldly, like men, but in the dark, like assassins. How long will stand the pillars of freedom of speech and of the press when liberty of conscience is gone and birth is made to 'make the man'?"

"Know-Nothingism is opposed to our progress as a Nation. Did any nation ever so grow as we have done under our broad, liberal policy and our laws of naturalization? They have not made aristocracies, but sovereigns and sovereignties of the people of the West. They have strengthened the stakes of our dominion and multiplied the sons and daughters of America so that now she could muster an army, if need be, that would bid defiance to any invader. Now, shall all this policy and its proud and happy fruits be cast aside for a contracted and selfish scheme of intolerance and exclusion? Shall no asylum be left open to the poor and oppressed of Europe? Shall the growth of our population be arrested? Shall progress be made to stand still? Are we surfeited with prosperity?"

Governor Wise concludes his masterly manifesto with this earnest appeal to the sober judgment of the American people:

"We have institutions that can embrace a world-all mankind with all their opinions, prejudices and passions, however diverse and clashing, provided we adhere to the law of Christian charity and of free toleration. Nothing, nothing is so dangerous to these institutions; nothing can destroy them so soon and so certainly as secret societies formed for political and religious ends combined, founded on proscription and intolerance, without necessity, against law, against the spirit of the Christian reformation, against the whole scope of Protestantism, against the faith, hope and charity of the Bible, against the peace and purity of the churches, against human progress, against national acquisitions, against American hospitality and courtesy, against American maxims of expatriation and allegiance and protection, against American settlements and land ordinances—against Americanism in every sense and shape. Hence, as a Protestant American in every fiber and in every feeling, with all my hand and all my heart and all my might, in every character and in every sense, I protest against this secret organization, which seeks to proscriber Roman Catholics and naturalized citizens."

INDIANA DEMOCRACY'S ATTITUDE.

Clear, explicit and unequivocal was the attitude of Indiana's Democracy with reference to the proscriptive policies of the Know-Nothing party. In convention assembled at Indianapolis, January 8, 1856, the party defined its position by proclaiming these ringing declarations:

"Resolved, We recognize the great body of the people as the only tribunal for the decision of questions affecting their government, both as to men and measures, and open appeals to their reason and patriotism as the legitimate means of influencing their action, and we utterly condemn all associations and combinations for political purposes formed to govern them by oaths and obligations, or other compulsory means, or to impair the exercise of free will and independent judgment among them; and we hold in abhorrence all secret political orders and organizations, deeming them dangerous to the stability of government and the rights of the people.

"Resolved, We are in favor of religious toleration, as the founders of our republican institutions achieved and understood it, and secured its enjoyment by constitutional guaranties, and we declare that it ought to be maintained free from invasion either by means of legislative interference or the equally tyrannical proscription of political parties founded on bigotry and ideas of intolerance.

"Resolved, While we esteem it the duty of government to foster and protect religion without invidious preferences, leaving all free to choose among denominations according to their consciences, and while we esteem it the part of true religion, under every form, to render allegiance and due support to government, recognizing the Constitution as the supreme law in all temporal and political concerns, we hold the separate administration of the affairs of church and State essential to prevent that union of the two, which experience has shown to be pernicious to both and the worst form of tyranny.

"Resolved, That our naturalization laws, our republican institutions, our marvelous growth of national greatness and the happiness of our people, have been and are irresistible inducements and invitations to the inhabitants of less favored lands to become citizens of ours, and that past experience, justice, sound policy and national pride all concur to favor the continuance of our present naturalization laws; that if any abuses have grown up under those laws, they have sprung from their imperfect execution alone and not from inherent defects in the laws themselves, and that we are in favor of that policy which will soonest assimilate naturalized citizens with the mass of our people, and opposed to that anti-American and illiberal policy which proscribes the foreign-born citizen for the accident of birth and drives him to self-defense, to antagonism with our native-born citizens in feeling, political opinions and conduct."

More than one-half of the platform was devoted to the subject covered by the foregoing resolutions, which in itself serves as an indication of the strong feeling entertained by Indiana Democrats in opposition to the heresies so ably and so vigorously dissected by Governor Wise.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

The author of this book was, during the rage of Know-Nothingism, serving his apprenticeship in the printing establishment of George Bergner, at Harrisburg, Pa. In addition to conducting a printing establishment, Mr. Bergner was engaged in the book and stationery business on Market street, next to what was later on known as the Lochiel Hotel, named in honor of General Simon Cameron, whose country residence east of Harrisburg bore the Scotch name of "Lochiel." Diagonally across from the Bergner book store was a rival concern, owned and operated by one William D. Jack, a full-fledged member of the Know-Nothing organization. Mr. Bergner was born in Germany, but came to this country with his parents in early infancy. He married into a purely American family, none of whom could speak German. In his religious affiliation Mr. Bergner was a member of the English Lutheran congregation; politically he was a Whig, and later on an ardent Republican—the publisher of an orthodox Republican daily newspaper. Pandering to the proscriptive spirit of that time, Mr. Jack, in advertising his book, periodical and stationery business, used these words in his circulars and newspaper advertisements: "Buy your books, periodicals and stationery of an American in preference to a Hessian." The mere citation of such boorishness illustrates more strikingly than could be done through and by elaborate comment the meanness, narrowness and proscriptive spirit that then warped the minds of so large a number of zealots who made the accident of birth the supreme test of citizenship.

DEMOCRACY'S TRIUMPH IN 1856

INDIANA RETURNS TO DEMOCRATIC COLUMN—BUCHANAN CHOSEN PRESIDENT

THE Fusion triumph of 1854 in Indiana did not possess staying qualities. As a result of the splendid campaigning carried on by Lieutenant-Governor Ashbel P. Willard and his co-laborers in the cause of Democracy, the inroads made upon the ranks of the party in 1854 were effaced, popular confidence in the party's cause restored and Fusionism effectively repelled at the polls.

The State convention was held January 10, Judge James G. Reid, of Clark county, temporarily presiding. That the Bright element was in the saddle was made manifest by the election of John L. Robinson, of Rush county, as permanent chairman of the convention, and the nomination of Ashbel P. Willard as candidate for Governor. Both were staunch supporters of Senator Bright. Further evidence of the domination of the Bright element was furnished by the adoption of a resolution that in case the national convention should conclude to nominate a western man for the Presidency, the Indiana delegation be directed to cast its vote as a unit for Jesse D. Bright. It might here be stated, however, that when the national convention assembled at Cincinnati it had become quite apparent that the contest was between James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, and Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois. Under these circumstances it was not deemed advisable to put forward Senator Bright. Instead, the Indiana delegation was lined up for Pennsylvania's favorite son, James Buchanan, whose nomination was accomplished on the seventeenth ballot.

G. W. Carr, of Jackson, and James H. Stewart, of Carroll, were named as vice-presidents of the temporary organization, and as secretaries these gentlemen were chosen: John B. Norman, of New Albany; John S. Williams, of Lafayette; Solon Turman, of Greencastle, and Wm. H. Schlater, of Richmond.

Committee on Resolutions—C. Dobbins, C. K. Drew, Horace Heffren, P. M. Kent, Cyrus L. Dunham, J. W. Chapman, Daniel D. Jones, Cornelius O'Brien, Lafe Develin, Edmund Johnson, O. K. Dougherty, Martin M. Ray, D. W. Voorhees, Wm. M. Franklin, Dr. Jas. H. Stewart, D. C. Stover, David Turpie, George W. Spitler, Andrew Ellison, Frank P. Randall, D. Moss, and Dr. Isaac Parker.

The platform adopted by the Indiana Democracy approved the principle of the compromise measures of 1850 and their application as embodied in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, condemned all combinations for political purposes and secret political orders, stood for religious tolerance, holding separate administration of the church and State essential; declared that, while favoring sobriety and temperance, the party was opposed to the prohibitory liquor law passed by the last General Assembly; favored the naturalization laws then in effect, and went on record as opposed to what was held to be an anti-American and illiberal policy which persecuted the foreign-born citizen for the accident of birth and drove him in self-defense to antagonism with our native-born citizens in feeling, political opinions and conduct.

A supplementary resolution was adopted demanding the dismissal of any minister of a foreign government found to have directly or indirectly enlisted or aided in the enlistment within the dominions of the United States of any person to serve in a foreign war.

Another resolution endorsed "the faithful Democrats who, in the last Legislature, by their action prevented the 'Hindoos' disgracing the State by electing one of their tribe to the United States Senate."

THE STATE TICKET AS NOMINATED

For Governor—Ashbel P. Willard, of New Albany.

For Lieutenant-Governor—Col. John C. Walker, of Laporte.

For Secretary of State—Daniel McClure, of Morgan county.

For Auditor—Gen. John W. Dodd, of Grant county.

For Treasurer—Aquilla Jones, of Bartholomew county.

For Superintendent of Public Instruction—Prof. Wm. C. Larrabee, of Indianapolis.

For Attorney-General—Joseph E. McDonald, of Crawfordsville.

For Reporter of Supreme Court—Gordon Tanner, of Jackson county.

For Clerk of Supreme Court—William S. Beach, of Boone county.

A sharp contest was waged for the nomination to the office of Lieutenant-Governor. The contestants were Col. John C. Walker of Laporte and Robert Lowry of Goshen. Walker captured the nomination on a close margin. John L. Robinson wanted the nomination for Governor and sought an alliance with Walker. The latter refused to enter into the proposed combination. After the convention Robinson avenged himself by looking up the birth record of Col. Walker, whom he suspected of not being of constitutional age to fill the office of Lieutenant-Governor. Upon obtaining conclusive proof that Walker was in fact ineligible on account of his youth, Robinson caused the State committee to be called together for the purpose of removing Walker from the ticket and naming some other gentleman for the place. When Walker learned what had taken place he cleverly averted action by the committee as to himself by graciously tendering his resignation which, as a matter of course, was promptly accepted. Abram A. Hammond, a very estimable gentleman residing at Terre Haute, was selected to fill the vacancy.

The ticket placed in the field by the Republicans and People's Party organization was headed by Oliver P. Morton for Governor and Conrad Baker for Lieutenant-Governor. Though defeated at the October election in 1856, it is worthy of note as a remarkable coincidence that both were in subsequent years elected first to the office of Lieutenant-Governor and then to that of Governor. Morton had up to 1854 been a Democrat; Baker's affiliation was with the Whigs. Both were forceful characters and particularly strong on the political rostrum. Professionally both gained considerable prestige as members of the bar.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

Three Presidential tickets were in the field in 1856—Buchanan and Breckinridge, Democratic; Fremont and Dayton, Republican; Fillmore and Donelson, American. Fremont was the son-in-law of the famous Missouri Senator, Thomas H. Benton, and upon the admission of California into the Union was chosen by the Democrats to represent that young commonwealth in the Senate of the United States. Buchanan had long been conspicuous in the public service and was deemed especially well equipped to fill the high office of President of the United States. Donelson enjoyed the distinction of having been the adopted son of General Andrew Jackson. Inasmuch as there was not the slightest probability of his election, the matter of special fitness for the office to which he was nominated as the running mate of Millard Fillmore was of minor importance.

Indiana was quite conspicuous in the first Presidential convention of the newly organized Republican party in this, that it had for its permanent chairman Henry S. Lane, at that time the idol of his party. In the Democratic Presidential Convention, held at Cincinnati June 4, William Rockhill, of Fort Wayne, was honored with the position of vice-president and James Elder, of Richmond, with that of assistant secretary.

On account of the close political relationship established in 1854 between Whigs, Freesoilers and Know-Nothings, no Fillmore State ticket was placed in nomination. Therefore the October election was a contest between the Democrats and the People's party, the latter embracing the various elements that entered into a fusion arrangement two years prior. The result of this election is indicated in tabular form as set forth below:

So far as the choice for Congressmen was concerned, it came close to being an even divide—six to five.

THE NOVEMBER ELECTION.

The State elections held in October clearly foreshadowed the election of Buchanan and Breckinridge in November. The Democrats having carried both Pennsylvania and Indiana, the chances of the newly organized Republican party sweeping the country without the aid of these two "October States" must have appeared hopeless indeed, though it is evident that the tremendous strides made by the champions of Fremont and Dayton in New York and other States was quite bewildering to forecasters and prognosticators. Of the Western States, Indiana and Illinois alone were able to withstand the tide. The verdict of Indiana is expressed by these figures:

Buchanan and Breckinridge.118,670
 Fremont and Dayton..... 94,375
 Fillmore and Donelson..... 22,386

Buchanan's vote exceeded that of Fremont and Fillmore combined by nearly 2,000.

Truth of the matter is, Indiana was at that time far from being radical on the slavery question. As a rule, Whigs who basked in the sunshine of William Henry Harrison were more pro-slavery than was true as to Democrats; or, to put it differently, there was more Freesoil sentiment among Democrats of the Whitcomb and Wright school than there was among Whigs of the Harrison school. This was emphasized by the action of the Indiana delegation in Congress in 1848, when, on the 21st day of December, Daniel Gott, a Representative in Congress from the State of New York, introduced the following resolution:

"Whereas, The traffic now prosecuted in this metropolis of the Republic in human beings, as chattels, is contrary to natural justice and the fundamental principles of our political system, and is notoriously a reproach to our country throughout Christendom, and a serious hindrance to the progress of Republican liberty among the nations of the earth; therefore,

"Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to report a bill as soon as practicable, prohibiting the slave trade in said District."

The vote on this resolution stood, 98 yeas and 88 nays. The Indiana delegation at that time was composed of Elisha Embree, Thomas J. Henley, John L. Robinson, Caleb B. Smith, William W. Wick, George G. Dunn, Richard W. Thompson, John Pettit, Charles W. Cathcart, William Rockhill. Six of these were Democrats and four Whigs. Those voting for the Gott resolution were Cathcart, Embree, Henley, Pettit, Robinson, Rockhill—five Democrats and one Whig. Those voting "No" were Dunn and Thompson. Not voting: Smith and Wick. In later years Caleb B. Smith became a member of Lincoln's Cabinet, and Richard W. Thompson served as Secretary of the Navy under President Hayes.

Among those who voted for the Gott resolution was Horace Greeley, who had but a few weeks before been elected to Congress to fill a vacancy. The surprising feature of the proceeding was that Abraham Lincoln, serving a single term in Congress from 1847 to 1849, recorded his vote in opposition to the Gott resolution. Not a single vote from the slave-holding States was recorded in its favor, and only eighteen Representatives from the free States allied themselves with the Southerners in voting "No." That Abraham Lincoln, subsequently immortalized as the "great emancipator," should be found among these eighteen will no doubt afford amazement to thousands to whom this recital of a generally unknown historic fact may serve as a genuine if not startling revelation.

DEMOCRACY MAINTAINS ASCENDENCY

EVEN IN THE POLITICALLY TROUBLESOME YEAR OF 1858.

Perhaps the most interesting convention held up to that time by the Indiana Democracy was that which convened in the city of Indianapolis on historic Jackson Day, in the year 1858. It was at a time when excitement over the slavery question ran high, when lines began to be sharply drawn and when diverging roads were being chosen by Democrats. The "irrepressible conflict" over the slavery question made itself felt among Democrats who, up to that time, had cherished the hope that the spirit of compromise and conciliation might continue to hover over Democratic councils and Democratic gatherings, and that fatal division, for years dimly visible, might yet be averted.

The temper of the 1858 convention was in the main admirable. For the sake of party peace, men of strong convictions graciously yielded individual opinions as to forms of expression on burning issues, trusting that affairs might so shape themselves as yet to make it possible to proceed harmoniously to the solution of the weighty problems that engrossed the thought and attention of the ablest minds of the land.

Though the vote of Indiana in the Cincinnati convention of 1856 was cast as a unit for James Buchanan, the inference is not warranted that Buchanan was the real choice of all the delegates from this State. Among them were a goodly number of admirers and adherents of the "Little Giant," Stephen A. Douglas. They believed in him; they had genuine admiration for his extraordinary ability and his superb qualities of leadership. The unit rule prevented them from recording their individual votes for the idolized leader of the Illinois Democracy; they yielded personal preference to the conclusions of the majority.

When an irreconcilable conflict arose between President Buchanan and Senator Douglas with reference to the Kansas-Nebraska question, Democratic sentiment in Indiana was not slow in asserting itself on the side of Douglas in championing what was then known as "popular sovereignty"—the right of the people of a Territory applying for admission into the Union to decide for or against the introduction of slavery. By lending assistance to the slave power in the effort to establish slavery in Kansas, any number of those who in 1856 had voted for Buchanan and Breckinridge became pronounced opponents of the Buchanan administration in its attempt to foist the Lecompton constitution on the people of Kansas Territory. The administration policy, however, had strong support in the two United States Senators, Jesse D. Bright and Graham N. Fitch, in Governor Willard, in John L. Robinson, and other Federal officeholders, besides that always formidable element which believes in "standing by the party, right or wrong."

The convention was called to order by Joseph W. Chapman, member of the State Central Committee. Two distinguished gentlemen were put forward for the permanent chairmanship of the convention—Governor Ashbel P. Willard and Congressman William S. Holman. The vote stood 338 for the Governor and 233 for the Congressman. Willard having been known as an administration man, his triumph afforded undisguised satisfaction to that side of the house. The action of the convention in shaping up the platform casts some doubt upon the accuracy of measurement of strength as to Willard and Holman in the matter of factional alignment.

Much of the convention's time was devoted to the consideration and discussion of the platform. In course of the animated debate General Lew Wallace, of Montgomery, offered a resolution in favor of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, asserting that "by practical application of that bill the people of a State or a Territory should be, as they are inalienably, invested with the right of ratifying or rejecting, at the ballot box, any constitution that may be framed for their government; and that now and hereafter no Territory should be admitted into the Union, as a State, without a fair expression of the will of its people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application for admission."

Daniel W. Voorhees spoke sustaining the resolutions as they had been adopted, maintaining they were the policy of the administration and contending that the people of Kansas were competent to settle their own affairs. The Indianapolis Sentinel, in commenting on this speech, stated that Voorhees was effective and conciliatory, his well-toned declarations carrying conviction to the mind and heart of every Democrat.

W. S. Holman counseled moderation and insisted on the right of the States and Territories to establish and maintain their own institutions.

J. W. Chapman, of Jefferson county, reported for the committee to which the resolution had been submitted as still being in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska act, that the people should have the opportunity of ratification or rejection, and contending that the same should accompany their application for admission.

O. K. Dougherty, of Morgan county, submitted a minority report reiterating as above, but contending that evidence of such exercise or refusal should accompany the application for admission.

General Wallace then withdrew his motion to lay the report of the majority and minority on the table and moved that his original resolution be submitted therefor, which carried 317 to 199.

The report as amended was adopted, as follows: 378 ayes to 114 noes:

"Resolved, That we are still in favor of the great doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and that by a practical application of that doctrine the people of a State or of a Territory are vested with the right of ratifying or rejecting, at the ballot box, any constitution that may be formed for their government; and that, hereafter, no Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State without a fair expression of the will of the people being first had upon the constitution accompanying the application of admission."

Notwithstanding the fact that such men as Lew Wallace and Judge Holman expressed themselves as well satisfied with the foregoing declaration, there was still marked dissatisfaction over the spirit and phraseology of certain parts of the resolutions. This was emphasized by Aquilla Jones, a lifelong friend of Thomas A. Hendricks, in declining to accept a re-nomination to the office of State Treasurer unanimously bestowed on him. In adopting this course, Mr. Jones declared that "one of the vital principles of the Democratic party must have either been omitted or asserted in such a manner as to be susceptible of an equivocal construction."

STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

1. John Hargrove, Gibson county.
 2. Michael C. Kerr, Floyd.
 3. Joseph W. Chapman, Jefferson.
 4. John L. Robinson, Rush.
 5. Lafe Develin, Wayne.
 6. Charles W. Hall and John Elder, Marion.
 7. Daniel W. Voorhees, Vigo.
 8. James H. Stewart, Carroll.
 9. O. Everts, Laporte.
 10. Samuel W. Sprott, DeKalb.
 11. Wilson Smith, Wabash.
- John R. Elder, chairman.

THE TICKET NAMED.

For Secretary of State—Daniel McClure, Morgan county.
 For Auditor—John W. Dodd, Grant county.
 For Treasurer—Nathaniel F. Cunningham, Vigo county.

For Superintendent of Public Instruction—Samuel L. Rugg, Allen county.

For Attorney-General—Joseph E. McDonald, Montgomery county.

For Supreme Court Judges—Samuel E. Perkins, Marion; Andrew Davison, Decatur; James M. Hanna, Sullivan; James L. Worden, Whitley.

The campaign was marked by considerable vigor, both parties putting forth strong efforts to carry the State. Though many members of the organization still manifested a disposition to pose as a People's party, the name Republican gradually became more agreeable to the rank and file and was finally accepted. The Republican ticket for 1858 was made up of these widely-known gentlemen:

Secretary of State—William A. Peelle, Randolph county.

Auditor of State—Albert Lange of Terre Haute.

Treasurer of State—John H. Harper of South Bend.

Attorney-General—William T. Otto of New Albany.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—John Young, Indianapolis.

Supreme Judges—Horace P. Biddle, Logansport; Abram W. Hendricks, Madison; Simon Yandes, Indianapolis; William D. Griswold, Terre Haute.

Territorially, these selections could hardly have been better chosen. The ticket was generally pronounced a strong one, even its most pronounced opponents conceding its availability. Placing a capable and popular German living in Terre Haute on the ticket for State Auditor was especially adjudged a fine stroke of policy. Nevertheless the ticket went down in defeat—not by heavy majorities, yet sufficiently so to serve all practical purposes. Indiana simply was not yet ready to be placed in the Republican column.

THE OFFICIAL VOTE.

Secretary of State—McClure, 107,409; Peelle, 104,828.

Auditor—Dodd, 107,242; Lange, 105,493.

Treasurer—Cunningham, 107,634; Harper, 105,416.

Attorney-General—McDonald, 107,291; Otto, 105,757.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—Rugg, 107,910; Young, 105,014.

Judges Supreme Court—

Worden, 107,681; Biddle, 104,582.

Davison, 107,608; Hendricks, 104,492.

Perkins, 108,158; Yandes, 104,086.

Hanna, 107,076; Griswold, 104,965.

THE CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

There was something of a shakeup in the composition of the Congressional delegation, though it could hardly have been designated as partaking of a revolutionary character. The new men who came in were James Hughes, William M. Dunn, Wm. S. Holman, Albert G. Porter and Charles Case. Wm. H. English made his last race. Four triumphant elections seemingly satisfied his ambition. He gained quite a reputation as a national legislator during the eight years of his service in the halls of Congress. Political upheavals didn't seem to affect his candidacy at any time; a nomination in his case meant an election. After the breaking out of the war he moved to Indianapolis, engaged in banking, and in course of time accumulated a large fortune. He would have made an excellent Governor, but never aspired to that office. His eyes were fixed upon the Presidency of the United States, but he did not get farther in this direction than the obtainment of the nomination for Vice-President in 1880, when the gallant Winfield Scott Hancock was defeated for the Presidency by the scholarly James A. Garfield. That result was due to the folly of the Democrats failing to renominate the "old ticket" of 1876. No power on earth could have prevented a vindication of the majesty of the ballot through the triumphant re-election of Tilden and Hendricks.

EX-GOVERNOR WRIGHT MADE AMBASSADOR TO BERLIN.

After the election of Buchanan to the Presidency, a general impression prevailed that Indiana would be honored with a Cabinet position. Senator Bright and Governor Wright were under consideration. The former naturally preferred to remain in the Senate to being placed at the head of the State Department. Not being overly blessed with the world's goods, Governor Wright decided not to accept the Secretaryship of the Interior, for which he was so eminently qualified. He, however, indicated a willingness to go to Europe in the capacity of Ambassador to Prussia. This was quite agreeable to Senator Bright, as it put the wide ocean between him and the man who had given him so much trouble politically for so long a time. Buchanan made the appointment quite willingly, and Bright, for reasons stated, saw to it that Wright's appointment was promptly confirmed by the Senate. Ambassador Wright made an excellent record as such.

UNDER NEW LEADERSHIP

INDIANA'S DEMOCRACY ENTERS UPON NEW ERA—THOMAS A. HENDRICKS PILOTS THE PARTY DISCREETLY AND SAFELY FOR QUARTER CENTURY

IGNS of the times in 1858 pointed unmistakably to the inauguration of a new era in Indiana politics. The leaven was working. The culmination could not be far in the distance.

Weeks before the assembling of the State convention, fixed by the proper authorities upon Wednesday, January 11, 1860, Democrats throughout the State determined to take part in the deliberations of this representative body. The friends as well as the enemies of Stephen A. Douglas had become thoroughly aroused and quietly but resolutely resolved to take a hand in deciding who should be entrusted with the leadership of the National Democracy, in so far as this could be determined by the Democratic sovereigns of the Hoosier commonwealth. So intense had become the feelings of the warring elements that the carrying of deadly weapons was by not a few considered an essential part of complete and self-justifiable equipment.

Seven counties had sent double delegations. These were Hancock, Jackson, Jennings, Laporte, Lawrence, Randolph and Spencer. The presence of the largest number of accredited delegates yet assembled in any State convention rendered expedient and necessary the adoption of a rule that only delegates, candidates for office, members of the press and members of the State Central Committee be admitted to Metropolitan Hall, in which the convention was ordered to be held. The supporters of Douglas had come to an understanding that Judge Robert Lowry, then proprietor of the Goshen Democrat, must be made permanent chairman of the great convention. Obstacles were in the way, but by judicious management these were removed. Joseph W. Chapman rapped the assembly to order. General Lew Wallace put Lowry in nomination for temporary chairman. This was quickly followed by a motion that a permanent instead of a temporary chairman be elected. The convention was thrown into confusion, amidst which Governor Willard sought to sway the vast assembly by his persuasive eloquence. In this he was frustrated by apt rejoinders to his catchy phrases. Pointed reminders that he was not an accredited delegate and therefore not entitled to the floor were fired at him. This elicited an offer from White county to make the Governor one of its delegates. Finally the difficulty found adjustment by the Marion county delegation announcing a vacancy in its ranks and the election of Governor Willard to fill the same. Thereupon Governor Willard gained recognition by the Chair and immediately proceeded to nominate for permanent chairman Judge Samuel E. Perkins, of Indianapolis. This motion was presented in the form of an amendment to the pending motion.

Gordon Tanner, of Jackson county, gained the floor and said he "would not try to amend if a direct vote was to be taken between Judge Lowry and Judge Perkins—Judge Lowry, the friend of Stephen A. Douglas, and Judge Perkins as the administration candidate."

Finally the vote was taken. It resulted in 189½ votes for Lowry and 174½ for Perkins. A motion to make Lowry's election the unanimous action of the convention was adopted by acclamation. J. J.

Bingham, of Indianapolis; John B. Norman, of New Albany; S. A. Hall, of Logansport, and Geo. E. Greene, of Vincennes, were made secretaries of the convention. All of them were editors and staunch supporters of the "Little Giant."

So much time was consumed in the transaction of routine business, the selection of a committee on resolutions, etc., that the convention readily assented to an adjournment to the following morning.

SECOND DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

Feeling continued to be intense, though more calm. The friends of Douglas felt assured that they had won the battle, but they also felt that they must not rest on their oars nor be found napping.

INSTRUCTED FOR DOUGLAS.

Col. John C. Walker, of Laporte, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That while we pledge the support of the Democracy of Indiana to the nominee of the Charleston convention, whomsoever he may be, the delegates to that body from this State are instructed to cast their votes as a unit for Stephen A. Douglas, and to use all honorable means in their power to secure his nomination."

United States Marshal John L. Robinson moved to amend by striking out the name of Douglas and inserting that of Joseph Lane.

An amendment was offered that each Congressional district appoint its delegates with or without instructions; that the convention instruct delegates-at-large, and also all delegates to vote as a unit, a majority determining their attitude. The amendment was lost 160 to 236. The Walker resolution was then adopted—ayes, 265; noes, 129.

This definitely fixed Indiana's attitude with reference to the Democratic Presidential nomination. It served as a prelude to the formal declaration embodied in the platform agreed upon and reported by the committee on resolutions. The platform bears evidence of having been carefully considered, sentence by sentence, and as having been constructed by men of exceptional ability. As an entirety it may fairly be pronounced a masterpiece of political pronouncement, in accord with the then dominant sentiment of the Indiana Democracy. From a literary point of view it excelled any of the platforms thitherto adopted by any preceding State convention. The party's preference for Stephen A. Douglas was set forth in this ringing declaration:

"Resolved, That as a statesman of tried character, and a citizen in whom all sections of the Union may confide their interests, as the friend and supporter of our rights at home and our honor abroad, and in the sincere conviction that we will thereby contribute to secure to all sections of the Union, and each of the States, their just and equal rights and their full share in the benefits of our Federal Union, and in no sectional spirit, but in the expansive love of our whole country, the Democracy of Indiana present to the convention of the American Democracy to assemble at Charleston as their choice for nomination as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, the name of Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, and believing him to be the preference of an overwhelming majority of our people, we hereby instruct the delegates this day appointed by us to that convention to cast their votes in his favor as a unit so long as his name is before the convention, and to use all honorable efforts to secure his nomination; and the delegation is also instructed to vote as a unit upon all questions which may come before that body as a majority of the delegates may determine."

HENDRICKS NOMINATED FOR GOVERNOR.

Colonel Cyrus L. Dunham, who had been appointed Secretary of State by Governor Willard in 1859 to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Daniel McClure, affiliated with the Buchanan wing of the party. As such he became an avowed aspirant to the nomination for Governor. Though pronounced in his views as to party policy, he was neither an extremist nor a factionist. He believed in subordinating personal views to the will of the majority; in being "regular." When it became apparent that the Douglas wing was clearly and unmistakably in the ascendancy, he not only abandoned his candidacy for the Governorship, but rose in the convention, and in a forceful, eloquent speech moved that Thomas A. Hendricks be nominated by acclamation. This generous action on the part of Colonel Dunham aroused intense enthusiasm and had much to do with creating a harmonious spirit in framing up the ticket in its entirety. Without serious friction the ticket was completed by naming Judge David Turpie, of White county, for Lieutenant-Governor; William H. Schlater, of Richmond, for Secretary of State; Joseph Ristine, of Fountain county, for Auditor; Nathaniel F. Cunningham, of Terre Haute, for Treasurer; Oscar B. Hord, of Greensburg, for Attorney-General; Samuel L. Rugg, of Fort Wayne, for Superintendent of Public Instruction; Cornelius O'Brien, of Lawrenceburg, for Clerk of the Supreme Court, and Michael C. Kerr, of New Albany, for Reporter of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Hendricks was the unanimous choice of the supporters of Douglas. Always conciliatory and conservative, Mr. Hendricks, while unequivocally the choice of the admirers of the "Little Giant," was not offensive or even objectionable to the moderate adherents of the Buchanan policy. Resigning the office of Land Commissioner, which he held part of the time under the Pierce and Buchanan administrations, avowedly for the purpose of re-entering upon the practice of law, he had freed himself of obligation implied in administration affiliation and was thus unhampered in the expression of whatever views he might hold with reference to party policy. The wisdom of his counsel was made manifest by the selection of Colonel Dunham as an Elector-at-Large, though not at the time altogether apparent to the fiery element of the Douglas following. Dunham verified the excellence of Mr. Hendricks' judgment by taking the stump in favor of the regular Democratic ticket and delivering a series of very effective speeches. Strong efforts were made by Senator Bright to induce Colonel Dunham to decline the electorship candidacy and join the Breckinridge forces; but though the ties of friendship between these two men were strong and of long tenure, Colonel Dunham stood firm, and throughout the campaign appealed with fervid eloquence to Democrats to stand unflinchingly by the regular organization.

The campaign from opening to close was intensely earnest, thrillingly interesting and unrestrictedly determined. No Presidential nominee, not excepting Henry Clay, had, up to that time, had more devoted or enthusiastic supporters than Stephen A. Douglas. His captivating personality, his striking physiognomy, his massive head, and his persuasive eloquence made him the idol of those who rallied under his banner. That his courageous defiance of the slave power and his heroic resistance to the attempt to force slavery upon Kansas drew to him thousands of Democrats who felt ill at ease under the imposition of policies inconsistent with the teachings of Jefferson, Van Buren and Tilden, had become plainly apparent. These men felt that the time had come to command a halt and they asserted themselves in no uncertain manner.

The Indiana delegation to the Charleston and Baltimore conventions stood manfully by the "Little Giant." On their part there was no wavering, no sign of timidity or lack of courage. Both at Charleston and later on at Baltimore they stood unflinchingly by their guns. When, at the close of the drama at Baltimore, it had become apparent to them that the party to which they were so strongly wedded and for which they had fought so many political battles, would in all probability meet with defeat at the polls in October and in November, they started upon their homeward journey with the inflexible determination to do all that could be done to make as good a showing at the polls as was possible to be done.

The adjourned session at Baltimore began June 18. Three days were consumed in wrangling over the platform. That disposed of, followed by the withdrawal of the Southern Secessionists and a small number of sympathizers from the North, the nomination of Douglas was easily effected by an almost unanimous vote. Senator Benjamin Fitzpatrick, of Alabama, was nominated for the Vice-Presidency, but promptly declining the proffered honor, Herschel V. Johnson, of Georgia, was substituted by the National Committee, hastily summoned for the purpose of filling the vacancy.

Vexed by Senator Bright's "pernicious activity" in working up opposition to the regular nominees of the party, both State and national, the leaders decided that unusual energy must be injected into the campaign. The middle of July a mass meeting was held at Indianapolis to ratify the nomination of Douglas and Johnson. Twenty thousand enthusiastic Democrats gathered at the State capital to give expression to their feelings. The speakers at this meeting were: Governor Willard, Senator Geo. E. Pugh of Ohio, Congressman C. L. Vallandigham of Dayton, Samuel R. Hamill of Sullivan, Thomas A. Hendricks, Richard J. Ryan and Judge W. W. Wicks. Mr. Ryan introduced a resolution which, after some discussion, passed in this form:

"Resolved, That we, the Democracy of Indiana, in mass convention assembled, unanimously condemn the course of all those who are endeavoring to disorganize the Democratic party of Indiana by their opposition to the regular nominees of the Democratic National Convention, Stephen A. Douglas and Herschel V. Johnson."

The Indianapolis Sentinel fought valiantly for the regular ticket. Here is a sample of its onslaughts on the Secessionists. It is quoted from the Sentinel's issue of July 20:

"The fact that Breckinridge and Lane are the candidates for the disunionists cannot be successfully denied. Those of the North who seek to defeat Douglas swear that Breckinridge and Lane are Union men, but the supporters of those candidates at the South talk differently. The Montgomery (Ala.) Mail thus openly avows the purpose for which Breckinridge and Lane have been nominated. That paper says:

Run three presidential tickets against Lincoln, thereby giving Lincoln the best chance to be elected. After Lincoln is elected some Southern communities—most of them perhaps—will refuse to let the postmasters appointed under his administration take possession of the office. Then the United States authorities will interpose to "enforce the law." Then the United States authorities will either be shot upon or they will shoot somebody down. Then the people of the community will arise up against the United States Government and will be sustained by neighboring communities until a civil war, with all its horrible butcheries, envelops the land in a shroud of blood and carnage."

According to the Sentinel of September 20, the friends of Breckinridge and Lane "Held a meeting in Indianapolis on Monday last and adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it would be inexpedient at this time to place a national Democratic State ticket in the field for State officers.

Resolved, That in view of the conciliatory overtures which have from time to time been made to the friends of Mr. Douglas in this State and rejected by them, if the present State ticket be defeated they alone will be responsible for the result.

"Resolutions signed by W. H. Talbott, chairman, and John R. Elder, secretary."

The Sentinel went on to say that both of these gentlemen were members of the Democratic State Convention on the 11th of January last and the candidates upon the Democratic ticket were their choice and received their cordial support.

An imposing Douglas demonstration was held at Indianapolis September 28. It attracted thousands of the "Little Giant's" admirers to the State capital. He arrived the evening before, and was greeted by a large and enthusiastic crowd. Being tired out by exhaustive campaigning, he retired to his room at the Bates House, but at the earnest solicitation of the vast crowd appeared on the balcony. After a few fitting allusions to Hoosier fidelity and enthusiasm, Senator Douglas excused himself and returned to his room.

Attorney-General Joseph E. McDonald then introduced Governor David Todd, of Ohio, who presided over the convention at Baltimore after Caleb Cushing, of Massachusetts, had vacated the Chair and seceded, accompanied by Ben Butler. Governor Todd delivered a speech that elicited unbounded enthusiasm. He was followed by C. A. Schaefer, of Ohio, and the brilliant Indianapolis orator, Richard J. Ryan.

The vast concourse that did honor to Senator Douglas afforded high elation to his supporters. The parade was an immense affair. It was under command of Captain John M. Lord, as chief marshal, whose Indianapolis assistants were Captain Love, H. H. Dodd, John F. Gulick, Capt. H. Prosser, Gen. W. J. Elliott, Dr. A. D. Gall, Samuel Hesselgesser, J. B. Ryan, Capt. M. North, S. M. McCarty, Wm. Wilkinson, Charles Howland, Samuel A. Todd, Frank Cunningham, Reginald H. Hall, Jacob Mull, George W. Pitts, Julius Boetticher, John Stumph and Daniel C. Greenfield.

Assistant marshals for the State at large were George E. Greene, Col. T. G. Lee, Gen. L. Druley, Gen. J. B. Foley, Gen. J. P. Drake, Gen. W. D. Allen, Capt. Lew Wallace, Geo. W. Spittler, Dr. Geo. W. McConnell, Gen. D. Moss, Capt. Z. Berry, Lafe Develin, Nathaniel Lord, Jr., Michael Shannon.

Inasmuch as neither the Breckinridge and Lane people nor the Bell and Everett supporters placed a State ticket in the field—being content with revealing their strength through electoral tickets—the contest in Indiana, up to the time of the October election, was squarely between the tickets headed, respectively, by Thomas A. Hendricks and Henry S. Lane.

REPUBLICAN STATE TICKET.

Governor—Henry S. Lane, Crawfordsville.

Lieutenant-Governor—Oliver P. Morton, Centerville.

Secretary of State—William A. Peelle, Winchester.

Auditor of State—Albert Lange, Terre Haute.

Treasurer of State—Jonathan Harvey, Clark county.

Attorney-General—James G. Jones, Evansville.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—Miles J. Fletcher, Putnam county.

Reporter of the Supreme Court—Benjamin Harrison, Indianapolis.

Clerk of the Supreme Court—John Paul Jones, Lagrange.

It will be remembered that Oliver P. Morton was his party's nominee for Governor in 1856. When the time came for nominating the ticket in 1860, it was a question of expediency as to whether he should be assigned to first or second place. The argument that finally prevailed was that, in view of the fact that Henry S. Lane had been chosen United States Senator by Fusion members of the General Assembly and denied admission by the Senate at Washington on the ground of irregularity, he should head the ticket. Attention was further directed to the fact that he was active in the Mexican war and that he enjoyed the sustained reputation of being among Indiana's most eloquent orators. Furthermore, a larger number of Whigs than Democrats had found their way into the newly organized Republican party, therefore the propriety and advisability of honoring Lane with first place on the ticket. It seemed also to have been tacitly understood, if not positively agreed, that in the event of the Republicans securing a majority in the Legislature, Mr. Lane was to be chosen United States Senator, to succeed Graham N. Fitch, and that Oliver P. Morton would then be afforded opportunity to serve almost the entire term as Governor. The fulfillment of this agreement, implied or real, was rendered possible by the result of the election, carrying with it, for the first time, the election of the entire Republican State ticket and a clear majority of the Legislature.

In the election of members of Congress the Republicans were successful in seven of the eleven districts. The Democrats elected John Law in the First district, James A. Cravens in the Second, William S. Holman in the Fourth and Daniel W. Voorhees in the Seventh. The Republicans clothed with congressional prerogatives William M. Dunn in the Third district, George W. Julian in the Fifth, Albert G. Porter in the Sixth, Albert S. White in the Eighth, Schuyler Colfax in the Ninth, William Mitchell in the Tenth and John Peter Cleaver Shanks in the Eleventh. In passing it may be stated that of the eleven gentlemen chosen as representatives in Congress from Indiana in the year 1860, William Mitchell, a banker residing at Kendallville, was alone in being made a single term. He was defeated for reelection in 1862 by Joseph K. Edgerton of Fort Wayne.

INDIANA'S VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.

There is a marked difference in the vote cast at the October election for Governor and other State officers and the vote cast at the November election for presidential electors. Lincoln had two thousand more than Lane, while Douglas fell twelve thousand behind Hendricks' vote. This would seem to make clear that the 12,295 Democrats who voted for Breckinridge had generously cast their ballots for Mr. Hendricks. How the Bell and Everett supporters distributed their favors at the October election the good Lord only knows. This is the vote for Presidential electors:

|----------------------------|---------|
| Lincoln and Hamlin..... | 139,033 |
| Douglas and Johnson..... | 115,509 |
| Breckinridge and Lane..... | 12,295 |
| Bell and Everett..... | 5,306 |

The Presidential electors chosen by the Republicans and who cast the vote of Indiana for Lincoln and H. Hamlin were:

At Large—William Cumback of Decatur and John L. Mansfield of Jefferson.

1. Cyrus M. Allen, Knox county.
2. John W. Ray, Knox.
3. Morton C. Hunter, Monroe.
4. John H. Farquar, Franklin.

5. Nelson Trusler, Fayette.
6. Reuben A. Riley, Hancock.
7. John Hanna, Putnam.
8. Samuel A. Huff, Tippecanoe.
9. James N. Tyner, Miami.
10. Isaac Jenkinson, Allen.
11. David O. Dailey, Huntington.

The Breckinridge organization for Indiana consisted of an electoral ticket and a State Central Committee. The nominees for electors were:

At Large—James Morrison, Marion, and Delano R. Eckles.

1. R. A. Clements, Daviess county.
2. Dr. W. F. Sherrod, Orange.
3. Daniel Sheeks, Monroe.
4. Ethelbert Hibben, Rush.
5. Samuel Orr, Delaware.
6. Franklin Hardin, Johnson.
7. James A. Scott, Putnam.
8. Col. W. M. Jenners, Tippecanoe.
9. James Bradley, Laporte.
10. Robert Breckinridge, Jr., Allen.
11. John R. Coffroth, Huntington.

Under the caption, "The Result," the Indianapolis Sentinel of November 7 commented thus apprehensively on the outcome of the Presidential election:

"The telegraphic returns of the election yesterday indicate that Lincoln has been chosen President by the vote of the people. It is probable he will have the entire electoral vote of all the Northern States. This is the first time in the history of the country that a President has been elected by a sectional and geographical party. Its effect will be to array one section of the Union in antagonism to the other. The issue has come which the leading men of the South have declared will be sufficient and justifiable cause for disunion. A few weeks will determine whether we shall be divided into separate confederacies or remain united States. Perhaps it is as well to try the strength of the Union, of the national Government, now as any other time. If it survives this struggle there will be but little danger of disruption in the future."

When the Secessionists left the convention hall at Charleston, and later on at Baltimore, and decided to nominate a ticket of their own, they knew full well what they were about and what the effect of their action would be. They knew that by dividing the Democratic party the triumph of the Republicans would be assured. Their hostility to Stephen A. Douglas was as flimsy as it was malignant. They used their groundless animosity to Douglas as a pretext for disrupting the Democratic party, and later on used the product of their own connivance, the election of Lincoln, as a pretext for disrupting the Union. In their madness to perpetuate slavery they worked the destruction of that institution. It is ever thus: When greed dethrones reason, it inflicts upon itself the greatest of all penalties—annihilation.

DEATH OF GOVERNOR WILLARD.

There was substantial agreement among capable judges of forensic eloquence that Governor Ashbel P. Willard was the most accomplished, most effective and most persuasive orator in the State. As Governor of the commonwealth he proved himself an administrator of discernment and marked ability. He was an intense partisan, yet fair-minded and just in the performance of duty. Though in the main considered a supporter of the Buchanan administration, he refused absolutely to become a party to waging war upon the organization when it chose Stephen A. Douglas as the national leader. He counseled moderation and conciliation. His health had been impaired; vitality was slowly but surely ebbing away. In the hope of prolonging his tenure on earth he went to Minnesota. But the trip had been delayed too long to produce the hoped-for result. Disease was gnawing at his vitals and refused to release its hold at the bidding of the bracing air of the Northwest. On the 4th of October, 1860, he was suddenly taken worse, and on the evening of that day he breathed his last. Then and there passed from the face of the earth one of the brightest intellects of that period. Under the constitution of the State, Abram A. Hammond became acting Governor, serving as such until relieved in January, 1861, by Henry S. Lane, who a few days later was succeeded by Oliver P. Morton.

AN INDISSOLUBLE UNION OF INDESTRUCTIBLE STATES

CHERISHED AND INVIOLEABLE HISTORIC DEMOCRATIC DOCTRINE

WHATEVER personal views may have been entertained by men affiliated with the Democratic party during the tumultuous agitation of the slavery question, there can be no question as to the historic attitude of the party with reference to the indestructibility of the American Union. In other words, the right of a State to nullify the laws of the United States or to secede from the Union has ever been stoutly denied by the illustrious statesmen who have been recognized and venerated as expounders of Democratic principles. Within this category come such men as Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, Van Buren, Tilden, Douglas and Cass.

Unreserved approval was accorded at the beginning of the struggle for the maintenance of the Federal Union to this declaration, formulated by Senator Andrew Johnson of Tennessee and formally adopted by the Senate of the United States on the 24th day of July, 1861:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable Civil War has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States now in revolt against the Constitutional Government and in arms around the Capitol; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not prosecuted on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of antagonizing or interfering with the rights of established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality and rights of the States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

If any one man may have been considered authorized to speak for his party at that critical period in our country's history, that man was Stephen A. Douglas, the chosen leader and gallant standard-bearer in the memorable campaign of 1860. When it had become apparent that war between North and South was inevitable, Senator Douglas left Washington to deliver a series of public addresses on his way to Chicago. Accompanied by his charming wife, he spoke in several of the more important cities along his route, including Indianapolis. Reaching his home city, Chicago, for the upbuilding of which he had done so much, he was met at the depot by an immense assemblage of citizens of all parties, who insisted on escorting him in procession to the great Wigwam which had already been packed by an audience of fully ten thousand eager hearers. It was there on a beautiful May day (the first) where the "Little Giant" delivered his last speech, for soon after its delivery he was attacked with an acute disease from which he died on the morning of June 4, 1861, shortly after the completion of his forty-eighth year. His last words were: "Tell Stevie and Robbie (his sons) to obey the laws and support the Constitution of the United States."

DOUGLAS' LAST WORDS FOR THE UNION.

"Mr. Chairman—I thank you for the kind terms in which you have been pleased to welcome me. I thank the committee and citizens of Chicago for this grand and imposing reception. I beg you to believe that I will not do you nor myself the injustice to believe this magnificent ovation is personal homage to myself. I rejoice to know that it expresses your devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the flag of our country. (Cheers.)

"I will not conceal gratification at the uncontrovertible test this vast audience presents—that what political differences or party questions may have divided us, yet you all had a conviction that when the country should be in danger, my loyalty could be relied on. That the present danger is imminent, no man can conceal. If war must come—if the bayonet must be used to maintain the Constitution—I can say before God my conscience is clean. I have struggled long for a peaceful solution of the difficulty. I have not only tendered those States what was theirs of right, but I have gone to the very extreme of magnanimity.

"The return we receive is war, armies marched upon our capital, obstructions and dangers to our navigation, letters of marque to invite pirates to prey upon our commerce, a concerted movement to blot out the United States of America from the map of the globe. The question is, Are we to maintain the country of our fathers, or allow it to be stricken down by those who, when they can no longer govern, threaten to destroy?

"What cause, what excuse do disunionists give us for breaking up the best Government on which the sun of heaven ever shed its rays? They are dissatisfied with the result of a Presidential election. Did they never get beaten before? Are we to resort to the sword when we get defeated at the ballot-box? I understand it that the voice of the people expressed in the mode appointed by the Constitution must command the obedience of every citizen. They assume, on the election of a particular candidate, that their rights are not safe in the Union. What evidence do they present of this? I defy any man to show any act on which it is based. What act has been omitted to be done? I appeal to these assembled thousands that so far as the constitutional rights of the Southern States—I will say the constitutional rights of slaveholders—are concerned, nothing has been done, and nothing omitted, of which they can complain.

"There has never been a time from the day that Washington was inaugurated first President of these United States, when the rights of the Southern States stood firmer under the laws of the land than they do now; there never was a time when they had not as good a cause for disunion as they have today. What good cause have they now that has not existed under every administration?

"If they say the Territorial question—now, for the first time, there is no act of Congress prohibiting slavery anywhere. If it be the non-enforcement of the laws, the only complaints that I have heard have been of the too vigorous and faithful fulfilment of the Fugitive Slave Law. Then what reason have they?

"The slavery question is a mere excuse. The election of Lincoln is a mere pretext. The present secession movement is the result of an enormous conspiracy formed more than a year since, formed by leaders in the Southern Confederacy more than twelve months ago.

"They use the slavery question as a means to aid the accomplishment of their ends. They desired the election of a Northern candidate, by a sectional vote, in order to show that the two sections cannot live together. When the history of the two years from the Lecompton charter down to the Presidential election shall be written, it will be shown that the scheme was deliberately made to break up this Union.

"They desired a Northern Republican to be elected by a purely Northern vote, and then assign this fact as a reason why the sections may not longer live together. If the disunion candidate in the late Presidential contest had carried the united South, their scheme was, the Northern candidate successful, to seize the Capitol last spring, and by a united South and divided North, hold it. That scheme was defeated in the defeat of the disunion candidate in several of the Southern States.

"But this is no time for a detail of causes. The conspiracy is now known. Armies have been raised, war is levied to accomplish it. There are only two sides to the question. Every man must be for the United States or against it. There can be no neutrals in this war; only patriots—or traitors.

"Thank God, Illinois is not divided on this question. (Cheers.) I know they expected to present a united South against a divided North. They hoped, in the Northern States, party questions would bring civil war between Democrats and Republicans, when the South would step in with her cohorts, aid one party to conquer the other, and then make easy prey of the victors. Their scheme was carnage and civil war in the North.

"There is but one way to defeat this. In Illinois it is being so defeated by closing up the ranks. War will thus be prevented on our own soil. While there was a hope of peace, I was ready for any reasonable sacrifice or compromise to maintain it. But when the question comes of war in the cotton fields of the South or the corn fields of Illinois, I say the farther off the better.

"We cannot close our eyes to the sad and solemn fact that war does exist. The Government must be maintained, its enemies overthrown, and the more stupendous our preparations the less the bloodshed, and the shorter the struggle. But we must remember certain restraints on our actions even in time of war. We are a Christian people, and the war must be prosecuted in a manner recognized by Christian nations.

"We must not invade Constitutional rights. The innocent must not suffer, nor women and children be the victims. Savages must not be let loose. But while I sanction no war on the rights of others, I will implore my countrymen not to lay down their arms until our own rights are recognized. (Cheers.)

"The Constitution and its guarantees are our birthright, and I am ready to enforce that inalienable right to the last extent. We cannot recognize secession. Recognize it once and you have not only dissolved government, but you have destroyed social order, upturned the foundations of society. You have inaugurated anarchy in its worst form, and will shortly experience all the horrors of the French Revolution.

"Then we have a solemn duty—to maintain the Government. The greater our unanimity the speedier the day of peace. We have prejudices to overcome from the few short months since of a fierce party contest. Yet these must be allayed. Let us lay aside all criminations and recriminations as to the origin of these difficulties. When we shall have again a country with the United States flag floating over it, and respected on every inch of American soil, it will then be time enough to ask who and what brought all this upon us.

"I have said more than I intended to say. (Cries of 'Go on.')

It is a sad task to discuss questions so fearful as civil war; but sad as it is, bloody and disastrous as I expect it will be, I express it as my conviction before God that it is the duty of every American citizen to rally round the flag of his country.

"I thank you again for this magnificent demonstration. By it you show you have laid aside party strife. Illinois has a proud position—united, firm, determined never to permit the Government to be destroyed." (Prolonged cheering.)

DEMOCRATS CARRY THE STATE IN 1862.

EARLY IN THE YEAR THE OUTLOOK WAS FAR FROM ENCOURAGING.

When the Democrats met in State Convention at Indianapolis, January 8, there were but few among the most sagacious delegates who believed it to be possible to carry the State at the October election. Two days were devoted to transacting the business for which the convention had been called. The first day's session was chiefly devoted to the discussion of a motion offered by ex-Congressman Wm. H. English that an adjournment be taken until July 4, which motion was warmly seconded by Cyrus L. Dunham. The proposition was vigorously opposed and was voted down. This was followed by a wrangle over the election of a permanent chairman. Joseph W. Chapman had been chosen temporary chairman. Grafton F. Cookerly of Terre Haute proposed Thomas A. Hendricks for the permanent chairmanship. Congressman John G. Davis of Parke and Robert D. Walpole of Indianapolis were also put in nomination. Walpole's name was withdrawn, whereupon Joseph E. McDonald in a very tactful speech moved that Mr. Hendricks be chosen by acclamation to preside over the convention. This motion prevailed. Upon taking the chair Mr. Hendricks delivered an unusually lengthy address. Among other points made by him were these:

"The civil war is upon us. For its existence the Democratic party is not responsible. For many years we have admonished those who favored a sectional party of its danger—in the sentiment of Washington's farewell address that the greatest danger to our country was the formation of geographical parties—we have advocated those doctrines which we believed fair and equal to all sections; a change could have been adopted without wounding the pride or stimulating the arrogance of either.' Our appeals were disregarded. Sectional pride, prejudice and hatred in one section produced the same sentiments in the other, and of this sectional strife was begotten our present troubles. The war is upon us—'wickedly provoked on the one side, and in folly and sin and without sufficient cause commenced on the other.' With secession upon the one hand and sectional interference with Southern rights upon the other, we hold no sympathy. Our most earnest desire is for the restoration of the Union upon the basis of the Constitution, and for myself I will give an honest support to all Constitutional and proper measures adopted by the administration to that end; and I will as earnestly oppose all acts in violation of the Constitution and in suppression of liberty because of my veneration for that solemn compact of our fathers, and because such policy renders the Union impossible; by obliterating the Union sentiment of the South and giving aid and comfort to its enemies."

At the conclusion of Mr. Hendricks' address Joseph J. Bingham was made permanent secretary, with R. S. Hastings of Lafayette as assistant.

Mr. Cookerly moved that each Congressional district name a vice-president of the convention. Judge Pettit opposed this motion, saying that there was no necessity for naming vice-presidents. Mr. Cookerly replied that the custom of thus selecting vice-presidents had prevailed for years, and he knew of no good reason why this time-honored practice should not be continued. The convention, however, coincided in the view of Judge Pettit and defeated the motion for the selection of vice-presidents.

3. M. W. Shields, Jackson.
4. George Hibben, Rush.
5. Edmund Johnson, Henry.
6. J. J. Bingham, George McQuat, Marion.

THE PLATFORM.

Seventeen planks were put into the platform, as agreed upon by the committee on resolutions. The platform in its entirety was objectionable to a goodly number of Democrats, chief among whom were Gov. Joseph A. Wright, Wm. H. English, Cyrus L. Dunham, James Hughes, Henry Seebirt, Judge David S. Gooding, Col. W. A. Bickle, Judge A. C. Downey, Gen. Ebenezer Dumont, Gen. Lew Wallace, Col. John T. Wilder, Charles W. Cathcart, Robert Dale Owen, Gen. Alvin P. Hovey, James M. Gregg, Col. Norman Eddy, Andrew Jackson and J. B. Fulwiler. The main points of the platform are set forth in the planks herewith reproduced:

"That we are unalterably attached to the Constitution, by which the Union of these States was formed and established, and that a faithful observance of its principles can alone continue the existence of the Union, and the permanent happiness of the people.

"That the present civil war has mainly resulted from the long continued, unwise and fanatical agitation in the North of the question of domestic slavery, the consequent organization of a geographical party, guided by the sectional platforms adopted at Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Chicago, and the development thereby of sectional hate and jealousy, producing (as has long been foreseen and predicted by us) its counterpart in the South of secession, disunion and armed resistance to the General Government, and terminating in a bloody strife between those who should have been forever bound together by fraternal bonds, thus bringing upon the whole country a calamity which we are now to meet as loyal citizens, striving for the adoption of that mode of settlement best calculated to again restore union and harmony.

"That in rejecting all propositions likely to result in a satisfactory adjustment of the matters in dispute between the North and the South, and especially those measures which would have secured the border slave States to the Union, and a hearty co-operation on their part in all constitutional and legal measures to procure a return of the more Southern States to their allegiance, the Republican party assumed a fearful responsibility and acted in total disregard of the best interests of the whole country.

"That if the party in power had shown the same desire to settle, by amicable adjustment, our internal dissensions before hostilities had actually commenced, that the administration has recently exhibited to avoid war with our ancient enemy, Great Britain, we confidently believe that peace and harmony would now reign throughout all our borders.

"That the maintenance of the Union upon the principles of the Federal Constitution should be the controlling object of all who profess loyalty to the Government, and in our judgment this purpose can only be accomplished by the ascendancy of a Union party in the Southern States, which shall, by a counter revolution, displace those who control and direct the present rebellion. That no effort to create or sustain such a party can be successful which is not based upon a definite settlement of the question at issue between the two sections; and we therefore demand that some such settlement be made by additional constitutional guarantee, either initiated by act of Congress or through the medium of a National convention.

"That the Republican party has fully demonstrated its inability to conduct the Government through its present difficulties.

"That we are utterly opposed to the twin heresies, Northern sectionalism and Southern secession, as inimical to the Constitution; and that freemen, as they value the boon of civil liberty and the peace of the country, should frown indignantly upon them.

"That in this national emergency the Democracy of Indiana, banishing all feeling of passion and resentment, will recollect only their duty to the whole country; that this war should not be waged in the spirit of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or institutions of the States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

"That we will sustain, with all our energies, a war for the maintenance of the Constitution, and of the integrity of the Union under the Constitution; but we are opposed to a war for the emancipation of the negroes or the subjugation of the Southern States.

"That the purposes avowed and advocated by the Northern disunionists, to liberate and arm the negro slaves, is unconstitutional, insulting to loyal citizens, a disgrace to the age, is calculated to retard the suppression of the rebellion and meets our unqualified condemnation.

"That the disclosures made by the investigating committee in Congress of the enormous frauds that have stalked into the army and navy departments, implicating the heads of those departments in a connivance at, if not an actual participation in, a system of corruption, and in which our brave soldiers have been defrauded of their proper supplies, and our Government threatened with bankruptcy, demands a thorough investigation into all our expenditures, both State and National, and that a speedy and marked example be made of all such 'birds of prey,' who, taking advantage of the necessities of our country, have fed and fattened upon public plunder.

"That the meritorious conduct of the Indiana troops, in every battlefield where the victory has perched upon the national banner, has filled the people of this State with the highest gratitude to her gallant sons, and that we send our best wishes to officers and men, dispersed throughout the country, and the heartfelt greetings of every Democrat for their further brilliant achievements in the coming contests for the maintenance of the Constitution and the Union."

THE TICKET AGREED UPON.

There was considerable doubt about Oscar B. Hord's willingness to again make the race for Attorney-General. But he graciously yielded to the pressure brought upon him to accept. The ticket finally agreed upon consisted of these widely-known gentlemen: Dr. J. S. Athon for Secretary of State, Joseph Ristine for Auditor, Matthew L. Brett for Treasurer, Oscar B. Hord for Attorney-General, Samuel L. Rugg for Superintendent of Public Instruction, and Michael C. Kerr for Reporter of the Supreme Court.

MASS CONVENTION IN JULY.

The dissatisfaction over some of the planks in the platform adopted at the January convention seems to have been sufficiently pronounced to have made it clear that the calling of another convention had become expedient, if not absolutely necessary. This was done. A mass convention was provided for. July 30 was the date fixed therefor. The Statehouse grove was chosen as the place for holding the meeting. Democrats came from all over the State, on foot, by trains, wagons and carriages. It was estimated that from forty to fifty thousand were present. Col. Thomas Dowling of Terre Haute called the convention to order and Thomas A. Hendricks was chosen President by acclamation. In part Mr. Hendricks said:

"We are surrounded by troubles. Our society is in an excited condition; and it is the duty of every man; it is the duty of every good citizen; it is the duty of every good patriot, to maintain the public peace; and, as the presiding officer of this meeting, I make my appeal to every man that he consider himself a committee to maintain good order on this occasion. Gentlemen, no man is a good Democrat unless he is a good citizen and a patriot. If that be true, every Democrat, from his heart, will endeavor to preserve the utmost good order on this occasion."

Joseph J. Bingham, editor of the Sentinel, was designated to serve as secretary.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

Chairman Hendricks was authorized to name as members of the committee on resolutions eleven representative Democrats, one from each Congressional district. This committee was composed of these distinguished representative Democrats: James D. Williams, John B. Winstanley, Samuel H. Buskirk, Major Anderigg, Lafe Develin, Judge S. E. Perkins, Judge Wm. M. Franklin, E. F. Lucas, P. M. Kent, Samuel W. Sprott and John R. Coffroth.

The committee's report appears to have met with general approval. It contained these declarations, which were enthusiastically adopted by unanimous vote:

"1. That we adhere to the time-honored principles of the Democratic party, and we believe that the only hope for the restoration of the Union and the maintenance of the Constitution is in the restoration of that truly conservative party in power.

"2. That this convention endorse as worthy of all confidence the persons nominated by the delegate convention which assembled at Indianapolis on the 8th of January, 1862, and that we recommend them to the people as honest, capable and faithful to the Constitution.

"3. That the Constitution, the American Union and the laws made under and by the authority of the Constitution must be preserved and maintained in their power and rightful supremacy—that the rebellion now in arms against them must be suppressed and put down, and that it is the duty of all good citizens to aid the General Government in all measures necessary and proper to that end.

"4. That the Democracy of Indiana with patriots everywhere have made and will continue to make every sacrifice to the end that the rebellion may be suppressed and the supremacy of the Constitution maintained and the Union under it preserved, but they are unalterably opposed to a war of conquest or subjugation, and they will never consent that the war on their part shall be waged for the purpose of interfering with the rights or overthrowing the established institutions of any of the States. In the language of Senator Douglas, uttered at Chicago a few days before his death, 'We must not invade constitutional rights. The innocent must not suffer nor women and children be victims. Savages must not be let loose.'

The speakers for this great outpouring of Indiana Democrats were C. A. Wickliffe of Kentucky, John S. Carlisle of Virginia, and Senator Wm. A. Richardson of Illinois, who was Stephen A. Douglas' trusted manager in the Charleston and Baltimore conventions and who, by reason of these intimate relations and his sterling worth and conceded ability, became the "Little Giant's" immediate successor in the Senate of the United States.

RINGING ADDRESS BY THE STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

The foregoing resolutions placed the party in much better position and in a far more favorable light than it had been up to that period. At the same time there was issued by authority of the State Central Committee an address so judiciously and patriotically worded as to have produced a marked change in public sentiment. The demonstration of July 30 and the spirited address promulgated by Chairman McQuat made it possible for the Democratic party of Indiana to appeal with confidence to the suffrages of the people. The way was thus paved for victory. The mistakes of January were corrected by the mighty voice of a patriotically aroused Democracy. This vigorously written document is well worth studious perusal, even though more than a half century has passed since it was first given publicity:

"To the People of Indiana on the Crisis of the Country:

"We address you in the midst of a crisis imminent with peril to the institutions of our beloved country. In doing so, we desire to discard all party feelings, and appeal only to the patriotic impulses of our countrymen. The Nation has had enough of party platforms and party measures to ruin and destroy even a stronger Government than this, founded, as we have been taught to believe it was, on the affections and consent of the people. Let us discard the platforms of party, and party itself, except so far as they are consistent with the preservation of the Union and the Constitution which makes us a Nation. If there be a sentiment in the creed of the Democratic organization, enunciated now or heretofore, which makes against the restoration of the UNION AS IT WAS, and the return of peace, we lay that sentiment and creed upon the altar of our beloved country and abandon it forever. There is no party platform, whether made at Baltimore or Chicago, 'which is a law with us,' and we deem no man, no Congress, no executive, a safe counselor who adheres to the single idea of a party in perilous times like these. We give all such consideration to the winds and regard them with abhorrence. They shall have no place in our affections, and no sympathy in our hearts. Acting upon these convictions, we repudiate for ourselves and the great mass of the people of Indiana all and every party feeling, prejudice or opinion which shall come in conflict with the putting down of this rebellion, the return of peace and the complete restoration of the American Union in all its purity and vigor.

"Sixty-six years ago, Washington, in his farewell address, gave to his countrymen this advice and solemn warning: 'In contemplating the causes which may distract our Union, it occurs, as a matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart-burnings which spring from these misrepresentations. They tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.'

"Need we say to the people of Indiana that the unwise disregard of this advice has been the immediate cause of the present deplorable civil war? The far-seeing wisdom of 'the Father of his Country' was never more vindicated than in that portion of his matchless address to his countrymen. He foresaw that the restless spirit of faction and the disturbing elements of sectional strife would be used to plant discord between the people of various States. Though that sainted patriot did not live to witness the wild fanaticism of his countrymen, his immediate successors in the Presidential chair were not so happy. The initiation of active agitation on the slavery question began as early as 1812, on the breaking out of the war with Great Britain, was continued or revived in 1819 on the admission of Missouri, and from that period, with slight intermissions, it has been more or less thrust before the country, in some shape, befitting the views of the factions which grasped at it for their advancement to power. We have seen its effects in its dark progress to its present perilous heights. We have no desire to trace the slimy track of this agitation, and are content to remind our fellow-citizens that prudent men have been always disposed to leave the question of slavery where the Constitution left it—in the hands and in the keeping of those States (old or new) which admitted it as a part of their domestic policy. We assert no right over it. Having rejected slavery for Indiana as a matter of choice, her people claim no power to force it in or out of her sister States, leaving them to be the judge of what befits their local condition. This has been the doctrine of the Democratic party—it was the doctrine of the Whig party. It was the declared principle of Clay, Cass, Webster, Jackson, and that host of wise and conservative statesmen which reflected dignity and honor upon the American name. To stand by the doctrines of Washington and his successors, we must be consistently Union men and avoid those snares of party and those devices of sectional agitation which render us 'alien to each other,' and thus destroy the government which makes us one people. We can use no better and more forcible language than that employed by the seventh President of the United States, when about leaving the cares of State, in a farewell address to his countrymen. It declares the whole duty of a true American citizen. General Andrew Jackson, in that address, in speaking of this slavery agitation and its effect upon the United States, declared:

But the Constitution cannot be maintained, nor the Union preserved, in opposition to public feeling, by the mere exertion of coercive powers confided to the general Government. The foundation must be laid in the affections of the people, in the security which it gives to life, liberty and property in every quarter of the country, and in the fraternal attachments which the citizens of the several States bear to one another as members of one political family, mutually contributing to promote the happiness of each other. Hence the citizens of each State should studiously avoid everything calculated to wound the sensibility or offend the just pride of the people of other States; and they should frown upon any proceedings within their own borders likely to disturb the tranquillity of their political brethren in other portions of the Union. In a country so extensive as the United States, and in pursuits so varied, the internal regulations of the several States must frequently differ from one another in important particulars; and this difference is unavoidably increased by the principles upon which the American Colonies were originally planted—principles which had taken deep root in their social relations before the Revolution, and therefore, of necessity, influencing their policy since they became free and independent States. But each State has the unquestionable right to regulate its own internal concerns according to its own pleasure; and while it does not interfere with the rights of the people of other States, or the rights of the Union, every State must be the sole judge of the measures proper to secure the safety of its citizens and promote their happiness: and in all efforts on the part of other people of other States to cast odium upon their institutions, and on all measures calculated to disturb their rights of property, or to put in jeopardy their peace and internal tranquillity, are in direct opposition to the spirit in which the Union was formed, and must endanger its safety. Motives of philanthropy may be assigned for this unwarrantable interference, and weak men may persuade themselves for a moment that they are laboring in the cause of humanity and asserting the rights of the human race; but every one, upon sober reflection, will see that nothing but mischief can come from these improper assaults upon the feelings and rights of others. Rest assured that men found busy in this work of discord are not worthy of your confidence and deserve your strongest reprobation.

"This was the language of a man who loved his country as he did his own life, and who periled that life for the glory and safety of his native land. They were spoken while he filled the most exalted office in the gift of his countrymen, and just before the term for which he had been elected expired. These words come to us as from the grave. Their author reposes, or all that was mortal of him, at the Hermitage, in Tennessee, and if the spirits of the gallant dead are permitted to look down upon the affairs of earth, he is today contemplating the ruin and desolation which the enemies of our institutions have brought upon his beloved country. We adopt his language and re-echo his warning to those who love the Union and would save it for their children. We declare before heaven and in the hearing of men that our matchless Constitution and our beloved Union (in spite of Secessionists, Abolitionists and other powers of evil) must and shall be preserved." GEO. McQUAT, Chairman.

SWEPT THE STATE.

As the foregoing document was being read and studied, chances to carry the State constantly improved. When the result of the October election became known it was found that the Democrats had elected their entire State ticket by more than 9,000 majority, had carried seven of the eleven Congressional districts, and secured the election of a Democratic Legislature which the following January chose Thomas A. Hendricks United States Senator for the long (six year) term and David Turpie for the short term, the latter expiring March 3, 1863. Both selections were made with the hearty approval of the Indiana Democracy.

Indiana was by no means the only State in which was experienced a political upheaval. Popular discontent over the slow progress made in subduing the rebellion had become so pronounced that an outlet had to be found. Somehow the impression had forced itself upon the public mind that a political upheaval in favor of the Democrats would be interpreted as a declaration in favor of a more vigorous prosecution of the war. In fact, this argument was freely advanced in nearly every State where campaigns were being vigorously conducted. I heard a Republican Congressman of Pennsylvania, John C. Kunkel, of the Harrisburg district, say that the Republican party had been in power so short a time and had so little experience in Governmental control that he believed it to be good policy to turn the management of affairs over to the Democratic party with its many years of experience in governing. Whatever may have influenced the public mind, the election of 1862 resulted in a sweeping Democratic victory. New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and even Iowa rolled up majorities for the Democratic tickets. In the election of members of Congress the Democrats nearly doubled their strength. By the adoption of a conflicting policy the following year, when C. L. Vallandigham of Ohio became a martyr to his extreme anti-war pronouncements, and extremists in other parts of the country did their utmost to imitate him, the gains made in 1862 were effectively neutralized and rendered nugatory. And the experience of 1863 had quite a bearing on the Presidential election in 1864.

RESULT IN INDIANA.

The aggregate Unconditional Union vote in 1862 was 18,342 less than the Republican vote of 1860, while the Union Democratic vote was increased by 1,163.

By way of explanation it may be stated that the Republicans in this campaign labeled their ticket "Unconditional Union Ticket," while the Democrats placed their nominees under the heading "Democratic Union Ticket."

GOVERNOR WRIGHT'S APPOINTMENT AS UNITED STATES SENATOR TO SUCCEED JESSE D. BRIGHT.

February 5, 1862, the United States Senate voted to expel Jesse D. Bright from his seat as Senator from Indiana. The ground upon which this drastic action was taken was that Senator Bright had written a letter to Jeff Davis recommending a man named Lincoln to favorable consideration in furnishing arms for use in the Confederate army. Governor Morton appointed Gov. Joseph A. Wright to fill the vacancy until the Legislature could make an election for the remainder of Bright's term. Wright took his seat March 3, 1862. The selection of Wright was partly construed as a non-political act and partly as a compliment to the war Democrats, of whom there were many. The Sentinel, on the other hand, treated it from a different standpoint. At first that paper seemed disinclined to speak in harsh or uncomplimentary terms of the appointment, but after Governor Wright had savagely denounced the 8th of January platform and contemptuously spat upon that document, the Sentinel changed its attitude and poured hot shot into Governor Morton's appointee. Singular as it may appear, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat also seemed to be displeased over Wright's appointment. Soon after taking his seat in the Senate, March 3, Wright delivered a speech on the question of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. The Globe-Democrat, a radical Republican oracle, was greatly displeased over Senator Wright's speech, pronouncing it an intensely pro-slavery deliverance. As a sort of justification for its conservatism these remarks by Senator John Sherman were reproduced in an Indiana paper:

"In the State where I live (Ohio) we do not like negroes. We do not disguise our dislike. As my friend from Indiana (Mr. Wright) said yesterday, the whole people of the Northwestern States are, for reasons whether correct or not, opposed to having any negroes among them; and that principle or prejudice has been engrafted in the legislation of nearly all the Northwestern States."

This doubtless was the dominant sentiment of that period. The "colored brother" was for years in bad odor in the Hoosier commonwealth.

McDONALD PITTED AGAINST MORTON

IN THE EXCITING RACE FOR THE GOVERNORSHIP IN 1864

THE election of a Democratic Legislature in 1862 caused Gov. Oliver P. Morton a good deal of annoyance. Imperious by nature, bent on carrying into effect whatever plans he might have seen fit to map out, and considering himself a monarch of all he surveyed, it would have been miraculous if trouble with a politically adverse Legislature had been averted. The points in controversy during those exciting days having been adjusted in one way or another, and having no particular bearing on matters concerning or interesting the present generation, it would be neither edifying nor instructive to devote much space to a recital of the more or less exciting episodes of that period. All the participants therein have passed from life to eternity; so we can well afford to throw the broad mantle of charity over whatever may have been left behind as reminders of the wordy battles fought at Indianapolis and the State at large by Governor Morton and his followers on one side and his opponents on the other.

THE REPUBLICAN TICKET.

For Governor—Oliver P. Morton, Indianapolis.

For Lieutenant - Governor — Conrad Baker, Evansville.

For Reporter of the Supreme Court—Benjamin Harrison, Indianapolis.

For Judges of the Supreme Court—James S. Frazer, Warsaw; John T. Elliott, Henry County; Charles A. Ray, Indianapolis; Robert C. Gregory, Lafayette.

The question was raised as to whether Governor Morton was eligible to re-election under the Constitution, he having filled that office four years, less three days. It was held, but never judicially, that the Constitutional inhibition did not apply in his case, in view of the fact that he was elected in 1860 to the office of Lieutenant-Governor and became acting Governor upon the resignation of Governor Henry S. Lane three days after his induction into that office and such resignation following Lane's election to the United States Senate, to succeed Dr. Graham N. Fitch of Logansport.

THE DEMOCRATS PLACE JOSEPH E. McDONALD AT THE HEAD OF THEIR TICKET.

The Democratic State convention was held, as usual, at Indianapolis, but for obvious reasons not as early as had for years been the custom. July 12 was chosen as a more fitting time. State Chairman Geo. McQuat called the convention to order, and Judge David Turpie was selected as permanent chairman. A ringing speech was delivered as this man of extraordinary ability took charge of the gavel.

Joseph E. McDonald was nominated for Governor and David Turpie for Lieutenant-Governor. The five State officers triumphantly elected in 1862—Dr. James S. Athon, Secretary of State; Joseph Ristine, Auditor; Matthew L. Brett, Treasurer;

Oscar B. Hord, Attorney-General, and Samuel L. Rugg, Superintendent of Public Instruction—were honored with renominations without opposition. Ethelbert C. Hibben, of Rushville, was nominated for Clerk of the Supreme Court, and for Judges of the Supreme Court, Samuel E. Perkins of Indianapolis, Andrew Davidson of Greensburg, James M. Hanna of Sullivan, and James L. Worden of Fort Wayne, were chosen by practical unanimity.

THE PLATFORM.

The greater part of this document is devoted to the unsparing denunciation of Governor Morton for inducing members of the Legislature to lend themselves to questionable and unlawful acts; for establishing a "financial bureau" without authority of law; for countenancing the reckless expenditure of public moneys. The general administration comes in for censure for suspending the writ of habeas corpus, for suppressing newspapers, for arresting citizens without warrant, etc. Other arraignments are set forth in these terms:

"That the failure of the administration to promptly pay disabled or discharged soldiers, and pensions to the widows and children whose husbands and fathers have fallen in battle or died in camp or by the wayside, and the readiness with which the powers at Washington audit and pay shoddy contractors, officers and placemen of the Government, are cruel wrongs to the destitute and deserving, and merit the withering scorn of the American people.

"That the noble and patriotic sons of Indiana, who, for love of country and a restoration of the Union as established by our fathers, have sacrificed the endearments of home for the hardships and perils of war, merit the thanks of the people of Indiana; that we will ever hold in grateful recollection the memory of those who have fallen in battle, and that it is the duty, and should be the highest pleasure of the people to make ample provision for the support of those who have received disabilities in the service of the country, and the thousands of widows and tens of thousands of orphan children, whose husbands and fathers have sacrificed their lives in defense of their country and honor of the American flag.

"That a faithful adherence to the Constitution of the United States, to which the Democracy are pledged, necessarily implies the restoration of liberty and the rights of the States under that Constitution unimpaired, and will lead to an early and honorable peace.

"Resolved, That we, the Democracy of Indiana, in State convention assembled, are in favor of maintaining personal and constitutional liberty, and we pledge ourselves to sustain our rights as citizens to the bitter end."

THE CAMPAIGN.

Though the personal relations between Morton and McDonald were "reasonably friendly," both having been intellectual giants, a good deal of bitterness was injected into the joint discussions that were held in various parts of the State. The Knights of the Golden Circle came in for a large share of invective on the part of Governor Morton, who denounced that oath-bound organization in unmeasured terms as bands of traitors to their country and as having for their purpose the overthrow of Governmental institutions. The trials for treason of William A. Bowles, Andrew Humphreys, Horace Hefren, Lambdin P. Milligan and Stephen Horsey, elaborately and sensationally reported in the Indianapolis Journal during the campaign, were utilized for all they could be made to serve. Governor Morton was, however, somewhat hampered in the attempt to hold the Democracy responsible for the acts, aims and purposes of these leaders of the Knights of the Golden Circle and Sons of Liberty by the heroic action of the Hon. Michael C. Kerr of New Albany, in going to Indianapolis to lay bare to Governor Morton the plots of these conspirators. The fact that Mr. Kerr was the Democratic nominee for Congress in the New Albany district and that he had step by step risen to great prominence in the party of his choice, greatly handicapped Governor Morton in making such use of the machinations of these visionary marplots as he had hoped to be able to do during the progress of the campaign.

Though David Turpie was nominated for Lieutenant-Governor, he was induced to withdraw from the State ticket in order that he might comply with the wishes of the Democracy of his district to make another race for Congress against Schuyler Colfax. He was reluctant to do this, but finally yielded to the entreaties of the Democratic leaders of the South Bend district. His place on the State ticket was filled by the selection of that gallant warrior, General Mahlon D. Manson, of Crawfordsville.

Although it seemed for a time as if the Democracy might win in State and nation, developments toward the close of the campaign plainly foreshadowed the re-election of Lincoln to the Presidency and the triumph of Morton in Indiana. Only three of the eleven Democrats nominated for Congress in this State were successful at the polls, and of these three Daniel W. Voorhees was subsequently unseated on contest. Niblack and Kerr had to their credit such decisive majorities as to render them incontestably secure. The Legislature chosen was also strongly Republican and very much to Morton's personal and political liking. Morton was credited with a majority of 20,883 over McDonald, while Conrad Baker led General Manson by 16,139. The vote stood:

| Oliver P. Morton..... | 152,084 |
| Joseph E. McDonald..... | 131,201 |
| Conrad Baker | 147,795 |
| Mahlon D. Manson..... | 131,656 |

At the Presidential election in November Abraham Lincoln polled 150,422 votes and General Geo. B. McClellan 130,233.

POLITICAL SECRET ORDERS NOT FAVORED BY REAL DEMOCRATS.

As already stated, during the Gubernatorial campaign of 1864 between Oliver P. Morton and Joseph E. McDonald, a good deal was said about the "Sons of Liberty," "Knights of the Golden Circle" and kindred organizations formed and fostered by individuals who seemingly had forgotten that "Old Hickory," idolized by all Democrats, proclaimed an indissoluble union of indestructible States to be an inviolable tenet of American Democracy.

Andrew Jackson, Southerner that he was, never countenanced treason or rebellion. When South Carolina threatened nullification of tariff laws that were deemed inimical to the interests of its people, "Old Hickory" bluntly told them that any man or set of men who might attempt to nullify the laws of the land would be hung as high as Haman. "By the Eternal, the Union must and shall be preserved!" he thundered at the would-be nullifiers. General John A. Dix, as Secretary of the Treasury under Buchanan, electrified the nation early in 1861 by sending broadcast the dictum, "If any man attempts to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot." The utterances of Stephen A. Douglas were the real expression of Democratic sentiment. And these utterances could not be neutralized by the mutterings of any self-styled "knights" whose foolish performances were carried on in caves and caverns.

Quite an effort was made during the war to identify Democrats with these oath-bound treasonable organizations. The exact truth about the matter is that Democrats were vexed a good deal more over these visionary organizations than were Republicans. The latter utilized them for political purposes, while Democrats exerted themselves to point out to misguided and wrong-headed individuals affiliating therewith the folly of their course. The recital of an occurrence in the southern part of the State, as narrated by William Wesley Woollen, will make clear to the unbiased the folly of attempting to foist upon the Democratic party as such responsibility for the existence of the secret organizations under consideration:

"Mr. Kerr was a patriot. In 1864 he was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Congress, the late Colonel Cyrus L. Dunham being his principal competitor. The nominating convention met at Jeffersonville, in the old Methodist church, on Wall street. Politics was at fever heat, and the contest between Mr. Kerr and Colonel Dunham was very close. An hour or so before the convention was to meet Mr. Kerr called a caucus of his friends in a room over the store of General Sparks. There were present at the caucus several of Mr. Kerr's friends from New Albany; General Sparks and Mr. J. P. Applegate, from Clark county; Hon. William H. English, then a resident of Scott county; General James A. Cravens, of Washington county, and a few other gentlemen from different parts of the district. The gentlemen thus called together supposed the purpose of the meeting was to make arrangements for the management of the convention. When all were seated, Mr. Kerr arose, drew himself up to his full height of six feet or more, and, with suppressed excitement but with perfect self-control, said he must withdraw from the race for Congress; that he was in possession of the knowledge that a conspiracy existed against the government of the State; that the conspirators were Democrats; that he felt it his duty to go to Indianapolis and lay the facts before Governor Morton; that such a course would embitter certain Democrats and jeopardize his election should he be a candidate. Mr. English and others made remarks after Mr. Kerr had taken his seat, the purport of which was that he was right in his purpose to make known and denounce the conspiracy, but wrong in determining to withdraw from the contest; that only a few hot-heads had gone wrong; that the great body of the party was loyal to the Government. Mr. Kerr persisted in his purpose to decline, and it was formally announced that he was no longer a candidate. Afterward, however, several gentlemen were sent to him by the various county delegations, who urged him to stand. He finally consented to do so, and was nominated. He came at once to Indianapolis to expose the conspiracy, and what he did can be best told by giving the testimony of one of the witnesses in the trials of Bowles, Milligan and others. Says this witness:

As I walked down Washington street I saw a gentleman coming up rapidly, and I stopped him. "Hello, Kerr; what has brought you here?" said I. He seemed very much excited. "Do you know anything?" he said; and I said, "Do you know anything?" "Yes," he replied. "What is it?" said I. He then said, "The devil's to pay in our section of the State; the people of Washington, Harrison and Floyd counties and that neighborhood have got the idea that a revolution was impending; the farmers were frightened and were selling their hay in the fields and their wheat in the stacks, and all the property that could be was being converted into greenbacks."

Mr. Kerr was so deeply impressed with the danger of the situation that he and the witness from whom I have quoted went to the residence of Hon. Joseph E. McDonald in the night, awakened that gentleman and told him what they knew about the conspiracy. It was agreed that a meeting of prominent Democrats should be called next morning at Mr. McDonald's office to consider the situation. The meeting was held, and during its sitting Mr. Kerr made a speech. I again quote from this witness:

He spoke about this excitement, this revolutionary scheme, and said that he came up on purpose to put a stop to the thing. I think he said it was our duty to stop it, and if it could not be stopped in any other way it was our duty to inform the authorities.

"Mr. Kerr was sustained in his position by Mr. McDonald and other prominent Democrats, but there is no gainsaying the fact that he was the leading man of his party in the effort to destroy the conspiracy, which, had it been inaugurated, would have deluged Indiana with blood.

"The action of Mr. Kerr in proposing to decline the race for Congress in his district was in keeping with his character. Young, and ambitious for political preferment, he was yet willing to stand aside for others when he believed duty called him to make the sacrifice."

GOVERNOR MORTON'S RICHMOND SPEECH

IN FAVOR OF ANDREW JOHNSON'S RECONSTRUCTION POLICY AND AGAINST NEGRO SUFFRAGE

HAT Oliver P. Morton was a man of extraordinary intellectual power will not be seriously questioned by any one at all familiar with his career as political leader, Governor or United States Senator. As a platform speaker he was neither ornate nor eloquent. He disdained indulgence in flowery rhetoric. His preference ran decidedly to "sledge-hammer" argument. With all the vigor of his masterful mind he marshaled his facts and drove his points into the understanding of his hearers. It may be assumed that he was subject to mental anguish if he suspected that he did not make himself clearly understood or failed to carry conviction to his audience. Intense earnestness marked all of his more important utterances on questions of great moment.

The reconstruction of the Southern States lately in rebellion engaged popular attention to an eminent degree. It became the "paramount issue," soon following the suppression of the rebellion. The assassination of Abraham Lincoln by John Wilkes Booth imposed the duties and responsibilities of the presidential office on Andrew Johnson, whom Lincoln himself desired as his running mate in the campaign of 1864. Johnson was at the breaking out of the rebellion a United States Senator from Tennessee, elected by a Democratic legislature. He had always been a Democrat. His place of residence was in East Tennessee, where public sentiment was intensely loyal to the Union. Secession was hated and rebellion stoutly condemned and resisted. As the war progressed it was deemed wise to make Johnson military governor of Tennessee, in which capacity he could serve the Union cause far more effectively than in the Senate at Washington. It was Lincoln's opinion that the spirit of patriotism displayed by War Democrats throughout the country, but especially in the South, ought to be given deserved and substantial recognition. There was much in Andrew Johnson's career that commended itself to Lincoln's favor. Like himself, Johnson was of humble origin. Dependent upon his own resources in his boyhood days, no educational advantages were within his reach. Instead of being made the beneficiary of schooling he served an apprenticeship in a tailor shop. A charming Tennessee girl attracted his attention and challenged his admiration. In course of time this ambitious young man and this buoyant maiden were united in marriage. She chanced to be an apt teacher, he an apt pupil. She taught him to read and write. With the acquisition of this educational facility came an intense longing for reading books and acquiring knowledge. Young Johnson made rapid progress. A fine specimen of manhood, he soon ingratiated himself in popular favor, was elected to various offices, became Governor of his State, and toward the expiration of his term was chosen United States Senator. In the latter capacity he made an enviable record in championing the homestead policy for bona fide settlers in the territories and kindred measures in the interest of struggling humanity. To Andrew Johnson belongs the credit of having first urged in Congress the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. He was an intensely earnest, thoroughly honest and ruggedly patriotic Tennessean and American.

Mr. Lincoln was neither personally nor politically averse to Vice-President Hannibal Hamlin, his running mate in 1860, but, as already stated, he believed that his associate on the 1864 ticket ought to be a war Democrat. And he preferred Johnson to all others because he had formed the opinion that the nomination of a Southerner would have the effect of preventing the recognition of the Southern Confederacy by England and France—a danger then quite imminent.

For some time after Johnson's accession to the Presidency the belief was quite common that Lincoln's developed program for the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion would be carried out without encountering serious opposition. The fear that found most expression was that Johnson, by reason of personal animosity to Southern leaders who had grossly maligned and persecuted him before, during and after the rebellion, would be far more strenuous in imposing terms of punishment than Lincoln would have been had he lived. There was some ground for this belief, but circumstances shaped affairs differently. There was in the Republican camp an element that did not take kindly to Lincoln's conservative and conciliatory policy. The leader of this faction was Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania, a man of marked ability and of intense hating predilection. Amazingly unscrupulous, he hesitated at nothing after determining to accomplish a purpose. He came near plunging Pennsylvania into war during the thirties when he had autocratically resolved to retain Joseph Ritner in the gubernatorial chair after being defeated at the polls. The Stevens conspiracy was prevented by the appearance at the State Capitol in Harrisburg of a company of men from Philadelphia whose sternness of purpose admitted of no doubt as to what they would do to Thaddeus if he persisted in counting in the man who had been voted out at the election in October.

It may be stated that Stevens was very much opposed to the nomination of Andrew Johnson to the vice-presidency in 1864. To the last he persisted in insisting on the renomination of Hannibal Hamlin. He couldn't see either sense or propriety in taking up for the second highest office a man whose habitation was in a "d — d rebel province."

Stevens was a bachelor, club-footed, hard-faced, vindictive. When a Republican contested the seat of a Democrat in Congress Stevens did not pay the slightest attention to the evidence adduced in the case. He simply inquired of some one in interest, "What is the name of our rascal?" and at once voted to seat him in place of the man really elected. He was passionately fond of a game of poker, denied the existence of a God, and hooted at the idea of man being the creation of what was called "the Almighty." On the latter point he was wont to say that an engine could be taken apart; if any of the machinery within was worn out it could be replaced and the engine again made serviceable. Not so with man. "When his interior becomes impaired," Stevens used to say, "there is no repairing or replacing of worn-out parts. He is done for; he dies and is buried."

Stevens' plan of reconstruction was radically different from that of Lincoln. Punishment, not restoration, was his program. To accomplish his purpose, he availed himself of every opportunity to discredit the Johnson administration and cast odium upon it. With ghoulish glee grossly exaggerated and perverted stories about Johnson having been drunk when inaugurated as Vice-President were re-vamped. Conservative, conscientious Republicans were dismayed over these manifestations of bitterness and malignancy.

Governor Morton, himself originally a Democrat and still a believer in the firmly established doctrine of "an indissoluble Union of indestructible States," felt impelled to come to the support of President Johnson. He chose the principal town of the county (Wayne) in which he grew to manhood and prominence—the Quaker city of Richmond—as the place for delivering a carefully prepared speech in defense of President Johnson's reconstruction policy and in opposition to the monstrous proposition to make voters of the lately emancipated slaves of the South. So able was this speech in its presentation, so conclusive in argument, so clear and convincing, that Governor Morton never attempted to explain it away after he had changed front and championed the very opposite of what he contended for at Richmond on September 29, 1865.

The only copy of this speech now known to be in existence is on file in the State Library at Indianapolis. For obvious reasons scant reference is made to it in the biographies of Oliver P. Morton, and yet it may fairly be said to have been the ablest and most statesman-like speech ever made by this intellectual giant. What a pity that he did not join such Republican Senators as James R. Doolittle of Wisconsin, Lyman Trumbull of Illinois, Edgar Cowan of Pennsylvania, James Dixon of Connecticut, Daniel S. Norton of Minnesota, and others of that type in upholding the hands of Andrew Johnson in carrying out the humane program mapped out by Lincoln for the establishment of constitutional government in the South. Had he stood by the doctrines laid down in his Richmond speech, had he adhered firmly to the Lincoln-Johnson plan of unification and pacification, there is reason to believe that conservatism would have triumphed and radicalism would not have been permitted to do its demoralizing and destructive work. The pages of American history might thus have been kept clear and clean of recitals of the outrageously corrupt and disgraceful performances that for years characterized carpet-bag rule in Southern States. The stupendous folly of forcing into the Constitution of the United States the fifteenth amendment, conferring upon vast hordes of densely ignorant beings the right of suffrage, might not now fill with apprehension the minds of discerning students of government. The thought that in a number of States in the South public safety imperatively demands organized denial of the unrestricted exercise of this constitutional grant awakens suspicion that sanity must have been dangerously clouded and obscured when that vicious assault upon the purity and beneficence of the ballot was first conceived and finally perpetrated. As long as the present status of pacific submission is maintained, and sanctioned by overwhelming public sentiment North and South, the utter perniciousness of this license for the pollution of the ballot may not be revealed in all its hideousness; but when the situation changes and the subdued mass becomes aware of its latent power, a conflict of races may prove as irrepressible as was the conflict between slavery and freedom in the Fifties and early Sixties.

SPEECH OF GOV. MORTON AT RICHMOND, IND., SEPT. 29, 1865, ON RECONSTRUCTION AND NEGRO SUFFRAGE.

"So that Mr. Johnson has restricted from taking the oath eight classes permitted by Mr. Lincoln, and so far his plan is more stringent than Mr. Lincoln's was. Mr. Lincoln, in his plan of reconstruction, declared all persons should have the right to vote for the delegates to the conventions which might be called in the States to form State constitutions, who had taken the oath prescribed by him, and who were lawful voters according to the laws of the State in which they resided before the passage of the ordinance of secession. Mr. Johnson has made precisely the same condition. Mr. Lincoln then provided for the appointment of Provisional Governors, giving to them the power of calling State conventions, with a view of forming State constitutions, for the purpose of being received back into full practical relations with the Government. Mr. Lincoln did the same. Each required that the constitutions thus formed should be Republican in form. Mr. Lincoln put forth no requirement of condition that was not equally contained in Mr. Johnson's proclamation. Their plans of amnesty and reconstruction cannot be distinguished from each other, except in the particulars I have already mentioned, that Mr. Johnson restricts certain persons from taking the oath, unless they first have a special pardon from him, whom Mr. Lincoln permitted to come forward and take the oath without it; and in the further difference before mentioned, that Mr. Lincoln required one-tenth of the people of the State to show a willingness to take the oath, while Mr. Johnson has said nothing whatever about that. This was Mr. Lincoln's favorite policy. It was presented by him to Congress on the 8th of January, 1863, accompanied by a message. In the course of the next year, 1864, on several occasions, Mr. Lincoln distinctly presented, again and again, this policy of amnesty and reconstruction to the people of the South. It was his settled and favorite policy at the time he was renominated for election by the Union convention at Baltimore last summer, and in that convention the party sustained him and strongly endorsed his whole policy, of which this was a prominent part. Mr. Lincoln was triumphantly and overwhelmingly elected upon that policy, and soon after his election, in December, 1864, in his last annual message to Congress, he again brings forward this same policy of his and presents it to the Nation. And again, on the 12th of April, only two days before his death, he referred to and presented this policy of amnesty and reconstruction. That speech may be called his last speech, his dying words to the people, and I desire to refer to it. You remember the occasion. It was after Richmond had been evacuated. It was the day after they had received the news of Lee's surrender. Washington city was illuminated. A large crowd came in front of the White House and Mr. Lincoln spoke to them from one of the windows. He referred to the organization of Louisiana under his plan of amnesty and reconstruction, and, in speaking of it, he gave the history of his policy. He said:

In my annual message of December, 1863, and accompanying the proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction, as the phrase goes, which I promised, if adopted by any State, would be acceptable, and sustained by the Executive Government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was a plan which might possibly be acceptable, and also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States.

"I want to make one remark right here. It is said that, under Mr. Johnson's policy of reconstruction, the men who originated and carried on the rebellion can be returned to seats in Congress as Senators and Representatives. The gentlemen who talk that way forget that on the 2nd of July, 1862, Congress passed an act, which has never been repealed, and is now in full force and effect, prohibiting any person from holding any Federal office, high or low, great or small, who has directly or indirectly been concerned in this rebellion, and there is no danger of the rebel leaders going into Congress unless the members of that body shall prove recreant to their trust and fail to enforce a law now unrepealed upon the statute books. Mr. Lincoln referred to the act of Congress, and said distinctly that he claimed no power to influence the admission of members of Congress, and no power to bring forward a man who had been disfranchised and rendered ineligible by an act of Congress. Mr. Johnson has never for a moment claimed that he could do such a thing. The act of Congress was binding upon Mr. Lincoln, and it is no less binding upon Mr. Johnson, and it has not been proposed by the plan of either to interfere with the operation of a statute, or bring any man into Congress or into the possession of any Federal office who has been made ineligible by law. 'This plan,' says Mr. Lincoln, speaking of his plan of reconstruction—'This plan was, in advance, submitted to the Cabinet, and approved by every member of it. One of them suggested that I should then apply the Emancipation Proclamation thereto, except in parts of Virginia and Louisiana, and that I should drop the suggestion about apprenticeship, for freed people, and that I should omit the protest against my own power in regard to admission of members of Congress, but even then he approved every part and parcel of the plan, which has since been employed or touched by the action of Louisiana.'

"Here Mr. Lincoln, just before his death, gives the history of his plan of reconstruction. He says it was submitted to every member of his Cabinet—and who were the members of his Cabinet at that time? Chief Justice Chase, Edwin M. Stanton and Wm. H. Seward were among them, and surely the indorsement of such men as these must give additional weight to any measure. Mr. Lincoln goes on:

The new constitution of Louisiana, declaring emancipation for the whole State, practically applies the proclamation to that part previously exempted. It does not adopt apprenticeship for freed people, and is silent, as it could not well be otherwise, about the admission of members to Congress. As it applied to Louisiana, every member of Congress fully approved the plan of the message. I received many commendations of the plan, written and verbal, and not a single objection from any professed emancipationist, until after news was received at Washington that the people of Louisiana had begun to move in accordance with it, from about July, 1864.

“In conclusion, upon this subject he used the following language:

Such has been my only agency in the Louisiana movement. My promise is made, as I have previously stated, but as bad promises are better broken than kept, I shall treat this as a bad promise, and break it whenever I shall be convinced that keeping it is adverse to the public interest. But I have not yet been so convinced.

“Now, we find Mr. Lincoln, just before his death, referring in warm and strong terms to his policy of amnesty and reconstruction, and giving it his endorsement, giving to the world that which had never been given before—the history of that plan and policy, stating that it had been presented and endorsed by every member of that able and distinguished Cabinet of 1863. Mr. Lincoln may be said to have died holding out to the Nation his policy of amnesty and reconstruction. It was held out by him at the very time the rebels laid down their arms.

“Mr. Lincoln died by the hand of an assassin, and Mr. Johnson came into power. He took Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet as he had left it, and he took Mr. Lincoln's policy of amnesty and reconstruction as he had left it, and as he had presented it to the world only two days before his death. Mr. Johnson has honestly and faithfully attempted to administer that policy, which had been bequeathed by that man around whose grave a whole world has gathered as mourners.

“I refer to these facts for the purpose of showing that Mr. Johnson's policy is not a new one, but that he is simply carrying out the policy left to him by his lamented predecessor—a policy that had been endorsed by the whole nation in the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, and had been promulgated to the whole world nearly one year before the time of his last election.

“I want to remark one thing more upon that subject. I want to refer to the action of Congress in reference to the question of reconstruction. You will remember that some time in the month of April, Henry Winter Davis, a very distinguished Congressman from Maryland, introduced a bill called the Winter Davis Bill. It provided a plan for the reconstruction of the rebel States, to bring them back into practical relations with the Government. It differed from the plan of Mr. Lincoln's in some important respects, one of which was that, in electing delegates to the State convention that was to reorganize the State government, he allowed no man to vote who had been concerned in the rebellion in any way. I want to call your attention very briefly to that bill and show you how far Congress was committed by its own direct action to the main points in Mr. Johnson's policy of reconstruction. This bill, a copy of which I have here, provided for the appointment of Provisional Governors in these States, just as Mr. Lincoln's plan had done and Mr. Johnson's now does. It provided that these Provisional Governors might call State conventions for the purpose of forming State constitutions, and in this particular, also, it conformed to Mr. Lincoln's plan. It then went on to define the question of the right of suffrage for delegates to these conventions. It provided that the delegates shall be elected by the loyal white male citizens of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, and residents at the time in the county, parish or district in which they shall offer to vote.

“I call your attention to the fact that Congress itself, only a little over a year ago, when it assumed to take the whole question of reconstruction out of the hands of the President, expressly excluded the negro from the right of suffrage in voting for the men who were to frame the new constitutions for the rebel States. Not only that, but it went on to state what the constitutions should contain, and provided that if the constitutions to be formed by these conventions should conform to the provisions of this bill, then those States should be entitled to come back at once. What were these conditions? They only required that the constitution should contain three things: first, it shall contain a provision to the effect that no person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, except offices merely ministerial, and military offices below the grade of colonel, State or Confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for, or be a member of, the Legislature, or Governor. In other words, the bill required that these conventions should exclude from the right of suffrage in the South all persons who had been in the rebel army above the rank of colonel, thereby conceding very plainly that they might give the right of suffrage to all persons below that rank. The bill provides, secondly, that involuntary servitude must be forever prohibited and the freedom of all persons guaranteed in such States; and that no debt or obligation created by or under the sanction of the usurping power shall be recognized or paid by the State.

"These were all the conditions that were imposed upon the constitutions to be framed under the Henry Winter Davis bill. It simply required, if you please, that the constitution of South Carolina should not give the right of suffrage to any man who had held office in the rebel army above the rank of colonel; and that involuntary servitude should be abolished, and that they should not assume any Confederate debt; but it did not require that any provision be made to confer the right of suffrage upon the negro at any time. It did not require that they should make provision for the education of the negro, or for giving him the right of testifying in courts of justice, or for preserving, in any particular way, what may be called his civil rights. Mr. Lincoln, as you remember, refused to sign that bill. He put it in his pocket. Though it had received a majority in both Houses, being passed in the House by a vote of 74 to 66, and by a much larger vote in the Senate, it failed to become a law. Some of you may, perhaps, remember the angry manifesto put forth in consequence of Mr. Lincoln's course in that matter by Mr. Davis and Mr. Wade, and you will not forget that the result was to create strife and division in the ranks of the Union party.

"If Mr. Lincoln had not refused to sign that bill there would today be an act of Congress on the statute books absolutely prohibiting negroes from any participation in the work of reorganization and pledging the Government in advance to accept of the constitutions that might be formed under the bill, although they made no provision for the negro beyond the fact of his personal liberty. If that bill had become a law, and the rebel States had formed their constitutions under it, simply guaranteeing the negro his personal liberty, but making no provision for suffrage or any other rights, they could present their members of Congress and you could not keep them out, except by trampling on one of the acts of Congress. But Mr. Lincoln refused to sign it, giving his reason for doing so, and it is only another act for which we ought to thank him. So that while Mr. Lincoln did not require negro suffrage in his plan of reconstruction, we here have a solemn act of Congress absolutely prohibiting the negro from any participation in the reconstruction of the Southern States. Now, how is it with Mr. Johnson? Mr. Lincoln required that they should come back to the Union with constitutions free from slavery. Mr. Johnson has said so time and again—he said it to the South Carolina delegation. He said to the Freedmen's delegation: 'It is one condition of the re-admission of these States that slavery shall be forever extinguished, and that the rights of the freedmen shall be preserved and respected.' I am very glad to see that many of the Southern States are making commendable progress in this matter of the abolition of slavery. I see that the convention in Alabama has adopted by 83 to 3 a provision forever abolishing and prohibiting slavery in that State—and not only so, but requiring the Legislature to make provision for the protection of the freedmen in the enjoyment of their civil rights. (Applause.)

"I come now to speak more properly on the subject of negro suffrage. The Constitution of the United States has referred the question of suffrage to the several States. This may have been right, or it may have been wrong. I merely speak of the subject as it stands, and say that the question of suffrage is referred by the Constitution to the several States. It first provides that such persons as had a right to vote by the laws of the State for a member of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature should have a right to vote for members of Congress. It then, in another provision, declares that the States may, in any manner they may see proper, appoint or elect their presidential electors, so that the whole question of suffrage has, by the Constitution, from the beginning been referred to the several States. Now, it has been proposed by some to avoid the operation of this provision by excluding members of Congress from the Southern States until such time as they shall incorporate negro suffrage in their State constitutions—to say to them, 'We will keep you out of your seats until such time as the State from which you come shall amend its constitution so as to provide for negro suffrage.'

"This is one way in which to avoid the force of the constitutional provisions. There is another plan, and that is the theory which regards these States as being out of the Union and holding them as conquered provinces, subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, like unorganized territory, saying that Congress has the power to provide for calling conventions in these States, just as in the territory of Dakota, and may prescribe the right of suffrage and determine who shall vote in electing delegates to these conventions, just as in the territory of Dakota; that it may then determine whether it will accept the constitution offered, as might be determined in the case of any other territory.

"I will not stop to argue this question at length, but will say this, that from the beginning of the war up to the present time every message of the President, every proclamation, every State paper and every act of Congress has proceeded upon the hypothesis that no State could secede from the Union; that once in the Union, always in the Union. Mr. Lincoln in every proclamation went on the principle that this war was an insurrection—a rebellion against the Constitution and the laws of the United States; not a rebellion of States, but a rebellion of the individuals, the people of the several Southern States, and every man who went into it was personally and individually responsible for his acts and could not shield himself under the action or authority of his State. He went on the principle that every ordinance of secession, every act of the legislatures of the rebel States in that direction was a nullity, unconstitutional and void, having no legal force or effect whatever, and that as these States were, according to law, in the Union, their standing could not be affected by the action of the people—that the people of these States were personally responsible for their conduct, just as a man is responsible who violates the statute in regard to the commission of murder, and to be treated as criminals, just as the authorities thought proper—that the people of a State can forfeit their rights, but so far as their action is concerned, in a legal point of view, they had no power to affect the condition of the State in the Union. Every proclamation and every act of Congress have proceeded upon this hypothesis. Mr. Buchanan started out with the proposition that this was a rebellion of States. He said we could not coerce a State. Our reply was, we have nothing whatever to do with States, we will coerce the people of the States, holding every man responsible for his conduct.

"This was our answer to Mr. Buchanan. Upon this hypothesis we have just put down the rebellion. But it is now proposed by some that we shall practically admit that the Southern States did secede—that they did go out of the Union—that the work of secession was perfect, was accomplished—that the States are out of the Union—that a government de facto was established, and that we now hold these States as conquered provinces, just as we should hold Canada if we were to invade it and take possession of it. As a consequence of this doctrine, Jeff Davis can not be tried for treason because he is not a traitor—not a violator of the law, but the head of a government de facto—the ruler of a conquered province, and we have no more power to try him for treason than we would to try the Governor of Canada for such an offense in case he should fall into our hands during a hostile invasion of his territory. That is what this doctrine leads to. It leads to a thousand other evils and pernicious things never contemplated in the nature of our Government.

"Another consequence which would flow from the admission of that doctrine (and I propose to argue that at some other time) would be that we would be called upon to pay the rebel debt. If we admit that these States were out of the Union for one moment, and we were to be regarded in the light of belligerents, it would be insisted upon at once that when we took them back we took them with their debts, as we would take any other conquered province or State. I do not propose to argue that question any further at this time.

"The question of negro suffrage is one which threatens to divide us to some extent, and is surrounded with many practical difficulties. I reject in advance all schemes of colonization, as they are impracticable. We have no right to insist upon colonizing the negro. He is an American, born in this country, and he has no other country. When he desires to emigrate he has a perfect right to do so, but his emigration must depend upon his own volition. I believe that the time will come when every man in the country, white and black, will have the right of suffrage, and that suffrage should not depend upon color—that there is nothing in that which should make a distinction. I believe that in the process of years every man, whatever his color, whether in Indiana or in South Carolina, will come to enjoy political rights. (Applause.)

"The right to vote carries with it the right to hold office. You cannot say that the negro has a natural right to vote, but that he must vote only for white men for office. The right to vote carries with it the right to be voted for. When that right is conferred you can make no discrimination, no distinction against the right to hold office, and the right to vote in a State carries with it the right to vote for President and members of Congress, and for all Federal officers. The right of suffrage being conferred in South Carolina, for State purposes, under our Constitution, as I have pointed out before, carries with it the right to vote for President and Vice-President and members of Congress.

"In regard to the question of admitting the freedmen of the Southern States to vote, while I admit the equal rights of all men, and that in time all men will have the right to vote without distinction of color or race, I yet believe that in the case of four millions of slaves just freed from bondage there should be a period of probation and preparation before they are brought to the exercise of political power. Let us consider for one moment the condition of these people in the Southern States. You cannot judge of the general condition of the freedmen and negroes upon the plantation by what we hear of the schools established at Hilton Head, Norfolk and other places where a few enthusiastic and philanthropic teachers are instructing the negroes. I have no doubt many of them are making rapid progress, but these are only as one in many thousands. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the negroes in the South live on the plantations, and you cannot judge of the condition of the great mass by those who live in the towns. You must consider the condition of the whole mass. What is that condition? Perhaps not one in five hundred—I may say one in a thousand—can read, and perhaps not one in five hundred is worth five dollars in property of any kind. They have no property, personal or real. They have just come from bondage and all they have is their own bodies.

"Their homes are on the plantations of these men, and they must depend for subsistence on the employment they receive from them. Look at their condition. As I said before, only one in five hundred can read—many of them until within the last few months were never off the plantation; most of them never out of the county in which they live and were born, except as they were driven by the slave drivers. Can you conceive that a body of men, white or black, who have been in this condition, and their ancestors before them, are qualified to be immediately lifted from their present state into the full exercise of political power, not only to govern themselves and their neighbors, but to take part in the government of the United States? Can they be regarded as intelligent and independent voters? The mere statement of the fact furnishes the answer to the question. To say that such men—and it is no fault of theirs; it is simply their misfortune and the crime of the nation—to say that such men, just emerging from this slavery, are qualified for the exercise of political power, is to make the strongest pro-slavery argument I ever heard. It is to pay the highest compliment to the institution of slavery.

"What has been our practice for many years? We have invariably described slavery as degrading to both the body and soul. We have described it as bringing human beings down to the level of the beasts of the field. We have described it as a crime, depriving the slaves of intellectual and moral culture and of all gifts which God has made the most precious. If we shall now turn around and say that this institution has been a blessing to the negro instead of a curse; that it has qualified him for the right of suffrage and the exercise of political power, we shall stultify ourselves and give the lie to those declarations upon which we have obtained political power.

"Let me inquire for a single moment, in what condition is Indiana to urge negro suffrage in South Carolina, or in any other State? Let us consider the position we occupy. We have, perhaps, twenty-five thousand colored people in this State. Most of them can read and write; many of them are very intelligent and excellent citizens, well-to-do in the world, well qualified to exercise the right of suffrage and political power. But how stands the matter? We not only exclude them from voting, we exclude them from testifying in the courts of justice. We exclude them from our public schools and make it unlawful and a crime for them to come into the State of Indiana at any time subsequent to 1850. No negro who has come into our State since 1850 can make a valid contract; he cannot acquire title to a piece of land because the law makes the deed void, and every man who gives him employment is liable to prosecution and fine. I sent out the Twenty-eighth Indiana colored regiment, recruited with great difficulty and at some expense. It has been in the field two years. It has fought well on many occasions and won the high opinion of officers who have seen it. We got credit on our State quota for every man who went out. Yet, according to the Constitution and laws of Indiana more than one-half of the men in that regiment have no right to come back again, and if they do come back they are subject to prosecution and fine; and any man who receives them or employs them is also liable to punishment. Now, can Indiana, in this condition—with twenty-five thousand colored men in her borders, to whom she denies suffrage and political power, and almost all civil rights, with what face, I say, can Indiana go to Congress and insist upon giving the right of suffrage to the negroes in the Southern States? If her Congressmen ask to do this they will naturally be asked in turn, 'What have you done with these people in your own State? You have had them for many years. You have long had an opportunity to make this issue as to whether they ought to have these rights. Their mental and moral condition is much superior to that of the great mass of the freedmen in the Southern States.'

"What have you done? You have done nothing. I ask you, what would be the moral strength of any politician presenting these questions in Congress? I ask how any member of Congress from Indiana, who has not made the issue at home, can present himself and urge the right of Congress to enfranchise the negroes in the Southern States? It may be said that there are only a few of them in Indiana, and it is not important. But if the few who are here have a right, moral or natural, to the franchise, when you refuse it to the few you refuse it to all. When you refuse it to 25,000 you violate sound principles just as much as if you refuse it to five millions. I tell you these Northern States can never command any moral force on that subject until they shall first be just to the negroes at home.

"If you enfranchise all the negroes in these States you will have at least twenty negro votes to one white vote, and in the work of reconstructing the States of South Carolina, Alabama and Florida you would have a larger proportion—perhaps thirty colored votes to one white vote. Now, I ask you, what is to be the effect of that? The first effect would be to erect colored State governments. Under such a condition of things the negro would no more vote for a white man than you would vote for a black man. They would no more elect a white man than they would elect a black man. Human nature is the same, whether in a white or colored skin. There would be nothing that would confer more pleasure upon a man of that race, of course, than the elevation to political power of a man of his own race and color. Having secured power, they would retort upon us that which we have so steadily practiced upon them. If you give them the votes they will elect men of their own color. And we would have no right to blame them. We would think rather badly of them if they did not. I would ask you if the negroes of Hayti, or any other place where they are in the majority, have ever elected a white man to office? Under

Mr. Sumner's plan you will give them an overwhelming majority in every one of these States, and you will give them the political power of the South. That they will exercise that power by electing men of their own color is absolutely certain. Believing that human nature is the same under different complexions, that the negroes are not differently constituted from ourselves, and that they have like passions with us, we cannot doubt how this power will be exercised.

"Some will say that if they can find colored men qualified, all right. There are enough colored men of education in the North to go South and fill every office there, and I have no doubt they stand ready to do it. Here we deny them almost every right, except that of personal liberty, and it is so in Illinois and some of the other Northern States; and when you present to them the prospect of holding the highest offices in the gift of the people of the Southern States, rest assured they will embrace it. They will have colored Governors, and colored members of Congress, and Senators and Judges of the Supreme Court, etc. Very well; and suppose they do send colored Senators and Representatives to Congress? I have no doubt you will find men in the North willing to sit beside them, and will not think themselves degraded by doing so. I have nothing to say to this. I am simply discussing the political effect of it. In every State where there is a colored State government, a negro for Governor and a negro for Supreme Judge, white emigration will cease. There will be no more white emigration to any such State. You cannot find the most ardent anti-slavery man in Wayne county who will go and locate in a State that has colored State government. You will absolutely shut off at once, and effectually, too, all emigration from the Northern States, and from Europe, too, whenever that event shall happen. Thus they will remain permanently colored States in the South. The white men who are now there would remove from them and would not remain under such dominion.

"Very well, say some, that is all very well if we can get the negroes to go there. But let me say that in such case the colored States would be a balance of power in this country. I ask, is it desirable to have a colored State government? I say it is not. It is not for many reasons. One reason is, that such States would continually constitute a balance of power. They would be bound together by the strongest tie that ever binds men together—the tie of color and race—the tie of a down-trodden and despised race. As three hundred thousand slave holders by a common tie were able to govern this nation for a long time, so four millions of people, bound together by a much stronger tie—despised by the whole world as they have been—would constantly vote to act together and their united vote would constitute a balance of power that might control the government of the nation.

"I submit, then, however clearly and strongly we may admit the natural rights of the negro—I submit to the intelligence of the people—that colored State governments are not desirable; that they will bring about results that are not to be hoped for; that finally they would threaten to bring about, and, I believe, would result in a war of races.

"Now the question comes up, how can this thing be avoided and yet confer upon the negro his rights? Well, if I had the power I will tell you how I would avoid it. I believe it will be the way in which it will be ultimately worked out, for I believe the time will come when these rebel States will confer upon the negro the right of suffrage. If I had the power I would arrange it in this way: I would give these men just emerged from slavery a period of probation and preparation; I would give them time to acquire a little property and get a little education; time to learn something about the simplest forms of business and prepare themselves for the exercise of political rights. By that time these Southern States will have been so completely filled up by immigration from the North and from Europe that the negroes will be in permanent minority. Why? Because the negroes have no immigration—nothing but the natural increase—while we have immigration from all the world, and natural increase besides. Thus, by postponing the thing only until such time as the negroes are qualified to enjoy political rights, the dangers I have been considering would have fully passed away. Their influence would no longer be dangerous in the manner I have indicated and a conflict of races would not be more likely to happen there than it now is in Massachusetts. In Massachusetts the negroes have exercised political rights for twenty-five years, and yet there has been no disturbance there—no conflict of races. Why? Because the negroes have been in the minority. They cannot elect a man of their own color to any office to bring up that prejudice of race. I believe what I have stated will be the way in which the question will work itself out. But, under the policy of Mr. Sumner, we are to exclude twenty out of every twenty-one men in the Southern States and bring forward colored voters to fill the places of those excluded. The inevitable result of that policy would be to establish colored State governments and a colored balance of power in this Republic, a thing which I think most desirable to avoid."

That the Republicans of Indiana, under the leadership of Governor Morton, cherished a high regard for Andrew Johnson is evidenced by this plank in their State platform, adopted in February, 1864:

"Resolved, That the gratitude of the American people is due to Andrew Johnson of Tennessee for his unselfish devotion to the cause of the Union, and his patriotic and successful efforts for the overthrow of the rebellion, and that we present his name as the choice of our people for the Vice-Presidency of the United States."

At the Republican State Convention held in February, 1866, these resolutions were given precedence in the platform adopted by the Indiana Republicans:

"Resolved, That we have full faith in President Johnson and his Cabinet, and in the Union members of both houses of Congress, and in the sincere desire and determination of all of them to conduct the affairs of the Government in such manner as to secure the best interests of the whole people; and we hereby declare that we will sustain them in all constitutional efforts to restore peace, order and permanent union.

"Resolved, That in Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, we recognize a patriot true, and a statesman tried; that we will support him in all his constitutional efforts to restore national authority, law and order among the people of the States lately in rebellion, on the basis of equal and exact justice to all men; and that we pledge to the administration, executive and legislative, our united and hearty co-operation in all wise and prudent measures devised for the security of the Government against rebellion and insurrection in times to come.

"Resolved, That whilst we endorse the President of the United States in his constitutional efforts for the safety of the Union, and the restoration of law and order, we do hereby express our entire confidence in the Union majority in Congress and pledge to it our cordial support.

"Resolved, That it is the province of the legislative branch of the General Government to determine the question of reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion against that Government; and that, in the exercise of that power, Congress should have in view the loyalty of the people in those States, their devotion to the Constitution, and obedience to the laws; and until the people of those States, by their acts, prove themselves loyal to the Government, they should not be restored to the rights and position enjoyed and occupied by them before their rebellion."

This endorsement of President Johnson was unstintedly given five months after the delivery of Governor Morton's incisive speech at Richmond, and doubtless reflected the views of the Republican party at that time, although there had been some criticism of Morton's views by the radical element, led by Geo. W. Julian and other champions of abolitionism.

It is worthy of note that while the Republicans carried Indiana by 20,000 majority in 1864 and by 14,000 in 1866, their majority at the October election in 1868 dwindled down to a little over one thousand. The defenders of the Union who survived the vicissitudes of camp life, forced marches, and the carnage of battle, had returned to their firesides and resumed their peaceful occupations, evidently did not take kindly to the repudiation of the principles espoused by Governor Morton at Richmond in 1865, else the Republican majorities would not have melted away as they did. No inconsiderable number of Republicans refused to exchange Lincolnism for Jacobinism.

DEMOCRATIC PATRIOTISM

THE SPLENDID WAR RECORD OF INDIANA DEMOCRATS, AS WELL AS DEMOCRATS OF OTHER STATES

(By Major Geo. E. Finney, Editor Martinsville Democrat.)

PATRIOTISM is a positive quality. It is the foundation stone on which rests the integrity of a nation. It binds, cements, conserves in unity and strength the institutions of a people. Without it no nation could be strong, nor long preserve its autonomy — could long enjoy internal peace or external comity. The love of country is not a natural gift, but comes from reason. Habit, observation and education attach us to it, and not instinct. In a republic such as ours partisanship may grow so strong as to weaken patriotism, and though parties are necessary to preserve a just equilibrium between diverging interests, their tendency to weaken patriotism should be guarded against with extreme care, and this is a lesson not taught with sufficient pertinacity. To illustrate this fact it is only necessary to present the political state of the public mind just previous to the outbreak of the civil war, and which in the same words will give the reader and student of today a clearer view of the deep strength of patriotism that characterized the Democrat of the North of that day, inducing him to enlist himself in the cause destined to preserve intact the national existence of the Union, and to offer life if need be to thwart the purpose of those who for partisan ends would dismember it.

Persons living since that great political crisis cannot form a correct opinion of the condition of the public mind in that day, which is necessary to a full appreciation of the strength of patriotism that actuated the hosts of Indiana Democrats in seizing the implements of war to repel a large sectional contingent of their own party in an insane purpose to destroy the Union.

In the year before the breaking out of the war there had been a most exciting political campaign and election. But for two or three years previous to that campaign there had been heated discussions in the press, on the rostrum and amongst the citizens of communities over the then leading political question of the dissolution of the Union. Naturally the Democrats were put on the defensive for the reason that Southern Democrats, almost wholly, were the propagandists of this destructive project. Before any overt acts were essayed, the question was regarded purely political, and the Democrats of the North were disposed towards defending by palliating the declarations and purpose of their Southern political kinsmen—their position being in the main that the threat had a political aim intended to thwart the political purpose of the abolition sentiment of the North, the abolitionists being held the aggressors. In this period came the notable national discussion in Illinois between Lincoln and Douglas, in which slavery was the prominent feature. This brought the subject to every community in the country, and it was the fire-brand that set the mind ablaze. So that, when the campaign of 1860 came, the people were at swords' points—crazed with the subject, and allowed their minds to run to excess of wild exclamation and abuse. Taunts and jeers were hurled and opprobrious epithets were applied, and soon personal assaults were indulged in when the war actually came. The Democratic party had split into several fragments in the campaign, leaving the Republicans to an easy victory in the national election, and as between this event and the action of the electoral college overt acts of dissolution had become history, the seceding States were not represented, and the Democratic party was torn into shreds. Previous to this quick succession of political events there had been nothing to call out the latent patriotism of either Democrats or Republicans. But now, to use the words, later, of President Cleveland, a condition and not a theory confronted us. Partisanship was thrown aside and patriotism vivified in the heart; and though still upbraided, taunted, jeered by the Republicans in the mad flush of a political victory, Democrats flocked to the standard with the first call to arms and remained active under it through the bloody years until "the war drums throbbed no longer." The patriotism that stirred men to action under these circumstances must have been deep and abiding, and that kept them in service throughout the war, and to those who thus proved the possession of unselfish love of country, a greater meed of praise is due than has often been accorded them. Let the writer hereof lay this humble tribute-wreath upon the brows of those Democrats, living and dead: In the face of most ungenerous abuse and contumely, with a patriotism untarnished by any base sentiment and under the highest motives that can animate loyalty, they "saw their duty and did it."

In distinctive contrast with the attitude towards Democrats of the great body of Republicans, President Lincoln held a clearer view and a juster judgment as to his duty to the country, and his purpose of reclamation of the severed Union. To solidify the North in the struggle and to show that unlike his party generally he felt sure of the patriotism of the Northern Democrats, correctly judging them by his own high purpose of preserving the unity of the States, he sought them out and conferred upon them high and responsible positions. And it is yet to be learned of an incident where they betrayed the trust. McClellan commanded the army; he was a Democrat. Grant was selected from a score of men, and put in command of the great armies of the North; he was a Democrat, changing his political views and becoming a Republican not until the war closed, and in the initial days of the reconstruction period. The superb Hancock, who held back the South on that blood-stained ridge at Gettysburg; a Democrat he, and a gallant soldier and heart-whole patriot besides. Franz Sigel, Democrat, was made a general and given command of a force, that with the wiry German at its head, became an idol of both our German and American citizenship; Sigel was also prominent in civil life—elected Register of the city of New York in 1871, and was Pension Agent for the New York department, appointed by President Cleveland during his first term. The Irish, too, were represented in the fighting General James Shields of Illinois, a Democrat, a statesman as well as soldier, who also served the country as a United States Senator, holding that office in succession from three different States—Illinois, Minnesota and Missouri. However, it was never necessary to "show him," whether in the Senate, as Governor of the Oregon Territory or as a soldier in the field. He knew. This list might be extended greatly, but these names are sufficient to show the unselfish loyalty of the Democracy, both native and foreign born, as well as the wisdom that characterized the great President, Lincoln.

And many Indiana Democratic soldiers—generals, colonels, and men in the ranks—with hearts that beat in unison with the grand strains of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," marched and slept and suffered and fought in the miasmatic swamps, and under the festoons of the gray Spanish moss; on the turbid waters of the Mississippi; in the trenches at Vicksburg; in Mobile bay; at Stone's River; at Resaca; on the storm-swept sands of Hatteras; with Sherman on the march to the sea; even challenging the guns above the clouds on Missionary Ridge; at the bloody angle and on the ridge at Gettysburg; in the swamps of the Chickahominy; working, watching and waiting in the trenches at Petersburg and Richmond; on the fields all over the South, as well as on the ensanguined plains in front of Washington. And everywhere they wrote a record of brave and faithful service, the great thought that animated their souls being to reclaim and preserve the Union. On every field they paid the price of devotion to a lofty patriotism by the ineffable sacrifice. Why not then be placed on their brows in memory a wreath bearing the legend—and no greater praise can be bestowed on man—"They saw their duty and did it." And the men that stood beside them, yet escaped the cruel shaft, and who devoted their lives since to the upbuilding and rehabilitation of the country that was left torn and blood-stained—with broken bones and saddened mothers, bereft of sons or husbands—are no less entitled to like honor and praise from those who enjoy the fruits of their well-directed labors in the dark days of America.

HENDRICKS' ATTITUDE ON THE WAR.

WHAT HE HIMSELF SAID ABOUT IT NINETEEN YEARS AFTER IT WAS OVER.

A good deal was said during and after the civil war in regard to the "equivocal attitude" assumed and maintained by Thomas A. Hendricks with reference to the methods of bringing about the suppression of the rebellion. Mr. Hendricks was reluctant to talk about his record, preferring that it speak for itself rather than that he devote his time to defending it. However, at the close of the exciting Cleveland and Hendricks campaign of 1884 occasion presented itself for departing from his established custom. Representatives of the Democratic Veteran Association of Indiana, headed by Capt. Wm. R. Myers of Anderson, called at the hospitable home of Mr. Hendricks December 4, 1884, to pay their respects to the twice-elected vice-president who had eight years previously been chosen by a popular majority of a quarter of a million votes but who, with Tilden, was denied occupancy of the office to which he had been assigned by the people. In eloquent words Captain Myers paid tribute to the high character and the sterling worth of Governor Hendricks, in reply to which the latter responded in this direct manner and in these incisive terms:

"Captain Myers, I am very much gratified that you have been made the medium by your comrades to express to me the sentiments of your own speech, and of the address of the Association. You would distrust my sincerity were I to say I am not gratified at the honor you have done me. The congratulations from you and your comrades are especially gratifying when I consider the fact that you and I shared in the contest of last summer, which I regard as the greatest of all political contests in this country with which I have been acquainted, and that we have come out of that sharing alike in its responsibilities and its glory. You have referred to one characteristic of the contest which I hope never to see repeated in our country. The personal attacks and slander that have been indulged in were unworthy of American politics. I have never referred to any of these, so far as they personally concern myself, during the campaign, and will only do so now very briefly. During the first month of the war I found it necessary to correct one of these misrepresentations, and at that time used the following language:

Since the war commenced I have uniformly said that the authority of the Government of the United States is not questioned in Indiana, and I regard it as the duty of the citizens of Indiana to respect and maintain that authority, and to give the Government an earnest support in the prosecution of the war, until in the province of God it may be brought to an honorable conclusion and the blessings of peace restored to our country, postponing until that time all controversy in relation to the causes and responsibilities of the war. No man will feel a deeper solicitude for the Indiana soldiers as long as the conflict remains to which they are called, than myself.

"The sentiments then expressed guided my conduct throughout the war. One of the political leaders of the times charged that I failed in my duty in having opposed the law for the drafts. To opposition to the draft I must plead guilty. I favored an army of volunteers, encouraged by suitable bounties; and during the first month of my service in the Senate I said that I desired to express the opinion that Congress should encourage volunteering, rather than rely on what many deemed an unpopular measure of the Government, namely, a draft. I did not regard the draft as a reliable support for the army. Prior to that time 125,000 had been drafted, 6,000 entered service under the draft, 10,000 substitutes were furnished, and 20,000 were induced to volunteer by the bounties that these commutations enabled the department to pay. The draft of 125,000 resulted in 36,600 soldiers in the field. I believed then, as I have believed ever since, that volunteers, encouraged by suitable bounties, relieving them from anxiety about providing for their homes, gave the best assurance of support to the army. The same politician to whom I have referred, speaking of myself, said: 'He did not vote in favor of any measure that looked to carrying on the war.' I will refer to but two acts of mine in the Senate in answer to that statement. On the 23d of April, 1864, I offered an amendment to the Appropriation Bill, to increase the pay of the soldiers and non-commissioned officers reasonably in proportion to the then depreciated condition of the currency. I thought that proposition was an encouragement to the army and to enlistments, and I may say that Colonel Lane, then my colleague in the Senate, voted with me on that subject. On the same day I voted for the great Appropriation Bill for the army, for the year from June 30, 1864 to June 30, 1865—I believe the largest Appropriation Bill ever passed by this Government—voting $530,000,000; and under that appropriation the army was carried to the close of the war; under it many of the battles were fought, and under it Sherman marched to the sea, and the surrender was made to Grant."

Vice-President-elect Hendricks closed by expressing his gratification at meeting the Democratic Soldiers and Sailors' Veteran Association of Indiana on this occasion and in his own home, and tendered them his thanks, not only for the honor they had done him, but for the support they had given him in the great contest then just closed.

(For obvious reasons it is deemed fitting to give this instructive information in this part of the History instead of farther back in its regular or chronological order.)

WHEN THAT CRUEL WAR WAS OVER

POLITICAL ANIMOSITY SUBSIDED SOMEWHAT, BUT PREJUDICE WAS STILL IN EVIDENCE

THE Democratic State Convention of 1866 partook somewhat of the character of a reunion and a love feast. It was held at Indianapolis, March 15. The night before a largely attended meeting was held at the old State House, packed to capacity. This meeting was presided over by Andrew Humphreys, of Greene county. Speeches of a more or less inspiring and inspiriting character were made by Jason B. Brown of Seymour, Colonel Isaiah B. McDonald of Columbia City, Judge Robert Lowry of Goshen, Cyrus S. McNutt of Martinsville, Colonel J. W. Blake of Indianapolis, and Judge D. T. Laird of Spencer.

The convention proper was called to order by State Chairman Joseph J. Bingham. Colonel Cyrus L. Dunham, of New Albany, was chosen temporary and afterward permanent chairman. In his customary forceful style the presiding officer addressed the assembly on the issues of the day, presenting strong points in support of the policies advocated by the Democracy and giving due credit to President Andrew Johnson in seeking to re-establish harmonious relations between North and South.

So deeply interested was the convention in listening to the words of truth and wisdom as they fell from the lips of Colonel Dunham that at the close of his masterly effort insistent demand was made for more oratory. Naturally the delegates turned their faces to where the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash" was seated. Loud calls for Voorhees brought that master of oratory to his feet. At considerable length and to the infinite delight of the assembled multitude that champion of popular rights pitilessly exposed the tyrannical program of the Jacobins then in the saddle and appealed eloquently to the sense of justice that has ever been assumed to serve as a guidance to a fair-minded and justice-loving people. Great outbursts of applause punctuated the able and eloquent address of Mr. Voorhees.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM DECLARATIONS.

"Resolved, That among the powers reserved to the States, that of withdrawal at will from the Union cannot be found, and consequently, such doctrine can be asserted only as a revolutionary measure, and not peaceably as a right; and the late action of the Southern people, in resorting to such means as a mode of redress of grievances, was illegal, and had no sustaining principle but that of physical force, and that, having proved insufficient, those principles became remitted to their constitutional obligations or rights, of which obedience and protection are chief.

"Resolved, That the principles avowed by President Johnson in his annual message, looking to the early practical restoration of all the States to their rights in the Union, meets with our hearty approval; and the action of the majority in Congress, dictated as it may be by revenge, fanaticism, or thirst for political power, and being exerted to thrust such States out of the Union, we solemnly condemn; therefore, we cordially endorse the veto of the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, and declare that in our judgment the courage displayed, the doctrines avowed, and the high sense of rights manifested in that message, and subsequent speeches, promise well for the future administration of the President, and we hereby pledge him the earnest and disinterested support of the Indiana Democracy in all his conflicts with that fanatical congressional majority in his laudable efforts to prevent them from changing or destroying our cherished form of government.

"Resolved, That, in our opinion, the sole power of the Senate and House of Representatives over the admission of members to their respective chambers, is confined to the 'election, return, and qualification of its members respectively'; that this convention further declares its conviction that Congress, in rejecting from representation eleven States acknowledged to be in the Union, by having their votes counted in favor of the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, the Senate and House have usurped powers not delegated to them by the Constitution, and are acting in violation thereof. We further believe that all members from the Southern States who have been lately elected, and possess the constitutional qualifications, should be immediately admitted and upon the refusal of Congress to admit the members of such States to their seats, it is the prerogative and duty of the President of the United States to defend and uphold the integrity of every State now in the Union, and 'to take care that the laws are faithfully executed.'

"Resolved, That the soldiers who left the comforts of a home to sustain the flag of our country, are entitled to, and should receive, the heartfelt thanks of a grateful people. And those who early rushed to the standard should, by the action of Congress, be equally remunerated, by an equalization of bounties, or otherwise, with their brethren who, at a later day, were called upon to fill that highest duty of a citizen.

"Resolved, That the vote of the House of Representatives conferring the right of suffrage on negroes, against the almost unanimous vote of the people of the District of Columbia, shows a recklessness which none but fanatics would defend, and none but tyrants practice; and we hereby denounce that vote as a precursor of universal negro suffrage, and to other outrages upon the rights and liberties of the people of the various States.

"Resolved, That we are opposed to the repeal of the 13th article of the Constitution of Indiana prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from settling in this State, and now, more than ever, deprecate the entrance of that class of persons within its borders; and we most emphatically condemn and disapprove the action of the Republican majority in the late General Assembly of Indiana in passing through the House a joint resolution providing for the abrogation of that article in the Constitution.

"Resolved, That Senator Hendricks, and Representatives Niblack, Kerr and Voorhees, by their untiring devotion to constitutional liberty, have shown themselves true patriots; and the expulsion of Mr. Voorhees from the House we denounce a high-handed outrage of a profligate, unscrupulous party."

It will be observed that President Johnson's course met with approval in both the Democratic and Republican State platforms. There was, however, this difference: As Democrats "warmed up" to Johnson, the Republicans became more and more chilly, so that toward the close of the 1866 campaign not much regard for the Republican platform endorsement of President Johnson lingered in the minds of those who conducted the campaign. As a matter of fact, radical Republican sentiment was by that time strongly tintured with open hostility to the Johnson administration.

REPUBLICAN STATE TICKET FOR 1866.

Secretary of State—Colonel Nelson Trusler, Fayette county.

Auditor of State—Thomas B. McCarty, Wabash county.

Treasurer of State—General Nathan Kimball, Martin county.

Attorney-General—Delana E. Williamson, Putnam county.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—George W. Hoss, Marion county.

The net result of the 1866 election was the triumph of the Republican State ticket, the election of a Republican Legislature, and the success of eight of the eleven Republican candidates for Congress. A Republican Legislature for 1867 foreshadowed the election of Oliver P. Morton to the United States Senate to succeed Henry S. Lane.

HENDRICKS AND EDGERTON

PLACED AT THE HEAD OF THE DEMOCRATIC STATE TICKET FOR 1868

THE attendance at Democracy's State Convention, January 8, 1868, was unusually large and exceptionally enthusiastic. A temporary organization was effected the night before, Congressman Wm. E. Niblack having been chosen to preside. Daniel W. Voorhees electrified the audience with an address that by a number of his elated hearers was pronounced the ablest and most eloquent the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash" had ever delivered. He was in excellent trim, his delivery was thrilling, his argumentation masterly. Enthusiastic applause punctuated his speech from beginning to end. As he uttered his closing sentence he was honored with an ovation of which any great orator might well have felt proud. It was a great night for Democratic enthusiasm.

For permanent chairman the Committee on Organization named Joseph E. McDonald, which selection was ratified with unanimity and enthusiasm. Mr. McDonald, on taking the chair, delivered a speech in the course of which he arraigned the Republican party for its disregard of constitutional limitations, its revolutionary program for subjugating the people of the South after having laid down their arms and returned to their allegiance to the Union. He gave hearty approval to the patriotic course of President Johnson.

The State campaign was vigorously conducted. A joint discussion between Governor Baker and Senator Hendricks had the effect of awakening deep interest throughout the State. Each Congressional District was honored with one of these oratorical combats. While Senator Hendricks doubtless had a decided advantage over his competitor in his commanding personality and in the graces of oratory, Governor Baker was not to be despised as a campaigner. He was forceful, logical, and persuasive. The writer attended two of these joint discussions, one at South Bend, the other at Auburn. At a little gathering of Democrats, after the South Bend discussion, Senator Hendricks took occasion to remark that Democrats made a great mistake in trying to disparage Baker as a debater or to belittle him in other respects; that Baker had revealed himself as possessed of unusual ability and no little adroitness in turning points to advantage. The debates were marked by the utmost civility and the absence of anything like discourtesy. That these two men learned to esteem and appreciate one another during this oratorical tournament is evidenced by the fact that some years afterward they formed a co-partnership in the practice of law at Indianapolis.

In his campaign speeches Mr. Hendricks adhered closely to the definition of constitutional doctrine as set forth in an exceedingly able banquet speech delivered by Attorney-General Henry Stanbery at Washington, January 8, 1868, in the course of which that eminent jurist—a former Whig and later on a Republican, but at the time a staunch supporter of the Lincoln-Johnson policy—epitomized the living issues in these terse sentences:

“The Constitution as it is; the limitation of Federal power within the just and well-defined boundaries of the Constitution and not outside of the Constitution; civil law instead of military law; free elections and constitutions formed by the people of the States, and not by the people of other States, whether in Congress or out of Congress.”

THE STATE PLATFORM.

As usual, the State platform was drawn out at great length. Terseness and brevity have hardly ever commended themselves to Indiana platform-makers. The idea seems to have become generally prevalent that unless a platform is somewhere in the neighborhood of a yard in length, something must have been omitted, slighted, or gotten away with. The ideal party platform-maker was Samuel J. Tilden. When he was in command in New York, the platforms put forth by the Empire State Democracy were models of directness, brevity and terseness.

The more important planks of the Indiana Democratic platforms are here reproduced as reminders of how Democrats in this State felt three years after the close of the civil war:

“Resolved, That language is not adequate to express our abhorrence and condemnation of the Radical reconstruction policy of Congress—a policy condemned by every consideration of justice and constitutional obligation; a policy fraught with the most alarming apprehensions of evil to ten States of the Union, and of destruction to the Union itself; a policy that largely increases taxation; a policy that requires a large standing army, which adds nearly one hundred million dollars annually to the expenses of the Government, while it beggars the people; a policy the avowed object of which is to continue in power the most venal and corrupt political party that ever dishonored any civilization; a policy vindictively enacted and mercilessly prosecuted with the unconstitutional purpose of centralizing and perpetuating all political powers of the Government in the dominant Radical party in Congress, and a policy which if not early arrested by the American people, will sooner or later overwhelm our national Government in one common and appalling ruin. We demand the unconditional repeal of the act of Congress conferring exclusive rights or privileges upon any class or classes of citizens at the expense of other classes.

"That the national bank system organized in the interest of the bondholders ought to be abolished, and United States notes substituted in lieu of the national bank currency, thus saving to the people interest alone more than eighteen million dollars a year; and, until such system of banks be abolished, we demand that the shares of such banks in Indiana shall be subjected to the same taxation, State and municipal, as other property of the State.

"That the bonds and other securities of the United States and every description of property should bear equal proportion of taxation for State, county, and municipal purposes, and to that end the bonds and other securities of the United States ought to be taxed by Congress for national purposes in amount substantially equal to the tax imposed on property in the several States for local purposes.

"That we are in favor of the payment of the Government bonds in Treasury notes, commonly called greenbacks, except expressly made payable in gold by law, at the earliest practicable point.

"That the unjust and iniquitous tariff laws now in force ought to be repealed, and the tariff adopted looking to revenue only.

"That we are opposed to conferring the right of suffrage on negroes. We deny the right of the General Government to interfere with the question of suffrage in any of the States of the Union.

"That we shall ever hold in sacred recollection the dead who freely sacrificed their lives for the defense of our glorious Union, that the present and future generations might enjoy the rich inheritance of a form of government that secures an equality of rights and privileges to all the citizens thereof; that the nation owes to the surviving soldiers and sailors of the Union the highest marks of praise and gratitude for the great sacrifices they made in the late war, and to those disabled in the service of the Union, and the widows and orphan children of those who fell in battle, or died of wounds, or in the military service of the Union, such personal aid as will enable them to enjoy the substantial necessities of life.

"That we recognize in the restoration measures of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, a policy which would have given peace, security, and prosperity to the State, and dispelled the dark clouds caused by the vindictive measures of a Radical Congress. The adoption of the President's policy would, in our opinion, have saved the nation the expenditure of untold millions of treasure, lessened the burden of taxation, secured peace to the South, and prosperity to the Union.

"That Major-General Hancock, by his order at New Orleans, reinstating the civil law and dethroning the military despotism, has manifested the highest respect for constitutional liberty, for which he deserves the commendation of all friends of constitutional government, and who revere the noble profession of arms. Like the great and good Washington, this gallant soldier had learned to respect the civil rights of all good citizens, and to declare that in time of peace military tribunals should have no place in our jurisprudence. Eternal honor to the soldier who refused to rise above the laws!

"That we congratulate the Democracy of our sister State of Ohio on the gallant political campaign closed on the 8th day of October, 1867—a campaign marked by the highest order of devotion, ability, and effect, and that prominent and close in the association in the minds of our fellow-citizens of Indiana stands the name of the Hon. George H. Pendleton, identified with the vital measures upon which our party enters the canvass for 1868, together with his ability as a statesman and his high personal qualities. All these entitle him to the commendation of the convention as a true and consistent Democrat, and one who has our entire confidence and preference."

The Presidential campaign engaged popular attention to a far greater extent than did State issues. The latter received but slight consideration; indeed, it is not quite certain that there were any such.

In somewhat subdued form the Indiana delegation to the Democratic convention was considered instructed to vote for the nomination of Geo. H. Pendleton of Ohio, for the Presidency. "Gentleman George," by which cognomen that estimable citizen and statesman was popularly known, was General Geo. B. McClellan's running mate in 1864 and achieved high reputation as a captivating campaigner. From a pronounced hard money champion he developed into a still more pronounced soft money (greenback) advocate. His "plan" commended itself greatly to Indiana Democrats, so when the State convention named delegates to the New York convention the Pendleton boom experienced quite an impetus. But among the delegates were a goodly number of those who looked upon Thomas A. Hendricks as being far more available than they adjudged the gentleman from Ohio to be. A strong Hendricks sentiment developed during the earlier sessions of the New York convention. During the protracted balloting he received as high as 140 votes—nearly as many as had been given Pendleton when Pendleton stock ranged highest. Had Indiana formally agreed to put Hendricks into the race there is but little doubt that he would have been nominated with a whirl. The Bright influence would not permit this to be done. While that wily politician, Jesse D. Bright, ostensibly boosted the Pendleton movement, he was in reality in favor of making Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase the Democratic presidential nominee. The alacrity with which politicians of radical views can flop from one extreme to another has not infrequently furnished both amusement and amazement to sticklers for consistency. It was common belief that C. L. Vallandigham of Ohio, another anti-war propagandist, favored the nomination of Chief Justice Chase. The insurmountable obstacle to making a reality of this scheme was Samuel J. Tilden, who was known to be uncompromisingly opposed to any occupant of a judicial position being nominated to political office. New York had instructed its delegation to vote for Chief Justice Sanford E. Church, but when discovery was made that that eminent jurist couldn't get any votes from other States, New York withdrew the name of Judge Church after the sixth ballot. There was a good deal of fencing. Several days were consumed in ineffective balloting. The patience of delegates was fast being exhausted. Then a stampede thrust the nomination on Horatio Seymour, who did his utmost to escape the ordeal of a presidential campaign, chiefly on account of his impaired physical condition, but perhaps still more so by reason of the inner consciousness that Democratic success that year was unattainable. Seymour was a grand character, a man of eminent ability, but he was not available presidential timber, and no one understood this better than he himself. Certainty of the ticket's defeat was in a sense invited by the nomination of General Frank P. Blair for the vice-presidency. Blair had up to that time been a rank Republican. He was vehement in the denunciation of Republican reconstruction measures and in charging General Grant with aiming to crown himself with Caesarism—that if elected, he would never leave the Presidential mansion alive. The New York World and other influential Democratic papers in vain remonstrated against such extravagance of speech. Demands for his removal from the ticket were made, but they fell upon deaf ears. At the November election Seymour and Blair polled 2,703,249 votes to 3,012,833 for Grant and Colfax. In the electoral college Grant and Colfax had 214; Seymour and Blair, 80. New York gave Seymour an even 10,000 majority, New Jersey 2,880, and Oregon 1,064. These three were the only Northern States that were carried by Seymour and Blair. While at the October election in Indiana Thomas A. Hendricks polled 170,614 votes, Seymour's vote in November was 166,980. Hendricks was beaten by 961; Seymour by 9,572.

For many years there was printed at Indianapolis an able and influential German weekly paper called "Indiana Volksblatt." Its publisher was Julius Boetticher, a fine gentleman and clear thinker. After the war Mr. Boetticher had his political editorials of a national character written by the Hon. Emil Rothe, of Cincinnati, who while a resident of Wisconsin used to engage in joint discussions with Carl Schurz.

Rothe was a very able man and a thorough Democrat. In a series of articles the nomination of General Winfield Scott Hancock for president and Wm. S. Groesbeck of Cincinnati for vice-president was strongly urged through the columns of the Volksblatt. There is no doubt that a ticket composed of these two great, good, and popular men would have commanded a far more enthusiastic support than did Seymour and Blair. Hancock and Groesbeck was the logical combination for that period in our country's history. But, unfortunately, logic doesn't always guide the action of political bodies. It surely didn't in 1868.

While the nomination of Seymour was generally adjudged a spontaneous affair, one of the delegates from Northern Indiana, Major Samuel W. Sprott, a red-hot Pendletonite, related upon his return from New York that ten minutes after Seymour's nomination banners and transparencies with Seymour inscriptions were brought forth in a popular demonstration. To satisfy himself whether these inscriptions had just been hurriedly put on canvass he stepped up to one of the most imposing ones to ascertain by touch of finger whether it was fresh or dry. "Egad, it's dry!" the Major exclaimed with an expressive twinkle of the eye.

One of the notable characters among the Indiana delegates was Charles H. Reeve of Plymouth. Whatever he favored he backed with energy and zeal. There was nothing of the equivocal in his make-up. And he prided himself a good deal on the originality of his views and the soundness of his conclusions. He was a man of unquestionable ability and inflexible integrity, but at times he was also eccentric, and not always consistent. In 1868 he was a "red-hot" champion of Pendleton and a greenback circulating medium, and in 1896 he refused to support Bryan on account of his attitude on the silver coinage issue. He was for plenty of greenbacks in 1868, but averse to a superabundance of silver in 1896. In discussing Reeve's eccentricity in these particulars Mr. Hendricks once upon a time smilingly remarked that if Charley Reeve had lived in the days of Christ he (Hendricks) felt certain that the Senator from Marshall would have moved to amend the Lord's prayer. Notwithstanding his eccentricities, Senator Reeve was in many respects a most companionable gentleman and a highly estimable citizen. He took great delight in expressing his views through the columns of the public press. Usually he signed his name to his contributions; at times he would use a pseudonym. He did this when in 1874 he published a communication in the Indianapolis Sentinel of March 11 which was headed "Hendricks a Democratic Caesar." In this article Senator Reeve asserted it to be known to the friends of Hendricks that "he lacks firmness and yields to pressure." "His natural kindness induces him to surrender his own better judgment to the importunity of his friends." "Had he the firmness of Jackson he would be the idol of the people today."

The article then relates how George H. Pendleton led for the presidential nomination in the New York convention, but that Tammany was scheming against him, the convention being held in Tammany hall. On the fourth ballot the chairman of the Indiana delegation asked they be excused from the hall for a time in order to consult among themselves. The chairman led them out and explained the conference was over the proposition of bringing out Hendricks; that Pendleton could not be named and New York would vote en masse for Hendricks. Joseph E. McDonald opposed the movement, while Voorhees insisted upon it peremptorily. A messenger came to the door for the sixth, seventh, and perhaps eighth ballot. No vote was taken by the Indiana delegation, but some one shouted "for Pendleton," and it was so cast. On the next ballot Indiana divided between Hendricks and Pendleton. Richard J. Bright, on behalf of the minority, expressed dissent, as the delegation had been instructed for Pendleton. New York divided its vote. Some of the delegates accused Hendricks of permitting the use of his name, and claimed that every ballot was being telegraphed him. It was also claimed that Voorhees, Fitch and Niblack wanted a chance at the Senate and Governor's seat, and for that reason were behind the Hendricks movement.

The next day the Indiana delegation, fearing all was lost, the minority consenting, cast its vote for Hendricks. Ohio was angered and finally withdrew Pendleton. Seymour, who had been nominated several times, always declining, sat pulling his scraggly hair. Ohio swung to Seymour, as did the other States, and finally Indiana.

The surprising feature of the October election was the discrepancy between the Republican preponderance in the outcome of the Congressional contests and the insignificance of the Republican majority for Governor and other State officers. That the Republicans elected seven of the eleven members of Congress with so small a difference in the aggregate vote may to some extent have been due to personal popularity or to superiority in campaigning, but the stronger probability is that the real factor of the seven to four in-taking was the skillful manner in which the State had been gerrymandered for Congressional purposes. The disproportion of representation in the Legislature was also in the main ascribable to the free application of the gerrymandering process in apportioning the State for legislative purposes.

The serious aspect of Republican ascendancy in the Legislature at that time was the pendency of the 15th amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the introduction of negro suffrage throughout the Union. In a number of States the proposition to enfranchise the negro through State action had been submitted to popular vote and invariably rejected. Then it was that the idea of conferring the right of suffrage upon negroes by amendment to the Federal Constitution was conceived and in course of time put into effect. A recital of the manner in which this was done will always be an interesting and instructive, though ever humiliating, chapter of political history.

In Indiana a most determined fight was made to prevent the ratification of this amendment. Rather than be made a party to ratification the Democratic members of the Legislature resigned in a body. A special election was ordered by Governor Baker. At this election the course of those who had tendered their resignations was emphatically endorsed by triumphant re-elections. This verdict of the ballot stands out in bold relief as an inextinguishable protest against the unwise and most pernicious act committed in time of peace from the beginning of the Republic to the present time.

Oliver P. Morton took his seat as United States Senator March 4, 1867. Having silently, without explanation or justification, gone clear back on what he so ably espoused in his forceful and incontrovertible Richmond speech, he became actively enlisted in the advocacy of the radical measures that had inception in the merciless souls of those who blindly followed the behests of vindictive Thad. Stevens.

The Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which conferred the privilege of suffrage on the negro, a provision setting forth that the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, was submitted by Congress to the Legislatures of the thirty-seven States and declared in effect in a little over a year's time.

The submission was made by the Fortieth Congress on February 27, 1869, and the proclamation of the Secretary of State was dated March 30, 1870. Ratification was voted by the Legislatures of twenty-nine States. New York gave its consent in April, 1869, but rescinded this action January 5, 1870. The first action taken by the Ohio Legislature, on May 4, 1869, was unfavorable. New Jersey, after having rejected the amendment, gave its approval on February 21, 1871, subsequent to the proclamation.

The States rejecting the amendment were California, Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Oregon and Tennessee.

Those States voting acceptance acted on the following dates:

The result of the 1868 election afforded opportunity for the Republicans to supplant Thomas A. Hendricks in the United States Senate, in which body that gentleman had made a record to which his friends and admirers can ever point with pride.

Early in the year 1868 there was in progress a good deal of political maneuvering. Under the established custom of political parties an Acting Governor was assumed to be entitled to a nomination for the full term if he desired it. Lieutenant-Governor Conrad Baker, upon the election of Governor Morton to the Senate, became Acting Governor. While in the main he enjoyed the kindly feeling and confidence of his party, there was in evidence a pronounced sentiment in favor of making Will Cumback the Republican nominee for Governor. His following was ardent and enthusiastic. Mr. Cumback had been a member of Congress and was generally regarded an adroit politician and an effective stump speaker. Realizing that Baker had a cinch on the gubernatorial nomination, Cumback conceived the idea of driving a shrewd little bargain. While in that frame of mind he took his pen in hand and indited the following letter:

(Envelope Marked "Private.")

"Greensburgh, Ind., Jan. 6, 1868.

"Governor Baker: Dear Friend—If I had not a thousand things to demand my attention this week, I would come up and see you. I will therefore venture to make this suggestion: I think Hendricks will be chosen by the Democrats, and he will certainly (if he intends to inspire hope of success among his friends) resign his position. The person appointed by you will, other things being equal, stand the best chance to be chosen by our Legislature.

If you will assure me of the appointment, I will withdraw from the contest for any position on the State ticket and take the position of elector at our State Convention. If this proposition does not meet with your approbation, please return this letter to me. Let me have your reply at an early day. I do most earnestly hope for the unity of the Republican party.

"I am, as ever, your friend,

"WILL CUMBACK."

Now, when Mr. Cumback reduced these thoughts to writing he doubtless assumed that Governor Baker had become thoroughly imbued with the practical ideas of Governor Morton in regard to adjusting matters of this kind by private arrangement. In assuming this he may have been grievously in error. At any rate it appeared later on that Governor Baker regarded the Cumback overture or proposition as "improper and corrupt." By way of variation he branded it as "indecent and corrupt." But when the convention met, Baker and Cumback were harmoniously placed at the head of the ticket—Baker for Governor, Cumback for Lieutenant-Governor. The two worked together in happy unison, in perfect harmony. The masses had no suspicion that Baker held under lock and key a little document which, if made public, would blow Cumback's higher aspirations skyward.

Hendricks' neglect, failure or refusal to resign the Senatorship—thus exemplifying his faith in the wisdom and practicability of the maxim that a bird in the hand is worth a half dozen in the bush—deprived Governor Baker of the opportunity to name a successor, as Cumback had fondly anticipated. Indeed, there was no occasion for Hendricks resigning his seat in the Senate. His term expired March 4, 1869. Had he been elected Governor in October, 1868, he could have resigned on the day of his inauguration in January and then appointed his successor in the Upper Branch of Congress. There was no political interest or necessity involved, so far as the Republicans were concerned.

Their majority in the Senate was altogether too large for the good of the party, surely for that of the country.

Notwithstanding Governor Baker's hostility to Major Cumback, the latter easily captured the Republican legislative caucus nomination for the Senatorship. This was immediately followed by an explosion. The Cumback letter of January 6 was made public. Its publication created intense excitement throughout the State. The exposure became the subject of animated discussion in every nook and corner. It made the old stagers prick their ears and stand aghast. Enough Republican legislators had been corralled to prevent Cumback's election. These conservators of political purity stood solemnly pledged to never, no never, vote for Will Cumback for United States Senator. Among them was State Senator James Hughes of Bloomington, a particular friend of Jesse D. Bright, and whom the Democrats had elected to Congress before the civil war, who supported Breckinridge and Lane in 1860, but who, like Ben Butler and Caleb Cushing, became suddenly weaned from his pro-Southern proclivities and later on fondly embraced Republicanism as the embodiment of all that could be regarded as "good and righteous."

With his eagle eye intently fixed on the Hendricks seat in the Senate at Washington, Senator Hughes introduced a resolution reciting the corrupting and demoralizing contents of the Cumback letter and denouncing the graceless methods by and through which a seat was sought to be secured in the Senate at Washington. When, after a protracted and animated discussion of the subject, the Legislature called for the correspondence between Cumback and Baker, the Governor addressed a letter to Hon. Stearns Fisher, of Wabash, saying it was due to himself that some Senator should be informed as to the number of letters comprising the entire correspondence. One from Colonel Cumback, dated January 6, 1868; his reply thereto dated January 8, 1868; one from Colonel Cumback dated February 21, 1868, and his reply dated February 22. The Governor asked the Senator to say, in the event of the first letter's production, that his reply was an indignant rejection of the proposition.

Jesse D. Bright, whom Mr. Hendricks succeeded in the Senate, chanced to be about Indianapolis just at the time when these symptoms of political purity were bubbling forth. With charming disinterestedness he circulated among Democratic legislators and whispered into their ears: "A splendid opportunity is here presented to elect a United States Senator. You can't re-elect Mr. Hendricks; that is a sure case. But you can elect James Hughes, who has always been and is now at heart a Democrat, and who ought not to be proscribed just because he wandered away temporarily during the war." This was a catchy plea, but strange as may appear, it failed to line up the Democratic legislators for Hughes. Then some virtuous political Josephs from the North put in an appearance. They were anxious to get Judge James S. Frazer of Warsaw away from the bench by transferring him to the national capital, so that one of these protectors of political virtue might be made circuit judge. But that neat little program didn't pan out, either, so that in course of time a new Republican legislative caucus was called, Will Cumback's name was withdrawn and Daniel D. Pratt of Logansport agreed upon as the reunited party's choice for the United States Senatorship. All the Republicans voted for Pratt; all the Democrats for Hendricks. At the preceding fall election Pratt had been chosen a representative in Congress. His election to the Senate and his acceptance thereof created a vacancy and afforded an opening for some other patriot to go to Washington. This favor was bestowed upon James N. Tyner of Peru, a gentleman whose patriotism and self-sacrificing spirit never permitted him to let a desirable or lucrative office go begging.

The campaign of 1868 was ably and energetically conducted in Indiana. Much of this was due to the vigorous manner in which the Sentinel performed its part in that memorable contest. April 13, 1868, Richard J. Bright, of Madison, took over the Indianapolis Herald and restored to that publication its former name, the Sentinel. He was the son of Michael G. Bright and a nephew of Senator Jesse D. Bright. Lafe Develin had conducted the Herald with signal ability for several years. Associated with him were Joseph J. Bingham, Geo. C. Harding, John H. Holliday, John Schley, and others. Richard Jesse Bright was a fine specimen of manhood, a positive character, a devoted friend and a fearless opponent. Inability to make the Sentinel profitable caused him to dispose of the plant, and some time afterward he became sergeant-at-arms of the United States Senate, a position he held for a number of years. As a Senate official he was held in high esteem by Democrats and Republicans alike. At this writing he is still a resident of Washington, D. C. His father was for many years among the most influential Democrats of Indiana. He was warmly attached to his distinguished brother, Jesse D. Bright, whom he served and aided in many ways. Michael G. Bright had much to do with the adjustment of the financial troubles in which the State had become involved during the grossly misdirected internal improvement craze. For several years he was the State's financial representative to straighten out the kinks that for years so greatly impaired the credit of Indiana. He was a man of great force of character, a Democrat of the stanchest type and a citizen highly esteemed by all with whom he came in contact. His business qualifications were of a high order. It was chiefly due to this that he was chosen to disentangle the ensnarled finances of the State. His signal success in that undertaking attested the wisdom of his selection.

DETERMINED FIGHT AGAINST RATIFICATION OF THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION BY INDIANA DEMOCRATS.

During the latter part of the 1869 session of the Indiana Legislature the proposed fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was submitted to that body for ratification or rejection. All the Democratic members of both houses were uncompromisingly opposed to ratification. When they discovered that the Republicans, constituting the majority, had been lined up in favor of ratification, notwithstanding the fact that some of them personally doubted the wisdom, justice or advisability of such action, the conclusion was reached that resort should be taken to breaking a quorum by resignation. That their action did not accomplish the desired purpose detracts not a whit from the glory that attaches to their names as sterling defenders of an undefiled electorate. They did all in their power to preserve the integrity of the ballot. That they failed is not their fault. From beginning to end they stood up manfully, courageously and patriotically for a cause founded upon right and justice.

Governor Baker officially reported seventeen members of the Senate and thirty-seven members of the House as resigning March 4, 1869, during the regular session of the Legislature. The Governor thereupon called a special election to fill vacancies, to be held March 23.

A special session of the Legislature was called for April 8, to act on appropriation bills and other matters. During this session it was reported that sixteen Senators and forty-two members of the House had resigned. A. P. Stanton, of Indianapolis, resigned as Speaker, being succeeded by George A. Buskirk of Bloomington, April 12. Stanton was not considered equal to the emergency, hence his abdication as Speaker. The Senate passed the joint amendatory resolution May 13 by a vote of 27 ayes to 1 nay. Ten Senators were shown on the record as being present but not voting.

When the resolution was brought up in the House, May 14, John R. Coffroth of Huntington raised the point of order that two-thirds of the membership were required for a quorum. It was reported at the special session that sixteen Senators and forty-two members of the House resigned. Mr. Coffroth, in raising his point of order, said the roll call developed but fifty-six members present, which was eleven less than a quorum. Speaker Buskirk held there was no precedent, or law of Congress, indicating what should constitute a quorum on United States Constitutional questions; he therefore let the roll call proceed. The result was announced as fifty-four ayes, nays none.

This, in brief, is the story of the ratification of the fifteenth amendment. The action of the Democratic members who resigned for the express purpose of breaking a quorum was approved by their triumphant re-election. Not the slightest doubt existed as to public sentiment in Indiana being overwhelmingly opposed to this amendment. Yet it was put through as a party necessity, unmindful of the note of warning sounded by Governor Morton in his Richmond speech before he had made himself a convert to the dangerous and revolutionary program mapped out by Thaddeus Stevens and his coadjutors.

NEGRO VOTE A DISAPPOINTMENT TO THE REPUBLICANS, WHO SUSTAINED FIRST DEFEAT SINCE 1862

If the Republican leaders really believed that the admission of negroes to the ballot, under the operation of the fifteenth amendment, would have the effect of making more certain Republican ascendancy in Indiana, they experienced a sore disappointment in the result of the election that year. If, as is quite likely, the negro vote was cast solidly for the Republican nominees, it became equally apparent that for every colored vote added to their numbers a white vote was lost to them. No effort was made by the Democrats to gather any of the newly enfranchised voters into their fold. The Republican party as an organization had unequivocally, though with poorly disguised misgivings, committed itself in favor of the fifteenth amendment, while Democrats with the utmost unanimity freely and unreservedly condemned the arbitrary and revolutionary manner in which the elective franchise had been prostituted to base partisan purposes.

The Democratic State convention for 1870 was held at the State Capital on historic Jackson Day, and was called to order by Lafe Develin, chairman of the State Central Committee. The gallant Union soldier element was very much in evidence and most cordially greeted. General Mahlon D. Manson served as temporary chairman, and upon a hero of two wars, General James R. Slack of Huntington, was conferred the honor of being made permanent chairman. Both of these gallant defenders of our country's flag delivered speeches that elicited unbounded enthusiasm. Their utterances breathed the spirit of genuine unionism and devotion to constitutional supremacy.

The real contest in the convention was over the State auditorship, then by far the most lucrative office in the State. Six candidates had entered the race: John C. Shoemaker, John B. Stoll, Joseph V. Bemusdaffer—Steele, Keightley and Turner. On the first ballot Shoemaker had 366, Stoll 298½, Bemusdaffer 122, Steele 148, Keightley 127, Turner 51. On the final ballot Shoemaker had 591, Stoll 502, Keightley 6. Upon the announcement of the result of the final ballot Mr. Stoll, in a brief speech, expressed his entire acquiescence in the decision of the majority, followed with the declaration that, though not chosen as part of the ticket, he would be found in the thickest of the fight for the triumphant election of the convention's nominees. Tumultuous applause greeted this announcement.

The entire ticket was made up of the following-named gentlemen:

Secretary of State—Colonel Norman Eddy, South Bend.

Auditor—John C. Shoemaker, Cannelton.

Treasurer—James B. Ryan, Indianapolis.

Attorney-General—Bayless W. Hanna, Terre Haute.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—Rev. Milton B. Hopkins, Kokomo.

Supreme Court Judges—James L. Worden, Fort Wayne; Alexander C. Downey, Ohio county; Samuel H. Buskirk, Bloomington; John Pettit, Lafayette.

State Central Committee—Eccles G. Van Riper, John S. Davis, Floyd; Richard D. Slater, Jr., Jefferson; Nathan H. Raymond, Wayne; E. S. Alvord, Indianapolis, Chairman; William M. Mack, Vigo; John S. Williams, Tippecanoe; James Sweetzer, Grant; John Obison, Delaware; Eli W. Brown, Whitley; John P. Early, Laporte.

THE PLATFORM.

The more important planks of the 1870 platform were set forth in these words:

"That the Federal Union, with all the rights and dignity of the several States, should be preserved; and to secure that great national blessing the Constitution must be respected and observed and every approach to centralized despotism defeated, whether attempted by Congress or the Executive.

"That recent events have, more than ever, convinced us of the infamous and revolutionary character of the reconstruction measures of Congress, and we denounce these measures as an invasion of the sovereign and sacred rights of the people and all the States.

"That we are willing to pay our national debt, in strict compliance with our contracts, whether it was made payable in gold or greenbacks, but we are unwilling to do more than that; and we declare that the five-twenty bonds are payable in greenbacks, or their equivalent; and we condemn the policy of the Administration which is squandering millions of money by buying such bonds at a high rate of premium, when the Government has the clear right to redeem them at par.

"That we denounce the action of our last Legislature in attempting to force upon the people the proposed fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as in palpable violation of our State Constitution, and we solemnly protest against Indiana being counted for said amendment; and we hereby declare our unalterable opposition to its ratification.

"That any attempt to regulate the moral ideas, appetites, or innocent amusements of the people by legislation is unwise and despotic."

Other planks declared in favor of a tariff for revenue only and the equal adjustment of the burdens of taxation; for the abolition of national banks and the substitution of greenbacks as a circulating medium; for a larger volume of currency; for the taxation of national bank stocks for municipal and school purposes; for the taxation of United States bonds for national purposes, and against any change in the naturalization laws of the United States, whereby admission to citizenship will be made more difficult or expensive.

The names of the Republican nominees for the various State offices will be found in the tabular election returns.

The campaign of 1870 was not an overly exciting one. For quite a while but little stir was made in the domain of politics. By and by demands were made upon the State Central Committee that some life be injected into affairs political. At a meeting of the Democratic State Committee a resolution was unanimously adopted that the speaking campaign be conducted by Thomas A. Hendricks, Joseph E. McDonald, Thomas Dowling and John B. Stoll. A long list of appointments was arranged for the latter. His engagements dated to October 1, closing in the southwestern part of the State. Experiencing an intense longing to reach his home at Ligonier, in the extreme northern part of the State, strangely and unaccountably depressed mentally and unable to become interested in anything brought to his attention, a messenger sent to meet him at the train upon its arrival at Laporte, in quivering voice conveyed the crushing information: "Your boy died this afternoon." "Your boy" meant the dearly beloved, exceptionally bright and then only son of him to whom this heart-piercing message of woe was communicated. All attempts at telegraphic information of the boy's illness had miscarried. A malignant attack of diphtheria prostrated the four-year-old lad. Anti-toxin was then unknown to medical science; despite all efforts to save this precious life, the spirit of John B. Stoll, Jr., fled on the afternoon of October 3, 1870. Only those who have had somewhat similar experiences can form any conception of the anguish incident to the infliction of such a staggering blow. Tender messages of condolence came from friends in all parts of the State. A singularly sympathetic letter from Thomas A. Hendricks, touchingly reciting the bereavement that befell himself and Mrs. Hendricks in the loss of their only child during the early period of their married life, revealed in that great, good, lovable statesman a gentleness of nature, a nobility of soul, that in a measure accounted for the wonderful hold he had upon the affection of those who knew him best and never tired of doing him honor.

In a conversation with A. H. Conner, chairman of the Republican State Committee, the question as to which party would carry the State at the October election, the laconic reply was made that if the crops turned out favorably and bountifully, the Republican ticket would doubtless be elected. If crop conditions should chance to be unfavorable, Democratic success might safely be foreshadowed. Chairman Conner doubtless became convinced later on by an analysis of the situation that his prognostication was not altogether well founded.

During the progress of the campaign emphasis was given to the sentiment that gross injustice was being done the taxpayers of the State in this, that interest on the school fund was made a part of the emoluments of the State Auditor, instead of being covered into the State treasury for the benefit of the school system. No law seems to have been enacted specifically providing for such application, but the people were told that if placed in power, the Democratic party would see to it that justice was done by the enactment of appropriate legislation to make school fund interest part of the school revenue instead of swelling the emoluments of the State Auditor. While the Democrats did not gain control of the legislative department, they did elect their State ticket. Auditor Shoemaker saw fit to continue the policy of his predecessors, and it was for this reason that he was defeated for re-nomination in 1872 by the same person who was his chief but unsuccessful competitor two years before. Mr. Stoll had repeatedly declared that he would not be a candidate against Mr. Shoemaker if the latter as Auditor would cover the school fund interest into the State treasury. Mr. Shoemaker declined to do this. Influential Democrats throughout the State—among them such men as "Blue Jeans" Williams, General James R. Slack, General Levi Sparks, General Reuben C. Kise, Judge J. A. S. Mitchell, Judge David S. Gooding, Colonel A. T. Whittlesey, Judge Daniel Noyes, Colonel Thomas Dowling, John B. Ruger, Judge Sol. Claypool, Martin M. Ray, and hundreds of others—insisted that the party could not afford to go before the public with Mr. Shoemaker as the nominee. They conceded that ordinarily Mr. Shoemaker was entitled to a renomination under the two-term usage, but since he had chosen to claim the school fund interest for himself he must suffer the penalty of being set aside. A few years later, largely through the efforts of James D. Williams, elected Governor in 1876, a bill was passed by the Legislature requiring the school fund interest to be turned over where it properly belonged. Considerable effort was required to effect this legislation, but public sentiment had become so pronounced on the subject that the taxpaying public's influence proved more formidable than the suavity of the State Auditor and the intercession of his interested friends.

The Democrats were peculiarly fortunate in their selection of Colonel Norman Eddy to head the ticket for Secretary of State. He was a man of high character and superior ability. His war record was excellent. As a member of Congress he stood deservedly high. President Johnson appointed him collector of internal revenue. Colonel Eddy's death before the expiration of his term as Secretary of State created profound sorrow throughout the State.

In the election of members of Congress the Democrats fared far better than they did in preceding elections. William E. Niblack, Michael C. Kerr, Wm. S. Holman and Daniel W. Voorhees were re-elected by decisive majorities. They were reinforced by General Mahlon D. Manson, who came with flying colors out of the contest in the Crawfordsville district. It was a great victory for the gallant veteran and caused genuine elation throughout the State. The Republicans re-elected General John Coburn, James N. Tyner, John Peter Cleaver Shanks, Major William Williams and General Jasper Packard, and substituted Jeremiah M. Wilson for George W. Julian. Wilson "enjoyed" the distinction of having slipped into Congress by a majority of four. Judge David Sanders Gooding gave him a close chase. The friends of George W. Julian found it difficult to become reconciled to his forced retirement.

LIBERAL REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT IN 1872

DISSATISFIED REPUBLICANS AND DEMOCRATS FORM A FORMIDABLE COMBINATION

DURING the civil war Clement L. Vallandigham of Dayton, Ohio, attained national prominence by his outspoken opposition to the war policies of the Lincoln administration. He had been a member of Congress from the Dayton district, and on account of some of his radical utterances in public speeches was exiled to Canada. During this exile his ardent friends and supporters insisted on his making the race for Governor. He was nominated and a vigorous campaign was conducted in his behalf. War Democrats and Republicans united on John Brough, a life-long Democrat, and elected him by something more than 101,000 majority. After the war Mr. Vallandigham modified his views to such an extent that in 1868 he looked with favor upon the proposition to make Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury under Lincoln, the Democratic nominee for the Presidency. He progressed so rapidly in his political modernism that on the 20th of May, 1871, he sprang what became famous as the "New Departure" at the convention of the Montgomery county Democracy, held in the city of Dayton. This "New Departure" meant the acceptance without further opposition of the several amendments to the Federal Constitution and the measures incident to the prosecution of the war. It was his contention that a recession therefrom could not be hoped for until the passions engendered by the rebellion had subsided and after the people's attention had been diverted in other directions. The fallaciousness of this expectation has since become apparent, but Mr. Vallandigham supported his theory with such earnestness that he not only succeeded in having his program approved by his home county, but formally endorsed by the Democratic State convention at Columbus, June 1, 1871. Vigorous opposition was put forth by Congressman Frank H. Hurd and others, but Vallandigham carried the convention with him by the decisive vote of 365 yeas to 129 nays. This was followed by the nomination of two distinguished Union soldiers for Governor and Lieutenant-Governor—the famous General George W. McCook and General Samuel F. Hunt. Another staunch supporter of the Union cause was nominated for Supreme Judge in the person of George W. Geddes. There was no half-way course for Vallandigham. His "New Departure" was such not only in name but in fact. And there isn't the slightest doubt about the man's sincerity. A new light unfolded itself to his vision and it served as his guidance to the end of his earthly career, so tragically terminated while engaged in an important law suit by the accidental discharge of a revolver in his own hand. He was a very able man, and men of rare ability at times take queer turns in political as well as in other affairs. Vallandigham was not alone among Ohio's distinguished politicians to change front suddenly.

A conspicuous example was that of George H. Pendleton's flop from hard money to greenbackism. As a member of Congress during the early period of the war he vigorously opposed the issue of greenbacks as legal tender currency. In assuming this attitude he had the distinguished fellowship of Roscoe Conkling of New York. In 1868 the same George H. Pendleton became a candidate for the presidential nomination as a distinctive champion of the proposition to pay off with greenbacks all the obligations of the United States not specifically provided to be paid in coin.

The first movement in the direction of organized opposition to the re-election of General Grant to the presidency was originated in Missouri in 1870 under the leadership of Senator Carl Schurz, aided by others of considerable prominence in the Republican party. A ticket headed by B. Gratz Brown for Governor was placed in nomination and triumphantly elected in the fall. In response to the Missouri movement the Democracy of Ohio came to the front with the "New Departure" in 1871, and at the State convention held in Cleveland, June 27, 1872, acquiesced in the program set forth at a mass meeting held in Cincinnati May 1st of the same year by the Liberal Republicans. The new movement had by this time gained large accessions and gave high promise of proving a success. So many Republicans of prominence had enlisted in it that it assumed the character of a political revolution. Carl Schurz, Horace Greeley, Reuben E. Fenton, Governor Andrew G. Curtin, Governor Austin Blair, Lyman Trumbull, James R. Doolittle, George W. Julian, B. Gratz Brown, Salmon P. Chase, John D. Defrees, Stanley Matthews, Col. A. K. McClure and hundreds of others of almost equal prominence and distinction had identified themselves with the new organization and gave it their earnest and enthusiastic support. Abuses had sprung up under the Grant administration that afforded ample ground and justification for revolt. The whisky frauds in the West and other transgressions had become national scandals. While Grant's personal integrity was not questioned, thousands of those who had voted for him in 1868 expressed emphatic refusal to do so again. His administration was adjudged a stupendous failure and a grievous disappointment. Its defeat was confidently expected and as confidently predicted until the election in North Carolina in the month of August suddenly put a damper on the hopes and expectations of the leaders of the new party.

The nomination of Horace Greeley for the Presidency had a depressing effect on the real leader of the Liberal Republican movement, Senator Carl Schurz. Not that he in any sense disliked or distrusted Greeley, but that he had serious doubts as to his being a real representative of the spirit that caused this upheaval. The convention that nominated Greeley and Brown was held in Cincinnati. Senator Schurz was the guest of his friend and admirer, Judge John B. Stallo, one of Cincinnati's most highly esteemed citizens. Upon Greeley's nomination by the close vote of 332 to 324 for Charles Francis Adams, Senator Schurz repaired to the Stallo mansion. Seating himself at the grand piano, Schurz, an accomplished manipulator of the ivory keys, rendered from "The Bohemian Girl" the melancholy strains of "The Heart Bowed Down." More pathetically than spoken words these plaintive strains revealed the mournful feelings of the chagrined and sorely disappointed chairman of the first and last national convention of the newly-born Liberal Republican party.

Schurz's heart had been set on the nomination of the scholarly but austere Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts. The delegates who inclined to the idealistic in politics heartily seconded Senator Schurz's efforts to secure Mr. Adams's nomination. The "practical politicians" and political manipulators strangely cooperated with General Frank P. Blair of Missouri, in a carefully-planned movement to make the ticket consist of Horace Greeley and B. Gratz Brown. The men who had most accurately sized up the situation in the country at large had fully satisfied themselves that the proper, the wise, thing to do was to nominate Judge David Davis, of Illinois, Lincoln's executor and devoted friend. Davis had already been nominated by a sort of Labor Convention, with Governor Joel Parker of New Jersey as his running mate. It was an excellent combination. Both were men of unblemished character and the business element had entire confidence in them. Had this ticket been accepted by the Cincinnati convention and subsequently approved by the Baltimore convention, there is but little doubt that it would have been triumphantly elected. The country was genuinely tired of the manner in which affairs were being conducted by the Grant administration, but it was not prepared or inclined to place in the presidential chair a brainy man eminently qualified to edit a great newspaper but temperamentally and otherwise manifestly unfitted to run the governmental machinery of a great industrial country like ours. There never could be any question as to Greeley's honesty and integrity, nor the excellence and purity of his intentions and purposes. But his nearest and dearest friends could not divest themselves of apprehension that his occupancy of the presidential office would have resulted in humiliation to himself and chagrin to his friends. Great in some things, Grant was a dismal failure in these respects, but he had elements of strength that were conspicuously wanting in America's foremost journalist—the revered sage of Chappaqua.

The Democracy of Indiana bore a conspicuous part in the final acceptance of the Greeley and Brown Liberal Republican ticket. Up to the time that Indiana formally declared itself there was lingering in the Democratic mind considerable doubt as to the advisability of forming a coalition with the Liberal Republicans. There were many who believed that a presidential ticket headed by Thomas A.

Hendricks could and would be elected. With a view to simplifying matters the State Central Committee was convened at Indianapolis, January 9, 1872, to discuss the situation and agree upon some plan of action. Representative Democrats from all parts of the State were invited to attend this meeting and give the committee the benefit of their views. Among those who responded to this invitation were S. W. Holmes, J. B. Edmunds, Joseph E. McDonald, John S. Williams, W. S. Shirely, Colonel Taylor, Wm. Mack, Bayless W. Hanna, Daniel W. Voorhees, Thomas A. Hendricks and Captain John Kirk. In their talks these gentlemen referred with marked satisfaction to the prevailing spirit of harmony and unity of purpose. The sentiment expressed was unequivocally in favor of maintaining the organization and nominating a presidential candidate who had the confidence of the party and whose fitness would be so evident that he could command the respect of political opponents and the support of all who desired the restoration of honesty and purity in the administration of the Government. The proposal of the State Central Committee that the State convention be postponed until June met with general favor and final approval.

The convention met at Indianapolis, June 12, after both the Liberal and the regular Republican presidential conventions had been held. Sixteen hundred delegates and a goodly number of speculators were in attendance. State Chairman Elijah S. Alvord called the convention to order. John R. Coffroth was chosen permanent chairman. By far the most important business for the transaction of which the convention had been called was practically though not formally disposed of the night before. Up to the last moment Mr. Hendricks had withheld his consent to make another race for the Governorship. He had already made two such races and gave it as his opinion that he had fully discharged his duty in that particular. Mrs. Hendricks was very much averse to her distinguished husband making a third race for that office. It was an open secret that she expected Mr. Hendricks to be nominated for the Presidency. When it had been made apparent that Indiana was inseparably linked with the Greeley movement Mrs. Hendricks finally relented. A decided majority of the district caucuses held the night before the convention settled the party's attitude as to the Presidential nomination. In the event that Mr. Hendricks had been entered in the Presidential race it is altogether probable that Washington C. DePauw, of New Albany, would have been made the nominee for Governor. There was a very pronounced sentiment in his favor. This was made manifest by the enthusiastic manner in which he was named for second place on the ticket. The fight over the auditorship was kept up nearly all night. Strong efforts were made to induce Mr. Stoll to accept a place on the ticket either for Secretary of State or Congressman-at-large, so that Mr. Shoemaker might be renominated with the other gentlemen chosen in 1870. The feeling had, however, grown so intense that an adjustment had ceased to be within the range of possibilities. The ballot resulted in 817 votes being cast for John B. Stoll and 773 for John C. Shoemaker. The ticket in its entirety was composed of the following named gentlemen:

Governor—Thomas A. Hendricks, Indianapolis.
 Lieutenant-Governor—Washington C. DePauw, New Albany.

Congressmen for the State at Large—Col. John S. Williams of Lafayette and Michael C. Kerr of New Albany.

Secretary of State—O. M. Eddy, South Bend.
 State Auditor—John B. Stoll, Ligonier.

State Treasurer—James B. Ryan, Indianapolis.
 Superintendent Public Instruction—Milton B. Hopkins, Kokomo.

Attorney-General—B. W. Hanna, Terre Haute.
 Clerk Supreme Court—Edward Price, Sullivan.
 Reporter Supreme Court—John C. Robinson, Spencer.

Mr. DePauw declined the nomination for Lieutenant-Governor. The State Committee selected John R. Cravens, a Liberal Republican, of Madison, and a gentleman of high character, to fill the vacancy.

Daniel W. Voorhees was intensely hostile to the adoption by the Democrats of the Greeley nomination. It was feared that if he could not be restrained from addressing the convention a row could not have been averted. But the "Tall Sycamore" finally permitted himself to be placated to forego a forensic onslaught on the amalgamation scheme. He predicted, however, that nothing but disastrous defeat could and would result from this unnatural alliance. And so it turned out when in the melancholy days of November the popular verdict was rendered. After the adoption of the report of the committee on resolutions the Presidential question virtually was settled. Joseph E. McDonald, H. W. Harrington, and Judge Robert Lowry were the principal spokesmen for the Greeley cause in the convention proper.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

The electoral ticket was made up one-half of Democrats and one-half Liberal Republicans:

For the State at Large—George W. Julian, John R. Coffroth, Cyrus M. Allen and James Gavin.

B. Gratz Brown was nominated for Vice-President by an almost unanimous vote.

A so-called straight-out Democratic ticket was subsequently nominated, composed of Charles O'Connor, of New York, for President and John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, for Vice-President. The ticket was made up of two eminent men, but it cut very little figure in the campaign or at the election. The State ticket, however, served its purpose in Indiana by way of diverting just about enough votes from the regular Democratic nominees to insure the election of most of the Republican candidates. The so-called straight-out Democratic ticket polled altogether from 131 to 221 votes in the entire State. The result of the October election was so close that the exact outcome as to Secretary and Auditor of State was not finally settled until a week after the election.

It will be noticed that James B. Ryan made his fourth race for State Treasurer in this campaign. He was first nominated in 1866, then in 1868, 1870, 1872. Three of his races were unsuccessful; the one made in 1870 was crowned with success. Mr. Ryan was one of the cleverest of men in the State. Everybody who knew him liked Jim Ryan. He was an honored resident of Indianapolis and engaged in the wholesale liquor business, which in those days was not under the ban as it is today.

THE MERGER COMPLETED.

After Indiana's Democracy had declared in convention that Greeley and Brown should also be made the nominees of the National Democracy, all doubt vanished as to the outcome of the Baltimore convention, fixed to be held July 9. Senator James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, was made permanent chairman. The platform adopted at Cincinnati by the Liberal Republicans was accepted without change, alteration or modification, although Senator Thomas Francis Bayard, of Delaware, opposed it vigorously. The vote stood 670 for, 62 against its adoption. The vote for Presidential candidates was: Horace Greeley, 686; Jeremiah S. Black, Pennsylvania, 21; Thomas Francis Bayard, Delaware, 16; William S. Groesbeck, Ohio, 2; blank, 7.

LIBERAL REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL PLATFORM, 1872.

"We, the Democratic electors of the United States, in convention assembled, do present the following principles, already adopted at Cincinnati (by the Liberal Republicans), as essential to just government.

"We, the Liberal Republicans.....proclaim the following principles as essential to just government..... The equality of all men before the law..... The union of the States, emancipation and enfranchisement, and to oppose any re-opening of the questions settled by the 13th, 14th, and 15th Amendments..... The immediate and absolute removal of all disabilities imposed on account of the Rebellion..... Local self-government, with impartial suffrage, will guard the rights of all citizens more securely than any centralized power..... The supremacy of the civil power..... The civil service... a mere instrument of partisan tyranny... is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions..... No President shall be a candidate for re-election..... A system of Federal taxation which shall not unnecessarily interfere with the industry of the people..... We denounce repudiation in every form and guise..... Speedy return to specie payment is demanded... We remember with gratitude the heroism and sacrifices of the soldiers and sailors... We are opposed to all further grants of lands to railroads or other corporations... It is the duty of the Government, in its intercourse with foreign nations, to cultivate the friendships of peace...."

In the election of members of Congress the Democrats fared badly. Thirteen representatives were chosen, two of them by the State at large. These were Godlove S. Orth, of LaFayette, and William Williams, of Warsaw. The three Democrats chosen were William E. Niblack, Simeon K. Wolf, and William S. Holman, respectively, from the first, second and third districts. The re-elected Republicans were Jeremiah M. Wilson, John Coburn, James N. Tyner, John Peter Cleaver Shanks, and Jasper Packard. Morton C. Hunter defeated Daniel W. Voorhees in the Terre Haute district and Thomas J. Cason "got away" with General Mahlon D. Manson in the Crawfordsville district. Huntington county having been gerrymandered into the tenth district, Henry B. Saylor, a Huntington lawyer and glib stump speaker, was nominated and elected by the Republicans. The next Legislature took Huntington out of the tenth, and Saylor was put off with a single term. Later on he was made a circuit judge, serving a number of years.

It will be observed by scanning the foregoing tabular statement that of the candidates on the Democratic ticket Mr. Hendricks and Mr. Hopkins alone were elected and the remainder defeated by majorities ranging from 184 to 1503. When genial Thomas M. Browne was by the Republicans nominated for Governor he pledged himself in his acceptance speech that he would thenceforth cease to offend his brother by eating meat—that is to say, he would no longer indulge in strong drink. Tom Browne seemingly forgot this promise during the progress of the campaign, so several hundred pronounced temperance Republicans rebuked his transgression on election day by voting for Mr. Hendricks. "Bishop" Hopkins was re-elected partly by the favor of Republican school teachers and partly by being made the beneficiary of the favor of the Christian (Campbellite) church of which he was a conspicuous and deservedly honored elder.

The campaign of 1872 was in several respects one of the most unique in the history of the Republic. For years Horace Greeley lambasted the Democrats as no other journalist ventured or thought of doing. Big-brained and big-hearted as he was, he criticised and denounced them in unmeasured terms when campaigns reached fever heat. He was an ultra protectionist, an uncompromising foe of slavery, a faddist in some particulars, and vehemently opposed to the use of alcoholic liquors as a beverage. At the beginning of the war he blandly told the Southern States that wanted to secede: "Wayward sisters, depart in peace." In some of his vehement anti-slavery outbursts he was not much at variance with those extremists who referred to the Stars and Stripes as a "flaunting lie." Angered at General George B. McClellan's slowness in driving the rebels southward, he greatly annoyed President Lincoln by printing from day to day in his New York Tribune in black type the imperious command, "On to Richmond!" After the collapse of the rebellion he startled and embittered many of his Republican brethren by joining Gerritt Smith, Cornelius Vanderbilt and a number of others in going on Jeff Davis's bail bond, guaranteeing the rebel chieftain's appearance before a proper tribunal when he was to be tried for treason—which, by the way, never happened, for reasons that no one better comprehended than Abraham Lincoln. Naturally these incidents and episodes in the career of the foremost American journalist were used for all there was in them, and more too. Republicans who favored Greeley were not disturbed by any of the attacks made upon the white-coated philosopher by the supporters of Grant. Hence more attention was bestowed upon disaffected Democrats than upon Liberal Republicans. When the Grantites couldn't think of anything else wherewith to excite Democratic indignation they would resort to the rasping taunt: "Of course you'll vote, work and shout for Greeley if for no other reason than that he once upon a time declared that while it doubtless was true that not all Democrats are horse-thieves, it was equally true that all horse-thieves are Democrats." This biting observation was one day made to an ardent Democrat of Irish extraction. Instead of boiling over with rage and indignation the level-headed Irishman complacently replied: "Begorra, we Democrats said some mighty mean things about old Horace. If he said meaner things about us than we said about him, he is welcome to it."

Democrats took delight in reminding Republican newspaper men who were especially severe in belaboring Greeley that they were stung by the sage and philosopher when he referred to his critics as "little creatures whom kind Providence for some inscrutable purpose permits to edit the county printing." That usually put a quietus on the offending county editor.

It stood very much to the credit of the Democrats that taunts and jibes did not swerve them from the path of duty. While Horace Greeley had attained the height of intellectual greatness he was by no means free of human frailty. He had his shortcomings, foibles and frills; he was irascible and on occasion swore like a trooper. But he was as honest and sincere as the days were long. He was pre-eminently a humanitarian. His desire and longing ran unswervingly in the direction of human happiness—not for the favored few but for all really deserving of such beneficence and capable of appreciating the same. Pronounced and ultra in his views on some questions, he was prone to indulge in severity of phraseology. That, of course, gave his writings wider circulation and made him the subject of corresponding criticism.

When the rebellion was crushed and the war ended Greeley wanted peace, fraternity, pacification and restoration. He was too big a man, too large-hearted to countenance petty tyranny or the infliction of widespread punishment upon those who for one reason or another joined in ill-advised rebellion against the authority of the Government. Eager that the wounds inflicted by four years of carnage be healed as speedily as possible, Mr. Greeley went to Richmond, Va., to stand good for Jeff Davis's appearance to answer to the charge of high treason. The popular interpretation of this generous and patriotic action on the part of Mr. Greeley was that he went to Richmond to release from imprisonment and set free the fallen chief of the collapsed Southern Confederacy. The fact that Gerritt Smith, a life-long champion of the anti-slavery cause, was associated with Mr. Greeley and others in this pacificatory mission was conveniently ignored and all the censure heaped upon the head of the famous Tribune editor. The Union League Club of New York, of which Mr. Greeley was a prominent member, took it upon itself to cite that gentleman to appear before it and explain and defend his signing of the Jeff Davis bail bond. In a letter such as Horace Greeley alone could write he flatly refused to put in the requested appearance and so blistered the officials of the club with his scathing denunciation of their narrowness of vision that on the heels of the receipt of the Greeley philippic a resolution was introduced and adopted that there had been nothing "in the action of Horace Greeley, relative to the bailing of Jefferson Davis, calling for proceedings in this club." The latter part of Mr. Greeley's reply to the Union League Club's ill-advised summons is such a vigorous assertion of manly independence and such a stinging rebuke to organized affrontery and arrogance that it richly merits a place in the pages of this work. It is therefore herewith reproduced for thoughtful perusal:

"Gentlemen, I shall not attend your meeting this evening. I have an engagement out of town, and shall keep it. I do not recognize you as capable of judging, or even fully apprehending me. You evidently regard me as a weak sentimentalist, misled by a maudlin philosophy. I arraign you as narrow-minded blockheads, who would like to be useful to a great and good cause, but don't know how. Your attempt to base a great, enduring party on the hate and wrath necessarily engendered by a bloody civil war, is as though you should plant a colony on an iceberg which had somehow drifted into a tropical ocean. I tell you here, that, out of a life earnestly devoted to the good of human kind, your children will select my going to Richmond and signing that bail-bond as the wisest act, and will feel that it did more for freedom and humanity than all of you were competent to do, though you had lived to the age of Methuselah.

"I ask nothing of you, then, but that you proceed to your end by a direct, frank, manly way. Don't sidle off into a mild resolution of censure, but move the expulsion which you proposed, and which I deserve, if I deserve any reproach whatever. All I care for is, that you make a square, stand-up fight, and record your judgment by yeas and nays. I care not how few vote with me, nor how many vote against me; for I know that the latter will repent it in dust and ashes before three years have passed. Understand, once for all, that I dare you and defy you, and that I propose to fight it out on the line that I have held from the day of Lee's surrender. So long as any man was seeking to overthrow our Government, he was my enemy; from the hour in which he laid down his arms, he was my formerly erring countryman. So long as any is at heart opposed to the national unity, the Federal authority, or to that assertion of the equal rights of all men which has become practically identified with loyalty and nationality, I shall do my best to deprive him of power; but, whenever he ceases to be thus, I demand his restoration to all the privileges of American citizenship. I give you fair notice, that I shall urge the re-enfranchisement of those now proscribed for rebellion so soon as I shall feel confident that this course is consistent with the freedom of the blacks and the unity of the Republic, and that I shall demand a recall of all now in exile only for participating in the Rebellion, whenever the country shall have been so thoroughly pacified that its safety will not thereby be endangered. And so, gentlemen, hoping that you will henceforth comprehend me somewhat better than you have done, I remain, yours,

"HORACE GREELEY.

"New York, May 23, 1867."

It was the patient and earnest study of Mr. Greeley's voluminous editorials on the subject of establishing on a firm basis genuinely amicable relations between North and South that so warmed the Democratic heart in all parts of the Union to the "Sage of Chappauqua," the illustrious Tribune journalist and philosopher. These editorials breathed a spirit of such lofty patriotism, such nobility of thought and purpose, that animosity and vindictive recollection of attack, criticism and virulence in former years were effectually banished, extinguished and obliterated. This is the real solution of the problem how the great Democratic heart became attached to Horace Greeley and why he was so earnestly supported in his candidacy for the Presidency under circumstances that gave so little assurance of success at the final wind-up.

Of the popular vote Grant polled 3,597,070, Greeley 2,834,079, O'Connor 29,408 out of a total of 6,466,165. Indiana gave Grant 186,147, Greeley 163,632, O'Connor 1,417. Mr. Greeley died soon after the election of a broken heart and before the meeting of the electoral college. The minority electors who had been chosen for Greeley and Brown were entirely at sea as to who should receive their votes. As McClure says, "There were many quibbles raised in the joint convention of the two houses in counting and declaring the vote. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, objected to the Georgia votes cast for Greeley because he was dead at the time, and various other technical objections were made," but as the vote was accepted it shows 286 for Grant, 42 for Hendricks, 18 for B. Gratz Brown, 2 for Charles J. Jenkins, and 1 for David Davis. For Vice-President Henry Wilson is credited with 286, B. Gratz Brown with 47; scattering, 19.

CARL SCHURZ'S CAMPAIGN IN INDIANA.

Upon the adjournment of the Democratic State convention in 1872 great confidence was felt in the outcome of the campaign. Politicians of large and varied experience thought that with Greeley at the head of the National ticket and Hendricks at the head of the State ticket Indiana would be carried by at least 25,000 majority. That buoyant feeling prevailed until after the unexpected and unlooked for result of the North Carolina election in the month of August. The sagacious leaders began to realize that they had a job on their hands. Able speakers were brought into the State; genuine activity became apparent at headquarters. Renewed energy was injected into the campaign. The managers were elated over the announcement that Carl Schurz had consented to come into the State and deliver a series of speeches. I first met Senator Schurz at Indianapolis. He made earnest inquiry as to the condition of affairs, the prospects, points of weakness, etc. He was very much put out over the disarranging of his plans at Terre Haute, where he intended to speak in German. Simply because the campaign managers were desirous of hearing him in their own language he was finally induced to speak in English. The meeting was a great success as to attendance and enthusiasm. But Mr. Schurz felt that if he had been permitted to speak in German he could have made at least two votes where he possibly made one. Similar experiences were had in other localities. It was quite natural that those actively enlisted in the cause were eager to listen to Mr. Schurz in the language they could understand. His reputation as a public speaker and philosophical reasoner heightened this eagerness. He was a wonderfully forceful, logical and convincing speaker. It was a rare treat, a genuine pleasure, to listen to him. There was no rant, no demagoguery, no sophistry in his addresses. Loftiness of sentiment and richness of thought permeated his utterances, fairly charming those who closely followed his argumentation. In company with Judge J. A. S. Mitchell, of Goshen, I attended one of the Schurz meetings, at Laporte. It was held in Patton's grove and presided over by one of Greeley's staunchest Republican supporters, Judge John B. Niles, a Quaker and a highly esteemed citizen of the old school. I was at that time part owner and publisher of the Laporte Argus, though a resident of Ligonier. By request of both Liberal Republicans and Democrats I formally invited Judge Niles to officiate as presiding officer of the meeting. He was asked to go to the grove in a conveyance with the committee, but said he preferred to walk and thus be afforded opportunity to formulate mentally some remarks he wanted to make in introducing Senator Schurz. And what a gem the venerable jurist had formulated for the occasion! That it was extraordinary in point of literary and oratorical excellence was the general comment of those best qualified to pass judgment on such matters. Judge Mitchell said he never heard anything quite equal to it. Mr. Schurz told me that in all his campaigning he had nowhere been so happily and felicitously introduced to a popular audience as he was on this occasion. Schurz's speech was a masterpiece. It made a wonderful impression upon the large, intelligent and deeply interested audience. The German element was largely represented. At the close of the address an urgent appeal was made that Mr. Schurz make a few remarks in German. He was reluctant about doing this, having already spoken an hour and a half. I begged of him to gratify these insistent pleaders, and he finally did. The effect was marvelous. Joy united with pride; supreme happiness was depicted upon every Germanic countenance. His well-chosen sentences seemed to reach the innermost recesses of every German soul in that beautiful grove. This incident illustrated more strikingly than words could have done the force of Mr. Schurz's grievance over the Terre Haute affair. I fully comprehended the importance Mr. Schurz attached to addressing people in their native tongue. And what was the effect of this little diversion at Laporte? Well, if one-half of the counties in the State had done as well as Laporte did there would have been no question about Indiana rolling up much more than the conjectured and predicted 25,000 majority.

A few years later I again met Senator Schurz—this time at Goshen, where he delivered a lecture to a delighted audience. It was my good fortune to be with him the greater part of his stay at Goshen. That was during the winter of 1875-6. I was anxious to know how he felt with reference to the next Presidential contest. He was reluctant about committing himself, but said if he had his way he would make the 1876 campaign a centennial affair. Delicately I alluded to Samuel J. Tilden as being worthy of that distinction. To this there was neither assent nor dissent.

I feel that most if not all of the readers of this book will feel deeply interested in the incident hereinafter related. It pertains to an experience in the life of General Schurz that I wouldn't undertake to explain even if I deemed myself competent so to do, which assuredly is not the case. If the statement that follows emanated from any other source I would be reluctant about giving it credence. Coming, as it does, from General Schurz himself, I have not the slightest doubt as to its absolute truthfulness and accuracy.

GENERAL SCHURZ AT THE SEANCE

President Johnson's proclamation concerning the reconstruction of North Carolina so interested General Schurz that he wrote a letter of remonstrance to the President. The latter in reply summoned General Schurz by telegraph to Washington for conference. Impressed with the importance of his mission, but entirely ignorant of President Johnson's plans with regard to the matter, he resolved to respond immediately and left his temporary home at Bethlehem, Pa., on the next day, intending to take the midnight train from Philadelphia for Washington. He stopped for the evening at the home of Dr. Tiedemann of Philadelphia. This gentleman was a friend to whom he was bound by ties of friendship and close association during the revolutionary period of "storm and stress" in Germany. Dr. Tiedemann was the son of a Heidelberg professor. Mrs. Tiedemann was a sister of Colonel Friedrich Hecker, the well-known revolutionist from Germany, who served with distinction as an officer of the Union forces. Dr. Tiedemann and his wife had lost two exceptionally bright and promising sons in the war, and the wife, a woman of superior intellect and good judgment, had through some spiritualistic friends been led to seek communication with her sons in the spirit land. So satisfactory had been this attempt for herself that Dr. Tiedemann, himself a profound thinker and a man well versed in sound world philosophy, began to take a sentimental interest in the seances by which Mrs. Tiedemann was receiving such comforting messages from her departed sons. Dr. Tiedemann had indulgently permitted such seances at his own home, and it happened that arrangements had been made for such a meeting which was to be held on the very night that brought General Schurz as a guest.

The medium on this occasion was a fifteen-year-old daughter of the Tiedemann's, described by General Schurz as an "uncommonly beautiful, intelligent and high-spirited girl of fifteen," who had shown remarkable qualities as a writing medium. On this evening the usual program followed at these seances was carried through with satisfactory results to all concerned, when General Schurz was urged to call for some spirit and receive a message for himself. He called for the spirit of Schiller. After a minute or two of waiting the girl wrote that the spirit of the poet had come and was ready to answer questions. General Schurz replied that for the purpose of identification he would like some quotation from Schiller's works. The girl then wrote in German:

"Ich hoere rauschende Musik. Das Schloss ist
Von Lichtern hell. Wir sind die Froehlichen."

Which, translated, is:

"Gay music strikes my ear. The castle is Aglow with lights. We are the revelers."

All present heard with astonishment, for the words had a familiar ring. It was a characteristic Schiller verse, although no one could identify the lines. Finally it occurred to General Schurz that the quotation must be from Wallenstein's Death. He wondered, doubting whether the young girl could possibly have read these lines. Meanwhile some one brought out a volume of Schiller. The lines were found as quoted. This remarkable experience could not be explained and the young girl told General Schurz at the end of the seance that she had never read a line of "Wallenstein's Tod."

After this strange attempt to communicate with spirits, General Schurz called for the spirit of Abraham Lincoln. The spirit was summoned, and when Mr. Schurz inquired why President Johnson had called him to Washington, the answer came: "He wants you to make an important journey for him." Naturally desirous of knowing where he was to go, General Schurz received the answer: "He will tell you tomorrow." Asking whether he should undertake the journey, he was told: "Yes, do not fail." General Schurz here states positively that he was at this time ignorant of the President's plans, which strangely enough had to do with General Schurz's important journey of observation through the South that was undertaken very shortly after this Washington conference. General Schurz ventured one more question to the spirit of Lincoln, and that was simply whether the latter had anything more to say. Then came the answer: "Yes: You will be a Senator of the United States."

General Schurz, strongly tempted to laugh, asked from what State?

Distinctly came the answer: "From Missouri." This ended the interview, leaving General Schurz much surprised, as he had no political aspirations and no sort of business, professional or residential connection whatever with Missouri. His legal place of residence was in Wisconsin. Two years later a business transaction took him unexpectedly to St. Louis, where he became interested in the Westliche Post.

In January, 1869, he was elected by the Legislature of Missouri as a Senator of the United States to succeed John B. Henderson. He then recalled the seance at the house of Dr. Tiedemann, as did also the friends who had been present when the message came.

In the third volume of his memoirs Carl Schurz relates this episode at aforementioned seance. He makes no comment on the value or reliability of such demonstrations, but submits the account of his own experience as a proof of the existence of occult forces whose power and scope we do not yet understand and never may fathom.

RECUPERATION ENSUED SPEEDILY

THE GRANT AND WILSON VICTORY IN 1872 FOLLOWED BY DEMOCRATIC REVIVAL IN 1874

IF, during the melancholy days of November, in 1872, any one imagined that the disastrous ending of the Greeley campaign meant the utter annihilation of Democratic hopes and expectations, such delusion was easily dispelled two years later.

Grant's triumphant re-election was not at all gratifying to a majority of the American people. It was an accident due to a number of circumstances fully elucidated in preceding pages.

Political reaction soon set in. It was caused partly by the so-called uprising of the farmers against monopoly and partly by the salary grab. The farmers believed themselves grievously wronged, especially by the railroad corporations. The Grange became quite active in the anti-monopoly movement and made its hostility felt effectively in a number of Western States. Wisconsin and Kansas led in this movement.

Popular indignation was aroused by Congress increasing the salary of its members 50 per cent. This was considered an inexcusable and indefensible raid upon the public treasury. Especially odious was the "back-pay" feature of the act. The Republicans being at the time in absolute control, were properly held responsible for helping themselves too freely to the public money.

In Indiana considerable ill feeling was aroused by the Republican Legislature enacting into law the so-called Baxter bill, at which the so-called "liberal element" took high umbrage. The purpose of the Baxter law was to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquor. Under its provisions the applicant for a license to operate a saloon had to present to the Board of County Commissioners a petition signed by a majority of the voters of the locality before being granted a permit. All saloons were required to be closed at 9 o'clock in the evening. This was by some considered an inconvenient early hour. The "liberal element" considered the Baxter law an unwarranted interference with personal liberty. It was fathered by a Wayne county Quaker named Baxter. When passed by both houses of the General Assembly, strong pressure was brought to bear upon Governor Hendricks to veto the bill, but he, emulating a Democratic predecessor, Governor Joseph A. Wright, refused to yield to this pressure and appended his signature thereto. While the "liberal element" did not take kindly to Governor Hendricks' action in the premises, it inflicted punishment upon the Republican party for putting the bill through the legislative department of the commonwealth.

The Greenback movement also made itself felt quite strongly during the early seventies.

The campaign of 1874 did not start out under very auspicious circumstances. March 11 the Democratic State Committee met at Indianapolis. Something had happened that displeased the State Chairman, a most estimable gentleman named Elijah S. Alvord. He tendered his resignation and was succeeded by Joseph E. McDonald. The State convention met July 15 and was called to order by Chairman McDonald. Governor Thomas A. Hendricks was made permanent chairman. He delivered one of his characteristically conciliatory and captivating speeches, in the course of which he gave his reasons for not vetoing the muchly discussed and fiercely assailed

Baxter bill. The main reason assigned was that the Legislature doubtless was clothed with power to regulate the liquor traffic in such manner as to protect society from the evils of intemperance in so far as legislative restriction might accomplish that purpose. In the main Governor Hendricks succeeded in satisfying the majority of his hearers that the course he pursued in this matter was prompted by high purposes, and that inasmuch as it was not contended that the bill was unconstitutional, no real justification was at hand to veto a measure intended to lessen the evils of intemperance and to promote public morals.

STATE TICKET—NEW BLOOD.

There was a sharp contest for several of the State offices, notably for the Auditorship. Young men were very much in evidence. It was that element which brought about the nomination of John Enos Neff, one of the bright young Democrats of central eastern Indiana. The nomination of Colonel Shaw for State Treasurer was an appreciated compliment to the soldier element, and the selection of Horace P. Biddle for Supreme Judge did much to bring into the Democratic fold a goodly number of voters then strongly inclined to detach themselves from the Republican organization. The ticket as nominated was thus constituted:

Secretary of State—John E. Neff, Randolph.
 Auditor—Ebenezer Henderson, Morgan.
 Treasurer—Colonel B. C. Shaw, Marion.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—Prof. James H. Smart, Allen.

Attorney-General—Clarence A. Buskirk, Gibson.

Judge Supreme Court—Horace P. Biddle, Cass.

The campaign of 1874 was not a very lively affair. It took care of itself. Republican disaffection was very much in evidence. The "liberal element" was bent on rebuking the enactment of the Baxter law. The Granger movement shook the faith of many hide-bound Republicans who for years had been voting the party ticket. This combination of circumstances proved very helpful to Democracy. The October election resulted in a sweeping Democratic victory. The vote for Secretary of State stood: Neff, 182,053; W. W. Curry, 164,955. The majorities for the Democratic nominees were: Neff, 17,099; Henderson, 16,059; Shaw, 16,409; Buskirk, 12,796; Smart, 15,944; Biddle, 32,364. All of the Republican two-year State officers elected in 1872 were renominated in convention and defeated at the polls. James F. Wildman had his political wounds healed by subsequently being made postmaster of Indianapolis, and the Rev. W. W. Curry, an exceptionally bright and able man, was given a position in one of the departments at Washington. He is still in office there, though past ninety years. His attendance at the meetings of the Indiana society at the national capital is said to be remarkably regular. In former years Mr. Curry was considered an able and eloquent champion of universalism.

The election of thirteen Congressmen from the reconstructed districts—the number having been increased from eleven to thirteen—brought to the surface some new favorite sons. Among these may be mentioned: Benoni S. Fuller, James D. Williams, Jephtha D. New, Milton S. Robinson, Franklin Landers, William S. Haymond, James L. Evans, Andrew H. Hamilton and John H. Baker. Politically the delegation stood, eight Democrats to five Republicans. The re-elected Congressmen were Michael C. Kerr, William S. Holman, Morton C. Hunter, Thomas J. Cason. In the First district Benoni S. Fuller succeeded William E. Niblack; the Second district sent "Blue Jeans" Williams to Congress; the reconstructed Fourth district named Jephtha D. New, and Judge Holman was gerrymandered into the Fifth district. Upon his nomination to the Governorship in 1876 Williams resigned his seat in Congress and was succeeded by Andrew Humphreys to fill the unexpired term. Michael C. Kerr was made Speaker of the Forty-fourth Congress, but died not many months after his selection for that exalted position. Nathan T. Carr of Bartholomew county was chosen to fill the unexpired term.

JOSEPH E. McDONALD CHOSEN UNITED STATES SENATOR.

In addition to electing all the candidates for the various State offices by decisive majorities and the handsome gains made in the choice of members of Congress, the Democrats obtained a good working majority in the General Assembly. This part of the result made it possible to replace Hon. Daniel D. Pratt with a Democrat in the United States Senate. But for the fact that Daniel W. Voorhees had unfortunately and unwisely voted for the "salary grab" that so strongly aroused popular indignation, the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash" would undoubtedly have been made the recipient of that honor. There were a number of candidates in the race, chief among them being Joseph E. McDonald, Daniel W. Voorhees and William S. Holman. Up to that time my acquaintance with Mr. Voorhees had not ripened into intimacy, but it was quite pleasant. When the contest was on I thought I would take a hand in it by giving my cherished old friend Holman a little boost. Accordingly I went to Indianapolis. At the Bates House was being fought the preliminary battle for the Senatorial prize. I joined the throng. Pretty soon Mr. Voorhees espied me in the crowd. Greeting me very cordially, he inquired what had brought me to Indianapolis. With the utmost frankness and candor I told him that I had come to the State capital to do my part toward defeating his aspirations to the Senatorship. At first he seemed utterly dumfounded over this icy declaration. Quickly recovering from a plainly visible surprise, he said in his inimitable way: "And would you mind telling me upon what ground you are opposing me?" My answer was: "You know very well how wrought up public sentiment is over that unfortunate salary grab episode. To nominate and elect you now to the important office you are seeking would amount to and could easily be construed as a deliberate endorsement of your vote for that ill-advised appropriation of public funds. From a party point of view such a course would be absolutely ruinous. Had you taken the proper course in voting on that ill-timed and questionable proposition no power on earth could have prevented your election to the Senatorship from Indiana. Instead of opposing you, I would be here advocating with all my might your elevation to this high office. It is painful to me to say this to one whom so many of the people idolize as they idolize no other public man in Indiana, but truth is truth, and I believe in looking at things from that point of view." He listened attentively. A saddened expression came upon his superb physiognomy. At last he said: "You may be right." With that he walked away. In a half-hour after this conversation came the announcement from his headquarters that Mr. Voorhees had retired from the Senatorial race and desired his friends to rally to the support of Joseph E. McDonald.

The money question was uppermost in the public mind at that time. Voorhees was a pronounced champion of the greenback cause; McDonald was just as pronounced in favor of sound (hard) money, while Holman was delightfully conservative in his views on the money question. McDonald attested the courage of his convictions by going to Greencastle during the 1874 campaign and delivering to the Putnam county Democracy a forceful and very able argument in opposition to greenbackism and in support of the old-time Democratic doctrine of hard money (gold and silver) being maintained in our monetary system. It was a bitter pill for some of the Greenback Democrats to swallow, but they had to come to it. Voorhees wanted McDonald to step into the Senatorial shoes of Dan Pratt and he did not want Holman to slip into them under any circumstance. McDonald and Voorhees were warm personal and political friends, though differing on the money question. It can hardly be said that there existed ties of imperishable friendship between Holman and Voorhees.

As an indication of the broad-mindedness and big-heartedness of Daniel W. Voorhees it is in order to state in this connection that instead of harboring a spirit of resentment or enmity toward me for my frank avowal of hostility to his Senatorial aspirations in 1875, he ever afterward made me the beneficiary of his most cordial friendship. Whenever and wherever it was within his power to render me a kindness or do me a favor it was done ungrudgingly and unstintedly. He was more than cordial. When opportunity presented itself to render me a service he did it unhesitatingly and unreservedly. These relations were maintained to the end of this great and good man's earthly career. When assailed within the camp he usually availed himself of the columns of my paper to defend himself and his course. On some questions we differed, but such differences never were permitted in the slightest degree to diminish our friendship.

In the legislative caucus for the nomination of a candidate for Senator Mr. McDonald was an easy winner. The Voorhees forces, all or nearly all advocates of the greenback idea, supported him with avidity. The hard money element were, of course, glad to see one of their number chosen to a seat in the Senate. The Holman forces, as usual, lacked organization and cohesiveness. Mr. McDonald became the successor of Daniel D. Pratt; as such he distinguished himself by the development of legislative capabilities that soon marked him as one of the foremost members of that august body. His colleague was Oliver P. Morton. Thus it was that both of the two leading parties of Indiana were represented in the Senate at Washington by two of their ablest and most conspicuous champions. In 1864 they were pitted against one another in the memorable contest for the Governorship. In less than a dozen years afterward they were fellow-members of the highest legislative body in the world. Both were men of distinguished ability; both did their utmost to give force and validity to the ideas that guided their political and legislative activities.

Under date of April 30, 1911, former Congressman John E. Lamb wrote me from Terre Haute in regard to the Senatorial contest of 1875: "Voorhees went out of Congress in 1873, having been beaten in the Greeley campaign of 1872, and he was not a candidate even for the nomination, but had retired to private life. He was dragged into the contest in 1875 by over-zealous friends. I know he was very loath to go into it and never had any heart-burnings because he was beaten."

As a young man, John E. Lamb attracted the attention of Mr. Voorhees and was induced to study law in Voorhees' office. Upon his admission to the bar young Lamb made rapid progress in his chosen profession. In course of time he built up a large and lucrative practice. Professional duties never deterred him from active participation in politics. In 1882 he was elected to Congress from the Terre Haute district. Repeatedly he represented his district or the State in National conventions. He delighted in political contests. No event in his life caused him greater delight than the election of Mr. Voorhees to the Senate. In 1909 he aspired to a seat in the upper branch of Congress, but was defeated by Benjamin F. Shively. Five years later he died, after a lingering illness.

STATE TICKET NOMINATED.

The names of Congressman William S. Holman of Dearborn, and of Congressman Franklin Landers were presented as candidates for Governor. Judge Holman was not at the convention; Landers was. Holman's candidacy was spontaneous. No one in particular was in charge of it; no one seems to have had authority to speak for him. His nomination was urged with vigor and enthusiasm by the Ligonier Banner, and its editor was active and energetic in espousing the cause of the famous "Watchdog of the Treasury." There had been no correspondence on the subject. The editor of the Banner felt assured that Samuel J. Tilden would be the Democratic standard-bearer in the national campaign, and that therefore a man of Judge Holman's fame as a champion of retrenchment and reform ought to head the State ticket. The balloting indicated that the race between Holman and Landers would be close. Just as the last county had been called, Mr. Landers, sitting with the Marion county delegation, arose and asked permission to make a statement. Meanwhile the tabulation was completed. The Holman forces had been accorded especially favorable seating facilities in the convention hall, while the Marion delegation had been assigned to the gallery. Being in close proximity to the secretary's desk, the leaders of the Holman forces were given a tip that Holman had received a majority of all the votes cast and therefore nominated. Request was sent to the secretary not to hand the result of the ballot to the chair, but to await developments.

Apprehension was felt that something was going to happen. Mr. Landers had some difficulty in getting a hearing. Bedlam broke loose when it became known that Landers had something to say about Holman. The yelling was terrific. Landers was shouted at to sit down, but he didn't. High up in the gallery he stood, complacently looking down upon the mad-dened delegates who wanted Holman and not Landers for Governor. It was a critical situation. The Holman men had learned all of a sudden that it was the determination of the Landers following to break up the convention in a row if Holman were made the nominee. Physical exhaustion caused a lull in the yelling. At last Landers was permitted to speak. He said before announcing himself a candidate for Governor he had a conference with Judge Holman, in the course of which he (Landers) went fully over the situation and then said to Holman that if he had any desire or intention to enter the race, he (Landers) would not be a candidate. Landers declared with vehemence and the utmost positiveness that Holman assured him he would not be a candidate; that upon this assurance he (Landers) became an avowed, active candidate for the Gubernatorial nomination. Dramatically he averred that if there was any one in the convention authorized to speak for Judge Holman he wanted that individual to rise in his seat and state just what Judge Holman's attitude was. No one responded to this challenge. Then Landers resumed his speech, saying that in view of what had taken place between himself and Judge Holman there could be no contest between the parties to that compact. Emphasizing his determination not to let the contest proceed he announced his withdrawal from the race. While these vehement utterances came thundering down the gallery, the Holman leaders hurriedly held a conference to determine what course to pursue. The writer of this, upon whom primarily rested responsibility for the Holman movement, said it had become apparent that if the result of the ballot, showing Holman to have a majority of all votes cast and making him the nominee were announced, the convention would undoubtedly break up in a row. "This," he added, "we can't afford to have done, however unpleasant it may be to surrender after having won the battle." There was some objection to the proposition to withdraw Holman's name after he had been nominated, though the result of the ballot was known to only a few. Finally in the interest of peace it was agreed that Holman's name should be withdrawn, and that of "Blue Jeans" Williams, also then a member of Congress, substituted. These announcements restored order as well as harmony in the convention and the nomination of James D. Williams, of Vincennes, was thereupon, on motion of Austin H. Brown, of Indianapolis, made by acclamation amidst vociferous shouting of approval and unrestrained manifestation of relief.

Two names were proposed for Lieutenant-Governor—Isaac P. Gray, of Randolph county, and David Turpie, of Indianapolis. The name of Turpie was immediately withdrawn and Gray nominated by acclamation.

The gentlemen nominated and triumphantly elected in 1874 were honored with renominations by acclamation and the ticket in its entirety consisted of James D. Williams for Governor, Isaac P. Gray for Lieutenant-Governor, John Enos Neff for Secretary of State, Ebenezer Henderson for Auditor, Colonel Benjamin C. Shaw for Treasurer, Clarence A. Buskirk for Attorney-General, James H. Smart for Superintendent of Public Instruction. For Supreme Judges the convention named Samuel H. Buskirk, of Monroe; Alexander C. Downey, of Ohio; John Pettit, of Lafayette, and James L. Worden, of Fort Wayne. At the October election Williams' majority for Governor over General Benjamin Harrison was 5,139. Other majorities were: Gray's, 5,435; Neff's, 6,035; Henderson's, 5,817; Shaw's, 5,801.

By resolution Thomas A. Hendricks was declared to be the choice of the Indiana Democracy for the Presidency of the United States and the delegates to the St. Louis convention were instructed to vote accordingly as a unit.

STATE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1876

"The Democracy of Indiana declare their fidelity to all the provisions of the Federal Constitution, to a perpetual union of the States, to local self-government in every section, to all public trusts and obligations, to the honest payment of the public debt, to the preservation of the public faith, to the maintenance of the free schools, and to the pure and economical administration of the Federal, State and municipal governments. They contemplate with alarm the distress that prevails, the widespread financial ruin that impends over the people and the corruption that pervades the public service, and they charge that these evils are the direct results of the personal government, unwise legislation, vicious financial policy, extravagance, the great contraction of the currency and selfishness of the party and its officials who have so long held unchecked control. Inviting all who believe in and earnestly desire official purity and fidelity, the adjustment of financial questions upon a sound basis, having a regard for the interests and welfare of the whole people, and not a class, and the recognition of a final settlement of all questions submitted to the arbitrament of the sword to unite with them, they declare:

"For the efficiency, correction and purification of the civil service; for retrenchment and economy in the public service; for gold and silver as the true and safe basis for a circulating medium; for the gradual retirement of national bank currency and the substitution of circulating notes issued direct by the Government; for a natural (not forced) return to specie payments; for a legal tender currency and against its proposed retirement; for the repeal of the partisan act to force specie resumption, to the detriment of the debtor class; for the protection and furtherance of our common school system; for a duly safeguarded liquor license system; for the proper care and welfare of the soldiers and sailors who defended the Union; against the payment of any part of the rebel debt, claims for emancipated slaves or destroyed property in the rebel States."

Upon the adjournment of the convention the appointed delegates to the National convention were invited to a conference to make arrangements for the gathering at St. Louis. Senator McDonald, fresh from Washington, gave a detailed statement of prospects, promises, assurances, etc. According to his version the prospects were exceedingly bright for the nomination of Mr. Hendricks. The Senator named State upon State from which he had assurances of support. His statements were exceedingly rosy; so much so that those who did not closely follow the trend of developments in the political arena might well have assumed that the nomination of Mr. Hendricks had become a foregone conclusion. While all the delegates were earnest supporters and staunch friends of Indiana's favorite son, some of them shared the opinion of keen, unbiased observers that indications pointed unerringly to the selection of Mr. Tilden. It was in the air; it appeared to be foreordained; destiny would seem to have so decreed.

TILDEN AND HENDRICKS.

The Presidential convention was held at St. Louis on the 28th of June. It was a gathering of men who had in view the accomplishment of a patriotic purpose—the nomination of a ticket that would commend itself to the patriotism of the nation. The regular New York delegation was composed of perhaps the most accomplished gentlemen that ever attended a national convention. The presence of a contesting delegation, embracing the remnants of the old Tweed ring and the discredited canal ring, only tended to intensify the feeling in favor of Tilden. Tammany was demonstrative but not commanding. In visiting the various State delegations to give reasons why Tilden ought not to be nominated it soon became apparent that the more vindictive the talk against Tilden the stronger sentiment grew in his favor. The famous prize fighter, John Morrissey, was among those who did most effective work by way of counteracting the doings of the Tweed and canal rings. Morrissey was very much in demand wherever Presidential candidates were under discussion. In his blunt yet singularly effective way he started out to say that every mother's son on the ground to fight Tilden had a grievance based on some happening, some injury inflicted by Tilden's unsparing warfare against corruption and thievery. "If I were actuated by personal grievance," he averred, "I would be with them in opposing Tilden's nomination. I have a genuine grievance, a personal and political grievance. He caused me to be fired out of the Saratoga convention, although fully persuaded at the time that I was entitled to a seat. But when I cast about me, and contemplate the havoc that has been wrought in the South by carpet-bag rule; when I take into account the degradation of the public service, and when I contemplate how greatly this country stands in need of a master mind at the head of the Government to correct abuses and bring order out of chaos, I forget all about the personal indignity offered me and determine to roll up my sleeves and do my utmost to place in the White House a man who will do for the country at large what he did when he cleaned out the Tweed ring in the city of New York and the canal ring in the State. For these reasons I am here to contribute my mite to the nomination of Samuel J. Tilden and to counteract the efforts of Tammany and kindred organizations." The oratorical efforts of John Morrissey, the prize fighter, counted for much more than did the combined efforts of the five hundred "braves" who ostentatiously paraded the streets of St. Louis to make a showing against Tilden.

The political wisdom of the managers of the Tilden forces was made manifest by the selection of Henry Watterson as temporary chairman and of General John A. McClernand, of Illinois, for president of the convention. It was furthermore made manifest when John Kelly, the famous Tammany chief, endeavored to tell the convention why that organization was arrayed against Tilden. The convention, overwhelmingly for the Sage of Gramercy, did not want to listen to a tirade against their favorite. For minutes Kelly stood defiantly upon an elevation to be seen and heard. The protests against his being given a hearing were loud and menacing. The more he tried to talk the louder sounded the voices of protest. Finally Senator Francis Kernan, one of Tilden's New York supporters, gained the attention of the chair. In well chosen words the New York Senator said the friends of Mr. Tilden had nothing to fear from anything Mr. Kelly might wish to say. "Accord to him a respectful hearing, and then vote as your judgment may dictate." The request was complied with. The convention listened patiently and attentively, and then deliberately proceeded to render judgment by nominating Tilden with a whoop.

Seven names were submitted for consideration—Governor Samuel J. Tilden, of New York; Governor Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana; General Winfield Scott Hancock, of Pennsylvania; Governor William Allen, of Ohio; Senator Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware; Governor Joel Parker, of New Jersey, and Senator Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio. All of these eminent Democrats were men of high character and all had rendered distinguished service to their country. An informal ballot plainly foreshadowed Mr. Tilden's nomination on a formal ballot. Total number of votes, 744; necessary to a choice, 496. Mr. Tilden received 535 votes, Hendricks 60, Hancock 59, Allen 54, Bayard 11, Parker 18, Thurman 7. Mr. Hendricks was named for the Vice-Presidency by acclamation. Some difficulty was experienced in inducing him to accept. John Kelly and some of his lieutenants stopped off at Indianapolis on their homeward journey to impress upon Mr. Hendricks' mind that he could not afford to turn down a nomination tendered by such a convention as had met in St. Louis. Mr. Kelly had zealously advocated the nomination of Mr. Hendricks for President.

There was a good deal of bitterness among the Ohio delegates. The feud between Governor Allen and Senator Thurman was not easily held in subjection. Some of the Allenites at one time talked of a bolt, but wiser counsels prevailed. Attempts were made to enlist the Indiana delegation in such a movement. Now, while the entire delegation was heartily for Mr. Hendricks, not all the delegates were hostile to Mr. Tilden. When a bolt was suggested some of the Indiana delegates spoke their minds quite freely and emphatically. John H. Winterbotham, of Michigan City, was especially outspoken in expressing his disapproval of the senseless fight that had been made on Mr. Tilden by Indiana men. He said that while he had steadfastly supported Mr. Hendricks he wanted it distinctly understood that he was utterly disgusted at the oratorical "rot" to which he had listened for several days, and that it was high time for some of the Indiana men to show that they were not a pack of numskulls. A goodly number of Indianians heartily applauded Mr. Winterbotham's plain and emphatic talk.

One of the most level-headed Indianians in attendance at the St. Louis convention was William Fleming, of Fort Wayne. For years he had been a leader in Northern Indiana. In his own county, Allen, he was a power. His political wisdom had often helped to adjust difficulties and ward off disaster. It did not take him long to see the handwriting on the wall. Just before the nomination of Tilden was effected he said that there could be no doubt as to Mr. Tilden proving a very formidable candidate before the people, but he feared that the bitter fight waged against him by the Cincinnati Enquirer and nearly the entire Democratic press of Indiana would make it impossible to carry the State. When the writer replied to this by saying that in less than six weeks enthusiasm for Tilden and Hendricks would run so high as to remove all doubt about Indiana going Democratic, Mr. Fleming expressed utter amazement that such expectancy could possibly lurk in any one's mind. Before six weeks had rolled around Mr. Fleming freely admitted that he had ceased to be a doubting Thomas.

The platform adopted by the St. Louis convention was the most comprehensive and specific declaration of political purpose ever promulgated by any party. It set forth in plain terms what Mr. Tilden intended to bring about, purification of the public service and correction of long-existing abuses being the chief object sought to be accomplished. It is generally understood that Mr. Tilden himself wrote the platform. At any rate, such was the understanding at St. Louis. For that reason all suggestions of change or modification were discountenanced. It is too lengthy to be here reproduced; it is so terse in its wording that no mere epitome or synopsis could possibly do it ample justice. Every student of politics ought to make it a point to read and study this platform declaration—and profit by it. Wide circulation was given it during the progress of the campaign. Public speakers utilized it to fullest extent by way of telling the American people what might be expected to be done in the event of Tilden and Hendricks's election.

The campaign was masterfully conducted under Mr. Tilden's personal direction. He sent several experienced campaign managers to Indiana—one from New York and one from Pennsylvania—to aid the Democratic State Committee and to keep him fully advised of the progress of the campaign. His trusted lieutenant, Wm. Dorsheimer, then serving with Mr. Tilden as Lieutenant-Governor of the Empire State, a man of superior ability and high accomplishments as a platform speaker, was sent into Indiana to deliver two speeches—one in Indianapolis, the other at Ligonier. Much surprise was expressed that so small a place as Ligonier should have been selected when larger places were clamoring for a man so close to Mr. Tilden as was Mr. Dorsheimer. The explanation was given that this compliment was bestowed by reason of the fact that the cause of Tilden had been so earnestly and persistently espoused there by Mr. Stoll's paper when in most other localities abuse of Mr. Tilden seemed to be regarded a Democratic duty. Before reaching Ligonier Mr. Dorsheimer had held several conferences in Ohio with Democratic leaders of that State. He had become profoundly impressed with the assurances given him that by devoting some attention to Ohio that State could be carried for Tilden and Hendricks. When urged by the writer to present this aspect of the campaign to Mr. Tilden, Mr. Dorsheimer stated that he had already done so, but had received no encouragement. Mr. Tilden, he said, had mapped out his program and could not be swerved from it. He did not believe in scattering; that New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Indiana had been chosen as the battleground and that the electoral votes of these four Northern States, coupled with those of the South, would answer every purpose. Having received no attention from the Democratic National Committee, Ohio was lost to Tilden by the paltry plurality of 7,506. There isn't the slightest doubt that if Ohio had been given half the attention bestowed upon Indiana, Tilden and Hendricks would have become the beneficiaries of that State's twenty-two votes in the electoral college.

Approximately similar conditions existed in Pennsylvania. Hayes carried that State by less than 18,000. With anything like an effort the Keystone State could easily have been wrested from the Republicans. Hayes himself had neither magnetism nor reputation to render his candidacy attractive or formidable. His nomination was an accident, the result of a plot on the part of Grant, Conkling, Morton and Cameron to prevent the nomination of James G. Blaine, who from the beginning to the close of the Cincinnati convention had a clear majority of the delegates. Tied up by cunningly devised instruction, the votes of Blaine delegates were withheld until plans had been matured to stampede the convention to a nominal candidate, who turned out to be Rutherford B. Hayes.

The result of the election was that Tilden and Hendricks had to their credit on the popular vote 4,284,757; Hayes and Wheeler, 4,033,950; Cooper and Cary, 81,740; Green Clay Smith, 9,522. Of the electors chosen by the people, Tilden and Hendricks had 203; Hayes and Wheeler, 166. After Hayes had acknowledged defeat Zachariah Chandler, W. E. Chandler and other Republican marplots conceived the idea of laying claim to the electors of Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana—nineteen in all—just enough to elect. Immediately they proceeded to carry their plans into execution. By devious methods they manipulated the returning boards of these three States so as to figure out a majority for Hayes, though Tilden was judicially shown to have carried all three by small majorities. The manipulation of the returning boards of these three States had been intrusted to the most cunning political tricksters in the North. To compensate, in a measure, the bona fide citizenship of Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana for the perversion of the Presidential vote of these States, all three under carpet-bag rule, it was arranged to withdraw support from the Governors and their cohorts and "permit" the installation of Democratic administration without interference on the part of Federal authority. So deeply interested were the white people of South Carolina, Florida and Louisiana in being relieved from the carpet-bag incubus that the loss of Presidential electors could be endured more easily than continuance of the corrupt carpet-bag "governments" that had been instituted in these three unfortunate States under the operation of the iniquitous fifteenth amendment conferring upon dense ignorance the right to vote.

The country became greatly excited over this daring attempt to annul the popular verdict and to steal the Presidency of the United States. Fear of civil war finally led to the creation by Congress of what is known as the Electoral Commission.

This commission was made to consist of five Supreme Judges, five Senators and five Representatives. David Davis, of Illinois, was to be one of the Supreme Judges. There is but little doubt that he would have decided in favor of Tilden, for he was a fair-minded man. But before the commission met Davis was elected a United States Senator from Illinois, so he resigned to take his seat in the Senate. Judge Bradley, of New Jersey, was thereupon selected. Bradley had no conscientious scruples about such matters and readily allied himself with the conspirators. The upshot of this treason-like conspiracy against the majesty of the ballot was the seating of Hayes by crediting him with 185 electors and Tilden with 184.

Great as Tilden proved himself as an organizer and leader, he seemed to be unable to come to a definite conclusion as to what attitude should be assumed by the Democrats in Congress with reference to the electoral count. Some friction grew out of this. The leaders in both houses manifested an entire readiness to do whatever Mr. Tilden might have wished to have done. On the other hand it is asserted that Mr. Tilden had indicated that there was but one course to pursue, and that was for the Democratic House to declare the result and throw upon the Republican Senate the responsibility of disregarding such declaration. Be that as it may, the perfidy was consummated. The will of the people was set aside and that of the conspirators made supreme.

Some peculiar incidents are to be coupled with this national tragedy. Colorado was admitted into the Union in 1876. It was Republican territory. Foxily the Republicans "permitted" a former Indiana Democratic politician, Thomas M. Patterson, to be elected as delegate to Congress in 1874, for the special purpose of utilizing his political influence to secure that territory's admission into the Union. As soon as this was done an election was held, a Republican Legislature was chosen, and that body immediately proceeded to elect two Republican United States Senators and three Presidential Electors. One of these Senators, Henry M. Teller, became very active in shaping affairs so as to make certain of Hayes and Wheeler being counted in.

Another peculiar circumstance was this: Senator Roscoe Conkling never took any stock in the claim that Hayes was entitled to the electoral votes of Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana. He permitted the impression to go out that he would not vote with the marplots who had determined to seat Hayes. Kate Chase, an exceedingly attractive leader in Washington society, was known to have a great deal of influence over Conkling. Kate Chase never forgave Samuel J. Tilden for having prevented her father, Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase, from securing the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1868. Several other Republican Senators had indicated a purpose to join Conkling in voting against seating Hayes. When the time came for action, Conkling was conveniently absent, the Republican Senators who had indicated their purpose to follow Conkling were minus their leader, and thereupon concluded to maintain their party standing by voting with the majority. Kate Chase had gotten in her work. She was avenged.

Colonel McClure is authority for the statement that at a certain stage in the proceedings of the Louisiana Returning Board a single word from Tilden would have secured the electoral vote of that State for him.

Don Cameron was Grant's Secretary of War while all this was going on. Cameron was a determined sort of fellow. He let it become distinctly known that a decision in favor of Hayes and Wheeler would be enforced with all the power at his command. This had much to do with creating apprehension in the public mind that civil war might result from the controversy over the electoral count. President Grant would doubtless have concurred in such procedure, although he made but slight concealment of his belief that the eight electoral votes of Louisiana belonged to Tilden, conceding Florida and South Carolina to Hayes.

The enormity of this political crime is thus characterized by A. M. Gibson in the "History of the Great Fraud of 1876-7":

"On Tuesday, November 7, 1876, the people of the United States, by their suffrages, selected for President and Vice-President, Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks, and were deprived of their choice by illegal methods, bolstered by frauds, perjuries and forgeries.

"Sectional prejudices, engendered by years of violent political agitation, and intensified by civil war, the excitement of a fiercely contested Presidential campaign, and vast and widely ramifying financial interests, warped the judgment of many good men and constrained them then to countenance and acquiesce in the acts of politicians bent on self-aggrandizement, intent upon the gratification of their ambition, and determined, at all hazards, to perpetuate their power. Calm reflection, sober reasoning, deliberate consideration in the midst of the wild excitement of that hour, was perhaps more than ought to have been expected.

"What a monstrous crime it was! And what dire disasters and innumerable woes it would inevitably have led to, if the man who represented the cause of liberty and law, justice and right had not been a true patriot, a great statesman, a wise political philosopher! Humanity would have had cause to mourn had not Samuel J. Tilden possessed a well-poised, evenly-balanced, serene mind, and had not those he represented been consistent and stanch friends of law and order. Had he been an aspiring demagogue, a selfishly ambitious politician, instead of a broad-minded, far-seeing leader of men, civil war, in all human probability, could not have been averted. But he possessed that rare quality of looking beyond the present turmoil and divining the evolutions of the public conscience. He reposed implicit confidence in the people. Had his advice been heeded by those who aspired to the leadership of their party in Congress there would have been no resort to an extra constitutional tribunal to decide the electoral dispute. He would have had the House of Representatives plant itself firmly on its constitutional rights and calmly awaited the result. The position would have been impregnable. Desperate as were the men who were seeking to set aside the constitutionally-expressed will of the people, they would not have dared to assume the fearful responsibility of unsettling the foundations of the Government. The timid Democratic leaders in Congress disregarded Mr. Tilden's advice and accepted the arbitrament of a tribunal so constituted as to leave to the determination by chance the deciding vote.

"How dignified, manly and self-respecting was the bearing and conduct of Mr. Tilden during the eventful months intervening between the 7th of November, 1876, and the 4th of March, 1877! Personally it was not a deprivation to lose the Presidency. Predisposed to the life of a student, weary of the strife of the forum, possessing ample fortune, caring not for the pomp and circumstance of official life, Mr. Tilden, at sixty-three years of age, with health enfeebled by unremitting attention to his clients, private and public, and by unselfish labor in the cause of Democratic institutions and good government, would have greatly preferred the unalloyed pleasure of private life, the communion with books, the recreation of travel, and the society of congenial friends, to the vast, the more than herculean labor of 'working out a reform of systems and policies,' and extirpating 'the cancerous growths of false constructions and corrupt practices' during 'years of continuous maladministration, under the demoralizing influence of internecine war, and of bad finance.' He would not have been content with 'gliding through an official routine.' He had 'never accepted official service except for a brief period, for a special service, and only when the occasion seemed to require . . . that sacrifice of private preferences to the public welfare.' For forty years, without thought of an official career, he had 'devoted at least as much thought and effort to the duty of influencing aright the action of the governmental institutions' of his 'country, as to all other objects.' He had acted upon the belief that "there is no instrumentality in human society so potential in its influence upon mankind for good or evil as the governmental machinery for administering justice and for making and executing laws. Not all the eleemosynary institutions of private benevolence to which philanthropists may devote their lives, are so fruitful in benefits as the rescue and preservation of this machinery from the perversions that make it the instrument of conspiracy, fraud and crime against the most sacred rights and interests of the people.' "

CONDEMNED BY INDIANA DEMOCRACY.

In State convention assembled, on the 19th day of June, 1878, the Democrats of Indiana condemned the infamy of 1876-7 in these emphatic terms:

"That we abhor and hold up to public detestation the leaders in the Republican party who secretly connived, and with barefaced effrontery carried out the scheme, by and through venal returning boards, whereby Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks, the people's choice for President and Vice-President, were wrongfully kept out of the positions to which a free people had called them. We hold it up as the monster crime of the age, a crime against free government, a crime against the elective franchise and a crime that can only be condoned when the malefactors who seated a fraud in the Presidential chair are driven from power and consigned to everlasting infamy by the people whom they have outraged. And we denounce the act of the President of the United States in appointing to high and lucrative positions the corrupt members of the returning boards, and condemn the acts of Federal officers in attempting to interfere with the rights and powers of the State courts in the prosecution of these criminals."

Congressman Godlove S. Orth, of Lafayette, was the original nominee of the Republicans for Governor. Soon after his nomination developments at Washington connected Orth with some guano deals in Venezuela that were very annoying to the Republican leaders. Discussion of the affair intensified popular feeling and finally led to Mr. Orth's withdrawal from the ticket. General Benjamin Harrison, who was Orth's chief competitor for the nomination, was induced to accept the tender by the State central committee to fill the vacancy occasioned by Mr. Orth's withdrawal. General Harrison at once entered upon a vigorous campaign and did his utmost to avert defeat at the polls. But the sentiment in favor of the sturdy Vincennes farmer, "Blue Jeans" Williams, was so pronounced that all of General Harrison's eloquence and extraordinary ability as a lawyer proved unavailing. The bull's eye was "sot." Among the common people "Blue Jeans" had a decided preference over "kid gloves."

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

New men were chosen—in the Second District, Thomas R. Cobb, Democrat, in place of James D. Williams, resigned, and Andrew Humphreys, chosen to fill vacancy caused by resignation; in the Third District, Geo. A. Bicknell, Democrat, in lieu of Speaker Michael C. Kerr, who died, and Nathan T. Carr, chosen to fill vacancy; in the Fourth District, Leonidas Sexton, Republican, to succeed Jephtha D. New, Democrat; in the Fifth District, General Thomas M. Browne, Republican, to succeed Wm. S. Holman, Democrat; in the Seventh District, John Hanna, Republican, to succeed Franklin Landers, Democrat; in the Ninth District, Michael D. White, Republican, to succeed Thomas J. Cason, Republican; in the Tenth District, Major William H. Calkins, Republican, to succeed William S. Haymond, Democrat. The Congressmen who succeeded themselves were: Benoni S. Fuller, Democrat, in the First District; Milton S. Robinson, Republican, in the Sixth District; Morton C. Hunter, Republican, in the Eighth District; James L. Evans, Republican, in the Eleventh District; Andrew H. Hamilton, Democrat, in the Twelfth District, and John H. Baker, Republican, in the Thirteenth District. Thus the delegation stood four Democrats to nine Republicans. In view of the fact that the State voted Democratic by over 5,000 at both the October and the November election, this disproportion was chiefly attributable to the advantage enjoyed by the Republicans in gerrymandering the State by the General Assembly of 1873.

DEATH OF SPEAKER KERR AND SENATOR MORTON.

Two distinguished members of Congress, from Indiana, died in 1876 and 1877. Michael C. Kerr, Speaker of the House of Representatives, a native of Pennsylvania, and five times chosen a member of that body, passed away after a lingering illness, August 19, 1876, at Rockbridge Alum Springs, in the State of Virginia, at the age of forty-nine years, five months and four days. He was survived by a devoted wife and an only son. Prior to his distinguished service in Congress he practiced law at New Albany, officiated as city attorney, represented

Floyd county in the General Assembly, and at the age of thirty-five he served the State with marked ability as Reporter of Supreme Court. He was a man of extraordinary intellectuality. His knowledge was varied and luminous. His devotion to principle was inflexible. Expediency seldom swerved him therefrom. For honesty and integrity his record was unsullied. The accumulation of riches gave him no concern. The welfare of his country was uppermost in his mind and uniformly guided his public career.

Senator Oliver P. Morton died after a lingering illness, November 1, 1877. Originally a Democrat, he severed his connection with that party in 1854 on account of the slavery question. Two years later he was made the nominee of the newly formed Republican party for Governor and defeated by Ashbel P. Willard. In 1860 Morton accepted second place on the Republican State ticket and was elected. By a previous understanding Henry S. Lane resigned as Governor, having about the same time been chosen United States Senator. In 1864 Morton was nominated for Governor and in the fall elected over Joseph E. McDonald. In the winter of 1867 Governor Morton was elected United States Senator, to succeed Mr. Lane, who failed to meet popular expectation and had therefore ceased to be a factor in Indiana politics. From 1861 to the end of his earthly career Oliver P. Morton was the undisputed leader of his party in Indiana, though not without enemies within the organization. It is generally understood that it was Morton's influence, silently exerted, that humiliated Schuyler Colfax in 1872 by being denied a renomination, with Grant, to the Vice-Presidency. As a matter of fact, however, it is due to state that Mr. Colfax invited his own defeat by making it known that he did not desire a renomination to that office and that in a quiet way he sought to succeed Grant in 1872 as the Republican nominee for the Presidency. Upon discovering that this could not be accomplished he became an avowed candidate for renomination to the office he then held. Opposition in unexpected quarters rendered such renomination impossible. Thus Colfax's long public career ended when he retired from the vice-presidential chair in 1873, being succeeded by Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts.

Senator Morton was a candidate for the Presidential nomination in 1876, but failed to develop the strength his friends had confidently counted on. The real choice of that convention was James G. Blaine. By the bull-dog tenacity and political cunning of the Grant-Conkling-Cameron forces the defeat of Blaine was accomplished by these factions concentrating their support on Governor Rutherford B. Hayes, whose nomination was accomplished on the seventh ballot.

Senator Morton, intense partisan that he was, may be said to have been quite chary about bestowing compliments on political opponents; yet he felt impelled to speak thus eulogistically in his tribute to the memory of the departed Speaker of the National House of Representatives:

"His name will be remembered with pride and with affection in Indiana. He was one of her most highly favored and gifted sons, and it gives me satisfaction to bear testimony to his patriotism. I believe he was a devout lover of his country, and went for that which he believed was for the best. I have always given him credit for his integrity, for his patriotism and for love of his country, and the strongest testimony which I can bear to the character of Mr. Kerr is to say that he was regarded by men of all parties in Indiana as an honest man, an able man, a patriotic man, and that his death was mourned by all his neighbors and by all who knew him without distinction of party."

Neither Kerr nor Morton accumulated wealth, although both could have done so had they felt thus inclined. Public service had greater attraction for them than the pursuit of riches. Morton had a larger share of the world's goods than Kerr. As a matter of fact the latter lived and died a poor man. With opportunities to make money, possessed by few, he chose to do that which was right, preferring a good name to great riches. When on his death bed he said to his son and only child: "I have nothing to leave you, my son, except my good name. Guard it and your mother's honor, and live as I have lived. Pay all my debts, if my estate will warrant it without leaving your mother penniless. Otherwise pay what you can, and then go to my creditors and tell them the truth, and pledge your honor to wipe out the indebtedness." In 1862, when Mr. Kerr went into politics he had a fine law practice, which his entrance into public life measurably destroyed. At a bar which contained an Otto, a Crawford, a Smith, a Browne, a Howk, a Stotsenburg, and other leading men, he ranked with the best.

Mr. Kerr, unlike a goodly number of other Indiana politicians, emphatically demurred to being a trimmer. He had convictions, strong ones at that, on all questions of public policy. He disdained to trim his sails to catch the popular breeze. What he held to be right he manfully and courageously maintained. Naturally this led to the development of factional hostility. In several campaigns he not only had the common enemy to fight but also members of his own party who were misled into embracing and championing false governmental doctrines. He was accustomed to being elected by large majorities. In 1864 he defeated Rev. W. W. Curry by a majority of 1,793. In 1866 he had pitted against him a strong man like General Walter Q. Gresham, whom he defeated by 1,743 votes. Two years later he beat Gresham a second time, by 6,436 majority. In 1870 he defeated a popular opponent by 5,834 votes. During one of these campaigns Mr. Kerr encountered some opposition within his own party. I was very partial to Mr. Kerr, both on account of his sturdy fidelity to principle and by reason of his superior ability. I learned to admire and honor him because he was so sincere in his convictions and so free of demagogy. So, when he communicated an earnest desire that I come down into his district and deliver some speeches in his behalf I cheerfully responded. The greater part of a week was thus spent. By special request I made the Kerr home my stopping place. And a most delightful home it was. The family consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Kerr and her mother. Amiability, affection and mutuality reigned supreme in that happy household. Sam, the only child, was away at school. Mr. Kerr and myself had separate meetings—that is to say, we did not go to the same places to speak, the conclusion having been reached that each of us should have a monopoly of the speaking in the afternoon or night, as the case might be. But we managed somehow to "turn in" about the same time, usually a little after midnight. Whosoever came in first would await the arrival of the other before retiring. Sitting before the open fire grate, admiring the playful, blue flames as they ascended from and circled around the chunks of soft coal; luxuriating in a fragrant cigar; guardedly quaffing occasional draughts from the seasoned product of the Rhenish vineyards; discussing politics, religion, industry, etc., the hours passed only too swiftly. What a delightful entertainer and conversationalist Michael C. Kerr proved himself during those ever memorable hours! What a pity that a man of his sturdy qualities should have died so young, so short a time after his elevation to the Speakership of the American House of Representatives!

Strange as it may seem, I never met or talked with Senator Oliver P. Morton. I heard him speak once or twice, but never had an introduction to him. And yet he seems to have taken quite an interest in me. After C. L. Vallandigham had promulgated his "new departure" doctrine and its general acceptance by Democrats Morton sent his trusted lieutenant, Captain Hiram Iddings, then pension agent for the State of Indiana, to me with a message that the opportune time had come for a young man like myself to get into the Republican fold. Captain Iddings told me how painstakingly Senator Morton had kept tab on my political activity, how greatly he admired my fighting qualities, etc., etc. It so happened that Captain Iddings and I had been warm friends ever since I had come into the State, and I was very fond of him. Giving close attention to what he communicated in behalf of Senator Morton, I said to him:

"Captain, doubtless you remember the conference into which I was cunningly inveigled by George A. Mitchell in 1868, when twenty-three of the most prominent Republicans of Noble county tried to make me believe that I ought to become editor of the Kendallville Standard, which concern its owner valued at $6,000 and which these twenty-three Republicans volunteered to buy and present to me with their compliments. You also recall the fact that in these overtures was included the promise of a pledge signed by all the leading Republicans of the district that I should be sent to Congress within four years. Doubtless you remember also how disconcerted and amazed those twenty-three prominent Republicans were when in reply I said to them that whenever political affairs of this country so shaped themselves as to make it apparent that the welfare of the Republic demanded the Republican party to be put and kept in power, I would come within the fold without any seductive inducements being held out to me. You remember distinctly, do you not, how chopfallen these men were over my disappointing answer, and yet how, afterward, a number of them expressed their admiration for the steadfastness then and there exhibited? Refusal to accept so alluring an offer was a revelation and an unprecedented surprise to them. Though Vallandigham has accepted the amendments to the constitution as final and binding, I am not going to give approval to any such high-handed abuse of power as resorted to by carpet-baggers in the South and by the fraudulent ratification of the fifteenth amendment, making wholly unprepared voters of thousands upon thousands of ignorant negroes. Say to Senator Morton that I appreciate his partiality for me, but, reiterating and reaffirming what I said at the conference in the back room of the First National Bank of Kendallville in 1868, I must respectfully but firmly decline his generous offer to turn over to me an up-to-date newspaper plant at Fort Wayne with a $4,000 sinecure attachment."

That these overtures must have had the benefit of Senator Morton's earnest consideration was subsequently confirmed by Morton's brother-in-law, Colonel Wm. R. Holloway, when upon meeting me at the State House, years after the Senator had passed away, he told me how grievously disappointed and chagrined Mr. Morton was over the failure to bring me into political fellowship with himself. Smilingly I said in reply that I was too thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Morton's great speech at Richmond, Ind., in 1865 even tacitly to approve what he in that masterly argument had shown to be so pernicious; so destructive in its effect and so menacing to the Republic itself.

A recital in detail of all that was said at the two conferences briefly narrated above would make thrillingly interesting political history. For obvious reasons this is the first time any publicity has ever been given to these episodes in political life, though Captain Iddings himself came near letting the cat out of the bag in 1880. The rank and file of the Republican party in Noble and adjoining counties who during the Sixties had become accustomed to hearing and seeing me unmercifully lambasted on account of politics would have been amazed had they known that their leaders were planning and conniving to place me at the head of the Republican county organ and to send me to Congress.

The ease with which Senator Morton, in the early 70's, succeeded in demonstrating to Jason B. Brown that under the operation of Vallandigham's "New Departure" alluring avenues were afforded to migrate from the barren fields of Democracy into the green pastures of Republicanism, and the celerity with which that fiery Democrat was made territorial secretary of Montana, must have led Indiana's Republican chieftain to believe that transformations of this sort might be effected as easily in the northern part of the State as they were in the southern.

WISE COUNSELOR FOR MANY YEARS.

Colonel Thomas Dowling (1806-1876) was born in Ireland, came to America in 1814, and worked for Gales and Seaton on the National Intelligencer, and while a newspaper man in Washington acquired the friendship of many notable persons of much value to him in later life. He came to Terre Haute in 1832 and established the Wabash Courier, which he sold in 1842. He then became proprietor and editor of the Wabash Express. His papers were very influential in Indiana life. He served eight years in the Legislature, was trustee of the Wabash and Erie Canal from 1850 till his death, a member of the City Council 1867-1871, and County Commissioner in 1873, and also an officer in the Savings Bank from 1869 to 1876.

After the dissolution of the Whig party he identified himself with the Democratic party and continued to act in that line until the time of his death. In State and county politics he was always considered, and his advice had much to do in moulding the course of his party. At the time of his death he was a member of the National Democratic Committee. During quite an extended period he was always a delegate to the Democratic State Convention, a member of the Committee on Resolutions, and generally took with him a complete platform. For the most part these platforms of his in whole or in great part were adopted.

He was a contemporary of Governor Joseph A. Wright, Senator Edward A. Hannegan, D. W. Voorhees, of his own party, and a personal friend though political adversary of John P. Usher, Secretary of the Interior in the cabinet of President Lincoln, and of Colonel R. W. Thompson.

DEMOCRATIC BUOYANCY RETURNS IN 1878

POPULAR INDIGNATION OVER ELECTORAL FRAUD IMPELS DEMOCRATIC LANDSLIDE

WHEN the Indiana Democracy met in State convention at Indianapolis, February 20, 1878, there were few, if any, among the delegates who had any doubt about the outcome of the fall election. The shameful annulment of the popular verdict in the Presidential contest of 1876 by returning board methods proved very unpalatable political pabulum to a good many Republicans who were uneducated to the pernicious doctrine of might making right. Then there came to the surface other matters that had a tendency to cool Republican ardor and abate Republican zeal. The masterful leadership of the Republican forces ceased when the spirit of Oliver P. Morton fled into the unfathomable beyond; the economical administration of the former Governor, James D. Williams, gave unbounded satisfaction, and the Democratic heart throbbed with gratification over the assignment of Daniel W. Voorhees to a seat in the upper branch of Congress as the colleague of Senator McDonald.

When official responsibility imposed upon Governor Williams the duty of temporarily naming a successor to Senator Morton, there was no diversity of opinion among Democrats as to who should be the man. It was on the 12th day of November, 1877, that Voorhees was sworn in as one of Indiana's Senators in the Congress of the United States. This appointment held good until the Legislature of 1879 convened in January. Thus the people were afforded opportunity to pass judgment on Governor Williams's action in selecting, temporarily, a successor to Senator Morton. The judgment rendered at the polls in 1878 was peculiarly gratifying to Senator Voorhees in this, that the aggregate majority for members of the General Assembly who voted for him both for the short and the long term was the largest in the history of the State. His subsequent re-elections, in 1885 and 1891, gave him three full terms and a fraction of Morton's, and afforded him splendid opportunity to apply his master mind to the solution of many problems that presented themselves during the most important years of his eventful official life.

The committee on permanent organization consisted of Colonel A. T. Whittlesey, M. S. Mavity, S. B. Difenderfer, Daniel Blocher, C. E. Bentley, C. S. Burr, James J. Smiley, Eli K. Miller, Leander McClurg, Richard Huncheon, George D. Tate, Benjamin F. Ibach, Dr. G. W. McConnell. For Permanent Chairman it had under consideration Governor Hendricks and Congressman William S. Holman. The friends of the latter gracefully yielded to the naming of Mr. Hendricks for this post of honor.

At promptly 10 o'clock State Chairman Mahlon D. Manson rapped the convention to order. The choice of the committee on permanent organization was unanimously and enthusiastically approved. Upon assuming the gavel, Governor Hendricks delivered one of those inspiring speeches for which he had become justly noted locally as well as nationally. John W. Kern of Kokomo was made secretary of the convention. His thirteen assistants were nearly all newspaper men: H. J. May, J. R. Simpson, Josiah Gwin, John L. Bracken, John M. Higgs, R. F. Stewart, N. E. Alexander, Lycurgus Dalton, Isaac H. Ferris, A. J. Hoover, T. P. Davis, E. A. K. Hackett and D. W. Sweet.

Unusual interest was bestowed upon the selection of members of the Committee on Resolutions. This by reason of the fact that the money question had become one of the most important issues before the country. The committee consisted of these widely-known gentlemen, quite a number of whom had received nominations for Congress: E. R. Hatfield, W. D. Bynum, Jason B. Brown, Charles Korbly, W. S. Holman, Dr. William Glenn, Franklin Landers, George A. Knight, John R. Coffroth, Morgan H. Weir, D. D. Dykeman, Eli W. Brown, John B. Stoll.

STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

1. Thomas Collins, Posey county.
2. H. V. Norvell, Greene.
3. S. B. Voyles, Washington.
4. Alonzo Green Smith, Jennings.
5. John D. Smith, Randolph.
6. William Mitchell, Hancock.
7. Colonel C. C. Matson, Putnam.
8. Wiley E. Dittimore, Owen.
9. John Lee, Montgomery.
10. H. E. Wadsworth, Laporte.
11. H. M. Kidd, Wabash.
12. Harry B. Smith, Blackford.
13. C. A. O. McClellan, DeKalb.

The feeling that a nomination by this convention was equivalent to an election had the effect of bringing into the race an unusual number of aspirants. No less than six contestants for the nomination for Secretary of State were striving for mastery. They were: August Bradley of Floyd, Henry A. Peed of Martin, Will A. Peelle of Randolph, David S. Gooding of Hancock, John R. Cravens of Jefferson and John Gilbert Shanklin of Vanderburg.

Three ballots were required to effect a nomination. The winner in the exciting race proved to be John Gilbert Shanklin, editor of the Evansville Courier, a giant physically, a writer of unusual ability, and an orator of high order. He made a brilliant campaign and contributed no little to the triumph of the party at the October election.

For the office of Auditor of State there was an equally lively contest. Those seeking the nomination were: A. F. Armstrong of Howard, M. D. Manson of Montgomery, L. B. Fullwiler of Miami, John Nester of Warrick, R. D. Slater of Dearborn and J. M. Haskins of Clay.

After the second ballot Mr. Armstrong moved that the old Democratic warhorse, General Mahlon D. Manson, be declared the unanimous choice of the convention. This was responded to with a thunderous "aye," and General Manson was so declared.

Hot as were the contests over the two preceding nominations, they were tame affairs as compared with the fight over the State Treasurership. That was a battle royal. Nine contestants had entered the race. These were the entries: William Fleming of Allen county, W. O. Foley of Decatur, Joseph Henderson of St. Joseph, J. S. Williams of Tippecanoe, Edgar Henderson of Madison, John J. Cooper of Marion, Henry Kramer of Spencer, E. Stephenson of Dubois and Patrick Shannon of Vigo.

In the beginning it seemed to be an even race between Fleming, Cooper and Shannon. The second ballot made it a galloping race between Fleming and Cooper. The third ballot made Fleming the winner by 602½ to 447 for Cooper and 21 scattering. It was a remarkable contest and served as a sharp reminder of the hot fight over the Auditorship in 1872.

Don't imagine, however, that these three contests ended the wild scramble for nominations. Eight lawyers of note and distinction aspired to the office of Attorney-General. The names of most of them were familiar to the people of Indiana. They have a familiar sound even to the present generation: T. W. Woollen of Johnson county, Frank M. Trissal of Marion, Joseph Ristine of Fountain, R. W. Miers of Monroe, J. S. Scobey of Decatur, Hugh D. McMullin of Dearborn, W. R. Harrison of Morgan, W. C. Forrey of Fayette. On the final ballot Thomas W. Woolen was declared winner. His vote was 545; that of his next highest competitor 462; scattering, 25.

An exceedingly interesting race was that over the Superintendency of Public Instruction. James H. Smart of Fort Wayne was a prime favorite, but the fact of Allen county already having been honored by the nomination of Mr. Fleming for Treasurer of State, it was argued that it would be manifestly unjust to let "Allen hog it all." However, this argument failed to impress delegates to any considerable extent, and a tabulation of the final ballot accorded to Mr. Smart the bestowal of a merited renomination. The various candidates for this office were: A. C. Goodwin of Clark county, T. H. Harrison of Boone, James H. Smart of Allen, B. M. Blount of Tipton, William R. Norris of Shelby, W. W. Hibben of Marion and Alex. C. Hopkins of Howard.

THE PLATFORM.

The main planks of the platform of 1878 as unanimously adopted by the convention are herewith reproduced:

"That national bank notes shall be retired, and in lieu thereof there shall be issued by the Government an equal amount of treasury notes with full legal tender quality.

"That we are in favor of making the United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except such obligations only as are by the terms of the original contracts under which they were issued, expressly payable in coin.

"That the right to issue paper money as well as coin is the exclusive prerogative of the Government, and such money should be issued in such amounts as the sound business interests of the country may from time to time require.

"We are in favor of such legislation by Congress as will authorize the taxation by the States of the United States notes in common with all other money.

"That we are in favor of such legislation as shall fix the legal rate of interest at not exceeding 6 per centum per annum.

"We demand the restoration of the silver dollar of 412½ grains to the coin of the country, and with full legal tender quality in the payment of all debts, both public and private; and that the coinage thereof shall be unlimited, and upon the same terms and conditions as may be provided for the coinage of gold.

"The Democratic party is the friend of the common school system, and will in every legitimate way labor for its success, and will oppose any attempt to divert any portion of the common school fund to any sectarian purpose."

LEGISLATURE POLITICALLY MIXED.

The General Assembly of 1879, chosen in 1878, was thus constituted politically: Senate—Democrats, 24; Republicans, 23; Greenbackers, 3. House—Democrats, 50; Republicans, 39; Greenbackers, 11.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

Re-elected to Congress in 1878 were Thomas R. Cobb, Democrat, in the Second district; George A. Bicknell, Democrat, in the Third; Thomas M. Browne, Republican, in the Fifth; William H. Calkins, Republican, in the Tenth; John H. Baker, Republican, in the Thirteenth. New members injected into the delegation were William Heilman, Republican, in the First; Jephtha D. New, Democrat, in the Fourth; Captain William R. Myers, Democrat, in the Sixth; Reverend Dr. Gilbert Delamater, Greenback and Democratic nominee, in the Seventh; Andrew J. Hostetler, Democrat, in the Eighth; Godlove S. Orth, Republican, in the Ninth; Calvin Cowgill, Republican, in the Eleventh; Walpole G. Colerick, Democrat, in the Twelfth. This made the delegation stand: Democrats, 6; Republicans, 6; Greenbacker, 1.

FAILURE TO NOMINATE THE "OLD TICKET"

HAD A DEPRESSING EFFECT ON THE DEMOCRACY THROUGH-OUT THE LAND

FROM the moment the Electoral Commission rendered its partisan decision of eight to seven in favor of seating Hayes and Wheeler in the Presidential and Vice-Presidential chairs an earnest hope developed in Democratic minds and hearts that opportunity might be presented in 1880 to render popular judgment against that iniquitous onslaught on the majesty of the ballot. Everywhere public sentiment demanded that the conspiracy of 1876-7 be subjected to review and rebuke by the highest tribunal—the sovereign voters of the land.

In course of time, however, the unanimity for this opportunity to rebuke the crime of '77 was somewhat diminished by discordant notes. Here and there it was declared that Mr. Tilden ought to have asserted his rights more vigorously and determinedly; that he ought to have dealt more candidly with the leaders in Congress as to what he expected or desired them to do; that he failed to counsel properly with his colleague on the ticket, Mr. Hendricks; that at the supreme moment he proved himself unequal to the emergency; that ill-health and the infirmity of age might prove a serious obstacle to the rigors of an exciting campaign, and that under all the circumstances it might perhaps be better to go before the country with new candidates and present-day issues.

Notwithstanding all this, the overwhelming sentiment of the Democracy continued to insist upon the renomination of the ticket of 1876. State upon State so declared in convention up to 1880, notwithstanding the fact that both Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks had declared that they would not countenance a renomination of themselves to these respective positions.

With a view to settling this matter once for all, the New York World, in the latter part of 1879, sent a commissioner to Indiana to obtain from Mr. Hendricks a definite and final declaration as to his intentions. This envoy, upon reaching Indianapolis, learned that Mr. Hendricks had gone to Fort Wayne to attend an important case pending in the Federal Court. Thereupon the envoy proceeded to Fort Wayne and, making an appointment with Mr. Hendricks, succeeded in getting what he had been sent out for to obtain—a positive declaration. It was stated in influential circles at the time that Mr. Tilden had tacitly but reluctantly consented to make the race over, provided, of course, that Mr. Hendricks would do likewise. No separate action was admissible. It was both or none. Mr. Hendricks declared positively that he would not consent to again going on the ticket for second place. That settled it so far as Mr. Tilden was concerned, and settled it forever. From that time on he dismissed all thought of again entering upon a Presidential race.

In the "Life of Hendricks," by Holcombe and Skinner, on page 343, is to be found this statement:

"As the year 1880 approached public attention was fixed upon Mr. Hendricks. The demand for the old ticket was very strong, and it would unquestionably have been nominated but for two reasons: Mr. Hendricks absolutely declined to accept another nomination for the Vice-Presidency, and Mr. Tilden decided not to let his name go before the convention. The letter of the latter to the delegates at Cincinnati, declining, on the score of ill health, to accept the nomination if tendered to him, made it evident that the old ticket was out of the question."

In the Indianapolis Sentinel of November 22, 1879, was reproduced from the Indianapolis correspondence of the Cincinnati Enquirer this explanation of Mr. Hendricks' attitude:

"Hendricks answered an inquiry in regard to his having denounced Tilden in the following words: . . . 'I have never denounced Mr. Tilden, nor have I censured him, even. I did not attempt to advise Mr. Tilden as to his course after the election in 1876. He decided his course without suggestions from me, and I have no doubt he thought he was doing that which would result the best for the country. As to myself, I have always thought it fortunate for me that I did not fill the Vice-Presidential office. I did not want it, because it would not add to the honors I have had conferred upon me by my countrymen, and in a financial way I think my profession quite as profitable.'"

In an interview published in the Indianapolis Journal of December 1, 1879, Mr. Hendricks is quoted on the first page as saying, among other things:

"My reluctance to accept the second place on the Presidential ticket has never been on account of the men who were mentioned for the first place, but it is because I do not want the place."

Henry Watterson, who was very near to Mr. Tilden up to the close of his earthly career, in a letter dated October 2, 1914, makes this statement:

"In 1880 Mr. Hendricks was himself a candidate for President and would listen to nothing else. From the first he arrayed himself against the renomination of the 'old ticket.' I was not at any time in his confidence; but this is the historic fact."

In a subsequent letter Mr. Watterson makes his statements far more emphatic. He says the antagonism of Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks to Mr. Tilden was very pronounced and that no cordial feelings existed between these persons from the time that Mr. Hendricks failed to secure the Presidential nomination at St. Louis.

William H. English conceived the idea that inasmuch as Mr. Hendricks had made himself an impossibility for the Presidential nomination in 1880 by refusing to give his consent to the renomination of the "old ticket," there would be an opening for some other Indianian to secure the coveted prize. He subscribed liberally for a number of Democratic papers in various parts of the State and for a while enjoyed quite a newspaper boost of his aspirations. When, however, the State convention met in June, short work was made of this boomlet. The delegates to the Cincinnati convention were, as four years before, instructed to vote as a unit in favor of the nomination of Thomas A. Hendricks for President.

STATE CONVENTION, JUNE 9, 1880.

The Democracy of Indiana met in State convention on the 9th day of June. Called to order by State Chairman Benjamin C. Shaw, Hon. Francis T. Hord of Columbus was unanimously selected as temporary chairman. Upon assuming the gavel he delivered a ringing speech, in the course of which he fittingly characterized the electoral fraud of 1876 as the foulest political crime of the century.

Charles A. Munson of Fort Wayne was appointed chief sergeant-at-arms with power to choose assistants.

The committee on permanent organization, headed by Colonel Charles Denby, reported for officers of the convention Governor Thomas A. Hendricks for President and John W. Kern of Kokomo for secretary. The recommendations of the committee were unanimously and enthusiastically approved by the convention, followed with an incisive and inspiring address by Indiana's favorite son.

There was a sharp contest over the nomination for Governor. Six names were presented for consideration: Franklin Landers of Indianapolis, Colonel Isaac P. Gray of Randolph county, Colonel C. C. Matson of Greencastle, Judge Alexander C. Downey of Ohio county, Robert C. Bell of Fort Wayne and William S. Holman of Aurora. The contest from the beginning was between Landers and Gray. But for the fact that the latter had, while a Republican member of the State Senate in 1869, taken a conspicuous part in forcing ratification of the fifteenth amendment, he would undoubtedly have received the nomination over Mr. Landers. As politicians or public speakers there was no comparison between the two men. Landers was awkward; Gray, dexterous. Suavity did not enter into Landers's make-up, but there was no question about his earnestness of purpose, his business qualifications and his understanding of public wants. He was an ardent Greenbacker, but not an impracticable fiatist. Gray was known as adroit a politician as could those days be found in the arena. On the final ballot there was a difference of only about a dozen votes. Then a motion made by Mr. Bell and seconded by Judge Holman to make the nomination of Mr. Landers unanimous prevailed. Landers appeared on the platform and accepted the nomination in a characteristic speech. Then there were loud calls for Gray, but before the gallant Colonel could make his way to the platform Austin H. Brown arose and said: "Before Colonel Gray addresses this convention, I wish to interpose a motion, which is that Isaac P. Gray be declared the unanimous nominee of this convention as Lieutenant-Governor." There were about a half dozen aspirants for the place. One after another seconded the motion, withdrawing from the field and thus effecting Colonel Gray's nomination by acclamation, amidst such cheering as only a popular movement can evoke. The demonstration over Colonel Gray left no doubt as to his popularity with the multitude.

With practical unanimity the remainder of the ticket was made up of the following nominees:

Secretary of State—John G. Shanklin of Evansville.

Auditor—General Mahlon D. Manson of Crawfordsville.

Treasurer—William Fleming of Fort Wayne.

Attorney-General—Thomas W. Woollen of Franklin.

Superintendent of Public Instruction—W. C. Goodwin.

The spirit of the convention was excellent, yet the certainty of victory, so positively asserted two years before, was not at this time foreshadowed by the discerning ones among the delegates.

The platform adopted by the convention was well worded, vigorous in expression and comprehensive in its scope. The main planks read thus:

"We, the Democracy of Indiana, in delegate convention assembled, congratulate the Democracy of the country upon the harmony prevailing within its organization, and upon its unanimity in the purposes to cast behind it every occasion and sentiment of discord, and to stand as one man for success in 1880; and we give assurance to the Democracy of the country that, accepting the declaration of principles and purposes that may be made at Cincinnati, and the candidates who may be there chosen, we will give to them our earnest and undivided support.

"The coin and paper money of the country should be of uniform value, and readily convertible, and should have as great purchasing power as the money of other first-class commercial countries of the world, and the paper money, like the coin, should be furnished by the United States and should not be in excess of such quantity as will be, and remain always, at par with coin.

"Inasmuch as the outstanding treasury notes are no longer necessary to the Government in the use of its credit, and are useful only as money, they should be made subject to taxation, the same as other money.

"We congratulate the people of the State that by the action of the Democrats of the last legislature in basing representation upon population and contiguity of territory only, the shame and taint of fraud have been removed from the apportionment of representation, and that now the people will be equally and fairly represented.

"We hold up to the public detestation the conduct of the leaders in the Republican party in placing Hayes and Wheeler, by criminal practices shocking to every honest sentiment and damaging to our institutions, in offices to which they were not elected. It was an outrage on free government, and a crime against the elective franchise that cannot be forgiven, and must not be repeated, and for which the guilty parties must be driven from power and consigned to infamy. And we hold up to public detestation the conduct of the President in rewarding the guilty parties by conferring upon them high and lucrative offices. To reward crime is itself criminal."

HANCOCK AND ENGLISH.

The Democratic National Convention was held in Cincinnati on the 22nd of June. John W. Stevenson, of Kentucky, was made permanent chairman. Of the Indiana delegates Senator McDonald served as member of the Committee on Permanent Organization; W. E. Niblack on Credentials, and John R. Coffroth on Resolutions.

Massachusetts and New York appeared with contesting delegations. A good deal of bitterness was injected into these factional contentions. Tammany was on hand with a contesting delegation. John Kelly was exceptionally bitter in his denunciation of Tilden and the regular organization. These denunciations led to the conclusion that Tilden might, after all, have been induced to make the race. His letter of final declination was not made public until the second day, and then only after Tammany had emphasized its attitude of hostility, going to the extreme of declaring that it would not support Tilden if nominated. It is significant that in the resolutions denunciatory of the electoral fraud of 1876-7 Mr. Tilden's name only is mentioned, that of his running mate being ignored. All this gives color to the belief, then freely expressed, that had Mr. Hendricks given his consent to the renomination of the old ticket, the convention would undoubtedly have named Tilden and Hendricks.

Two ballots indicated that the convention's choice lay between General Winfield Scott Hancock and Samuel J. Randall, although Thomas F. Bayard, Henry B. Payne, Allen G. Thurman, Stephen J. Field, William R. Morrison and Thomas A. Hendricks had some strength. After a good deal of shifting the final ballot gave Hancock 705, Bayard 2, Hendricks 30, Tilden 1.

Hendricks started out with 50½; on the second ballot dropped to 31, and on the final ballot to 30—that of the Indiana delegation.

The Alabama delegation proposed William H. English of Indiana for Vice-President. Colonel W. F. Vilas of Wisconsin took the platform, and on his motion Mr. English was nominated by acclamation.

The two great nominating speeches delivered at this convention were those of Daniel W. Voorhees in naming Thomas A. Hendricks and of Daniel Dougherty in presenting the name of General Winfield Scott Hancock. Both were pronounced masterpieces of oratory.

Some interesting incidents are connected with the Cincinnati convention. The Indiana delegation, as already stated, had been instructed to vote as a unit for Hendricks for President. Oscar B. Hord, Mr. Hendricks' law partner, was chairman of the delegation. He had an abiding faith that Mr. Hendricks could be nominated, and nothing could shake that faith. It was clearly demonstrated that a majority of the convention was composed of friends of Tilden. This in itself precluded the possibility of Hendricks' nomination for first place. In view of all this, some of the Indiana delegates felt that they ought to be released from the binding force of the instruction. Two of them, Rufus Magee of Logansport and DeFos Skinner of Valparaiso, asked to be so released. This provoked a heated discussion and their request was denied. Senator James B. Beck, John G. Carlisle and a number of other equally prominent delegates served notice on Senator McDonald that they had decided to place him in nomination for the Presidency. To this McDonald replied: "You must not try to do that. But one man can put me in nomination, and that is Governor Hendricks. Without his consent I cannot be a candidate." That consent never was given, although General M. E. Ingalls, president of the "Big Four" railway, spent nearly an entire night with Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks at their residence in Indianapolis to procure such consent. General Ingalls was induced to enter upon this mission after a number of the delegates had been apprised of the situation. As one of the foremost Democrats of Ohio he felt a deep interest in the outcome of the convention. There was a sharp division of sentiment among Ohio Democrats, caused by the entry of two distinguished Buckeye statesmen for the Presidential nomination—Henry B. Payne and Allen G. Thurman.

In a special train General Ingalls sped on to Indianapolis. Eagerly the Indiana and Kentucky delegations awaited his return, some of the delegates staying up all night to hear early what Ingalls had accomplished. At last he returned and submitted his report. It was to the effect that the conference lasted the greater part of the night. Mr. Hendricks was told just how matters stood at Cincinnati; that a strong sentiment in favor of Senator McDonald's nomination had developed, and that McDonald positively forbade the use of his name except upon approval by Mr. Hendricks. At times, General Ingalls reported, Governor Hendricks seemed inclined to yield, but when he wavered Mrs. Hendricks would take part in the discussion. Finally she retired, and as General Ingalls was compelled to return, he got up with Governor Hendricks, who walked with the General to the door. Ingalls again urged Hendricks to yield. He hesitated, finally, bidding Ingalls adieu with the remark, "I will think it over and talk with Mrs. Hendricks in the morning, and if I conclude to do as you suggest, I will telegraph you." On receiving this report, the friends of McDonald quickly reached the conclusion that no telegram would come, and none came. The nomination of General Hancock brought that matter to a finality.

Up to this time the relations between Hendricks and McDonald had been popularly regarded as unquestionably cordial. Assuredly they had been such for at least two decades. What makes the disruption of a life-time friendship between two great men peculiarly lamentable is that the trouble in this instance was not theirs, but that of their wives. Out of this estrangement grew factional disagreements and contests within the party that left deplorable results. At this writing only two or three of the Indiana delegation to the Cincinnati convention of 1880 are living, by far the greater number of them having gone to the grave. There were giants in those days. The great triumvirate—Hendricks, McDonald and Voorhees—were necessary to one another and each wrought ably when they picked up the scattered threads of the Democratic party after the war and knitted them into a compact, militant and victorious party. Two ambitious women destroyed the friendship that had existed between these trusted and honored leaders of men. Though but little publicity was given these affairs at the time, it remains a deplorable fact that there never was brought about any real reconciliation between Hendricks and McDonald. But for the enmity engendered by ambitious women McDonald would have been made a member of Cleveland's first Cabinet. He would have proved an eminently capable Attorney-General. Readers of this volume who may feel interested in knowing something of the inner feelings of these two men are advised to read McDonald's formal tribute to Hendricks when the Grim Reaper had done its work, and then turn to Hendricks's guarded speech placing McDonald in nomination for the Presidency in 1884.

PLANKS IN THE NATIONAL PLATFORM.

The planks in the Cincinnati platform to which especial importance was attached are herewith reproduced in unabbreviated form:

"Opposition to centralizationism and to that dangerous spirit of encroachment which tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever be the form of government, a real despotism. No sumptuary laws; separation of Church and State for the good of each; common schools fostered and protected.

"Home rule; honest money, consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on demand; the strict maintenance of the public faith, State and National; and a tariff for revenue only.

"The right to a free ballot is the right preservative of all rights, and must and shall be maintained in every part of the United States.

"The existing administration is the representative of conspiracy only, and its claim of right to surround the ballot boxes with troops and deputy marshals, to intimidate and obstruct the electors, and the unprecedented use of the veto to maintain its corrupt and despotic power, insult the people and imperil their institutions.

"The grand fraud of 1876-77, by which, upon a false count of the electoral votes of two States, the candidate defeated at the polls was declared to be President, and, for the first time in American history, the will of the people was set aside under a threat of military violence, struck a deadly blow at our system of representative government; the Democratic party, to preserve the country from a civil war, submitted for a time in firm and patriotic faith that the people would punish this crime in 1880; this issue precedes and dwarfs every other; it imposes a more sacred duty upon the people of the Union than ever addressed the conscience of a nation of freemen.

"We execrate the course of this administration in making places in the civil service a reward for political crime, and demand a reform by statute which shall make it forever impossible for the defeated candidate to bribe his way to the seat of a usurper by billeting villains upon the people.

"The resolution of Samuel J. Tilden not again to be a candidate for the exalted place to which he was elected by a majority of his countrymen, and from which he was excluded by the leaders of the Republican party, is received by the Democrats of the United States with sensibility, and they declare their confidence in his wisdom, patriotism, and integrity, unshaken by the assaults of a common enemy, and they further assure him that he is followed into the retirement he has chosen for himself by the sympathy and respect of his fellow-citizens, who regard him as one who, by elevating the standards of public morality, merits the lasting gratitude of his country and his party.

"The Democratic party is the friend of labor and the laboring man, and pledges itself to protect him alike against the voracious and the commune."

THE CAMPAIGN.

General Winfield Scott Hancock was a grand character. Much, very much, could be said in his favor. Popular audiences could easily be brought to a pitch of enthusiasm by dwelling on his admirable qualities as man, citizen, administrator and warrior. In course of time considerable enthusiasm was injected into the campaign. This had the effect of inspiring a goodly number of doubting ones with confidence in the final outcome of the contest. As in former years, Indiana was the real battleground. Its State election in October—the last one, by the way—was depended upon as a trustworthy indicator of what was to be expected in November.

William H. English became chairman of the Democratic State Committee and as such personally managed the 1880 campaign, notwithstanding his nomination to the Vice-Presidency. Mainly with a view to making the campaign exceptionally interesting to Mr. English, the Republicans procured a complete list of the mortgages held by him in Marion county, as recorded in the courthouse. The list of these mortgages covered two pages of a newspaper. It made "mighty interesting reading" for cynics, but was far from edifying to Democrats. Doubtless this publication added somewhat to the depression of the campaign.

Unwisely a series of joint discussions between the rival candidates for Governor, Franklin Landers and Albert G. Porter, was made a conspicuous feature of the campaign. Landers had become considerably elated over the success that attended his campaigning in 1874 for a seat in Congress. He doubtless imagined that he would fare equally well in a joint debate with Mr. Porter. The difference between a school district campaign and a State canvass became apparent to Mr. Landers after he had had a few rounds with his adversary, a skilled debator and a captivating public speaker.

Despite the heroic efforts of Democratic workers, the tide turned in favor of the Republicans. Issues were presented that proved enticing to that class of voters who fondly connect business prosperity with election returns. Inability to center the main issue on the majesty of the ballot was the inevitable result of the failure to renominate the old ticket by the Cincinnati convention. The golden opportunity un-faillingly to win a certain and glorious victory had been foolishly frittered away. The penalty followed with unerring certainty and painful severity. Here is the story of the verdict of the ballot:

STATE AND NATIONAL ELECTION, 1880.

| | |
|-----------------------------------|---------|
| Albert G. Porter, Republican..... | 231,405 |
| Franklin Landers, Democrat..... | 224,452 |
| Richard Gregg, Greenbacker..... | 14,881 |

| | |
|---------------------------------|---------|
| Thomas Hanna, Republican..... | 229,642 |
| Isaac P. Gray, Democrat..... | 224,872 |
| Thomas F. DeBruier, Greenbacker | 16,202 |

The votes cast for other State candidates did not vary largely. Emmanuel R. Hawn defeated John G. Shanklin in the race for Secretary of State by a plurality of 5,134; Edwin H. Wolfe's plurality over General Mahlon D. Manson for Auditor of State was 4,774; that of Roswell S. Hill over William Fleming for State Treasurer was 5,852.

FOR PRESIDENT.

|-----------------------------------|---------|
| James A. Garfield, Republican.... | 232,164 |
| Winfield S. Hancock, Democrat... | 225,522 |
| James B. Weaver, Greenbacker... | 12,986 |

In the General Assembly of 1881 there were in the Senate twenty-four Republicans, twenty-four Democrats, two Greenbackers. In the House, fifty-eight Republicans, forty-one Democrats, one Greenbacker. This preponderance enabled the Republicans to elect their able champion, General Benjamin Harrison, to the United States Senate to succeed Joseph E. McDonald.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

Eight Republicans and five Democrats were elected to Congress. The Democrats thus chosen were Thomas R. Cobb in the Second district, Strother M. Stockslager in the Third, William S. Holman in the Fourth, Cortland C. Matson in the Fifth, Walpole G. Colerick in the Twelfth. Of these Stockslager and Matson were new members.

The Republicans chosen were William Heilman from the First, Thomas M. Browne from the Sixth, Stanton J. Peelle from the Seventh, Robert B. F. Pierce from the Eighth, Godlove S. Orth from the Ninth, Mark L. DeMotte from the Tenth, George W. Steele from the Eleventh, William H. Calkins from the Thirteenth. Peelle, Pierce and Steele were new. Orth died during his term and was succeeded by Charles T. Doxey.

BY THE DEATH OF GOVERNOR WILLIAMS NOVEMBER 20, 1880, ISAAC P. GRAY BECAME ACTING GOVERNOR —SERVED NEARLY TWO MONTHS

THE irony of fate denied to Isaac P. Gray the coveted nomination for Governor and later on a reelection to the office to which he had been chosen in 1876, yet decreed that he serve as Governor for nearly two months. Governor James D. Williams died after a lingering illness, at Indianapolis, November 20, 1880. So excellent had proved his administration, so strongly had he entrenched himself in popular affection, that the announcement of his death caused genuine grief throughout the Commonwealth.

James Douglas Williams was born in Pickaway county, Ohio, January 16, 1808; moved to Indiana and located at what is known as Wheatland, in Knox county, in 1818; engaged in farming; was first elected a member of the Indiana Legislature in 1843, and thereafter served almost continuously for nearly thirty years in one or the other branches of the General Assembly. In 1874 he was elected to Congress. During his term he was nominated and elected Governor. December 1, 1876, he resigned his seat in Congress, thus affording him a few weeks of time within which to prepare for the inauguration in the early part of January.

During the 1876 campaign Daniel W. Voorhees was Mr. Williams's constant companion on the stump. Not being an orator, Mr. Williams modestly confined himself to a brief discussion of State matters. More elaborate discussion of State and National issues was wisely delegated to Mr. Voorhees. The relations between these two men naturally became close and cordial. It is fitting, therefore, that a richly merited tribute to Governor Williams by Senator Voorhees be incorporated into this volume. Upon the unveiling of a monument erected to the memory of Governor Williams at Wheatland, Ind., July 4, 1883, Senator Voorhees reviewed the career of the departed in a manner that will make it possible for the present generation to gain a fair conception of the chief characteristics of the plain farmer who in 1876 was elected Governor over the distinguished and accomplished lawyer, Benjamin Harrison, afterward chosen United States Senator and later on President of the United States. In the course of his eloquent address Senator Voorhees said:

"In looking at the career of Governor Williams and in studying the influences under which his character was developed, a long and most striking retrospective view is presented to the mind. Born in 1808, he came to Knox county in 1818. Here, at the age of ten years, he began his life work on the farm, and here, at the close of more than three-score years and ten, he rests in the soil and in the midst of the people he loved so well. He lived in Indiana and in this county sixty-two years, beholding with intelligent observation the growth and development, step by step, of his own State, and of all the Northwestern States, until from a nominal beginning he witnessed the glory of their civilization and power fill the whole earth. His life embraced almost three-quarters of the present marvelous century, and covered such a period of human progress as the eye of man had not rested on until then, in all the wide and varied annals of human effort.

"His first reading was on grave and serious matters. His youthful mind knew nothing of fiction. His thoughts and life were real. He read the messages of the early Governors — Jennings, Hendricks and others, in which there glowed a fervent love of country and a firm faith in the people.

"The glorious traditions and the high American flavor of the Revolution were also fresh, and everywhere prevalent, and as a boy Governor Williams often listened in silent wonder to men not much past middle life who had been under fire with Washington and in council with Jefferson, Madison and Monroe. It has been said that from lack of education and travel he had a certain narrowness of view in public affairs. On the contrary, Governor Williams was developed and instructed from youth to robust manhood in a school of thought and action which never yet failed to make broader, stronger and more useful men than the Greek lexicon or a tourist's guide-book. He formed his earliest ideas of government and of public duty from the purest and best sources, and there was not a proscriptive, intolerant or narrow sentiment in his nature. His love of country was of the old-fashioned kind, inspired by the spirit of 1776, and it was broad enough to embrace every star of the flag, and every foot of American soil beneath its folds. But there was still another powerful reason why Governor Williams carried into the discharge of his duties a sound judgment and a stanch heart. He lived and died a practical farmer. He knew the laboring people better than any public man Indiana ever produced. He was born in their ranks and remained there to the end. He was at home in the broad and wholesome field, and he was familiar with the wants and ways, the hardships, and the hopes of those who eat their bread in the sweat of their faces.

"From the days of Cincinnatus to the present time, men seeking popular favor have been paraded and eulogized as farmers, who could not tell a field of wheat from a field of oats, but the farmer in whose memory we are here today drove his team and held the plow; planted the corn, attended its growth and gathered it in; sowed his small grain, and reaped his harvests; raised horses, cattle, sheep and hogs, and fed them with his own hands. He made more than two blades of grass to grow where none had grown before, and thus advanced the general welfare. In the pursuit of these labors he became deeply imbued with sympathy for the agricultural classes, and with an earnest desire for their improvement. At an early period of his life he became actively identified with agricultural associations, and for more than thirty years was a controlling member of the Indiana State Fair organization. This tribute, so long continued, and coming as it did from the tillers of the soil, was peculiarly grateful, and I doubt if any political honor was ever as pleasant to him or as highly prized as his prominent connection with the county and State fairs of Indiana. He delighted to interview a herd of blooded cattle as keenly as a reporter delights to interview a string of candidates for the Presidency. His enjoyment over a bunch of fine sheep, or a lot of cultivated hogs, looking comfortable from high living and handsome from high breeding, was very great and very genuine. In his admiration of the horses he had, without reading Bacon, adopted the Baconian philosophy. He looked to utility rather than to style and speed. His pride was in the farmer's horse rather than in the flying courser of the race track. Growing grain, the tall, dark corn, the rich, golden wheat, the clover fields and broad meadow lands were to him a source of un-failing interest and continuous comment.

"While traversing every part of the State a few years ago, and as the bright and beautiful farms seemed to glide by like a painted panorama on exhibition, how often have I heard his exclamations of delight and listened to his comments on the more than magical changes he had witnessed. He had, indeed, in his own day and generation seen the wilderness put off its savage garb and array its waste places in the richest robes of progress, culture and refinement. I have heard him recall the fact that within his recollection not a tree of the primeval forest had been disturbed by the white man's ax where now stands the splendid capital of our State. George Pogue, the first settler of Indianapolis, was massacred by a squad of Shawnee Indians at a point not far from the Governor's Circle, in April, 1821, and Governor Williams, then an intelligent boy thirteen years old, could easily remember the painful excitement as the news traveled from settlement to settlement along the banks of White river and down here to his own home. It is not any wonder, therefore, that he looked with peculiar emotions on the present condition of Indiana, the happy home of two million healthy, prosperous people, her fields yielding more agricultural wealth in proportion to area than any other State in the Union;

her coal, timber, stone and fine clays giving employment at good wages to nearly one hundred thousand laborers, the products of her manufactories reaching the annual value of $200,000,000; and all these elements of wealth and diversified industries in no necessary conflict, but capable, under wise legislation, of being made to promote, foster and encourage each other.

"He also saw the cause of education move forward with a force and rapidity unknown in any other Commonwealth; he beheld the whole face of the State adorned and lit up with commodious free schools, with colleges, seminaries, high schools and universities; he exulted in the fact that rising generations had abundant access to pathways of learning and science, and that there were so few left in Indiana who were unable to read and write their mother tongue.

"In all these stupendous developments Governor Williams, whether in private or public life, always bore an active and honorable part. In 1843, then being thirty-five years of age, he was first elected to the Indiana Legislature as a member of the House, and from that time to the day of his death he was rarely, if ever, out of public employment. During a period of thirty years he was almost continuously elected and re-elected to the Legislature, either as a member of the House or the Senate. Such long and unbroken confidence on the part of those who knew him best is a far more eloquent eulogy than can be uttered over his grave on this occasion. He who in State or Nation has legislated faithfully and wisely for the homes and the fireside happiness of his people, needs not the aid of the orator or sculptor to be remembered by his own and by future generations. Governor Williams took a prominent part in all important legislation in Indiana for more than a quarter of a century, and he was the best informed man in the legislative history of the State I have ever had the good fortune to know.

The grasp of his memory was strong and reliable, and he was an authority on disputed points in reference to the action of different legislatures.

"The administration of Governor Williams as Chief Magistrate of Indiana is too recent and fresh in the public mind to call for discussion or extended notice at this time. It is an honorable part of the history of a magnificent State; a State whose career in all the elements of greatness has been with the speed and strength of the eagle's wing in his flight toward the sun. Governor Williams loved Indiana and has left no blot on her name. He was her thirteenth executive elected by the people, and in the noble fraternity of his predecessors in that high office he stands a peer. Others were more learned in books, but none were wiser in the principles of self-government, nor purer in administering them for the welfare of the laboring, producing, business interests of the State. Others filled the public ear with higher notes of eloquence, but no one, as Governor of Indiana, ever filled the hearts of the people with more approbation for his official conduct or greater love for his personal character. But two of those who preceded him in the executive chair are amongst the living, one of whom is here to join in honor to the dead. Long, long may their useful and honorable lives be spared, and at last, when the final hour of rest shall come to them, as it will to all of us, may the memories which cluster around their names in the hearts of all their fellow-countrymen, without respect to creed or party, be as kind, as free from reproach and as gentle in their judgment as those which now gather around the name of James D. Williams and hallow the spot where he sleeps!"

Among the distinguished persons in attendance at the unveiling of the Williams monument were Governor Conrad Baker and Senator Benjamin Harrison.

OBLIGING AND ACCOMMODATING THE REPUBLICANS OF INDIANA UNWITTINGLY PROVED THEMSELVES IN 1882

THE temperance question again bobbed up serenely in the General Assembly of 1881. Remembering the experience of 1873 and 1874, the Republicans thought they would play a cunning game by making the sop to be thrown to the temperance folk an exceedingly plausible and attractive measure. The devise was this: Proposed amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in Indiana. Cunningly it was called the "submission plan." No responsibility attached to it. A legislator could vote for this submission plan regardless of his individual attitude on the liquor question—whether for or against prohibition. The Republicans chuckled over their cunning. It was just a little bit the shrewdest game that had been played in Indiana politics for years. This was the idea when the proposed amendment was introduced and voted on in the General Assembly. A change came over their dreams later on.

The "liberal element" did not regard this "harmless, inoffensive" prescription with the complacency of the average political trimmer. It was up in arms. It organized; it agitated; it worked like beavers. The submission plan was utilized as a campaign issue in the election of a trustee of the township in which Indianapolis is located. A similar issue was made at Shelbyville. Both elections turned out to the gratification of the "liberal element." Adolph Seidensticker, then editor of the Indianapolis Telegraph, was placed at the head of a State organization to fight the submission scheme. At his earnest solicitation the matter was brought before the summer meeting of the newly organized Indiana Democratic Editorial Association held at Michigan City the latter part of June. The question was debated at great length and with much earnestness and no little ill feeling. A surprisingly large number of Democratic editors, tutored by John C. Shoemaker, of the Indianapolis Sentinel, had come up from the extreme southern part of the State and they protested vehemently against any organization declaration in opposition to the submission proposition.

Mr. Seidensticker was amazed to learn that if a vote had been insisted on the result would have been "nip and tuck." Under these circumstances it was deemed the part of wisdom not to press the issue to a vote. But the revelations then and there made served as an eye-opener.

The attitude of so large a number of Democratic papers naturally had the effect of greatly strengthening the submission sentiment. In the rural districts public opinion ran overwhelmingly in favor of this alluring scheme. Tab was kept on the attitude of delegates chosen to the State convention. The facts thus gathered admit of no doubt that a majority of the delegates regarded the submission scheme with more or less favor.

A few days before the State convention a conference was held at the office of William H. English for the purpose of agreeing upon a plank to be incorporated into the State platform. In attendance at this conference were Thomas A. Hendricks, Joseph E. McDonald, William H. English, John B. Stoll, Adolph Seidensticker and Peter Lieber. Mr. Hendricks had prepared a plank, so had Mr. McDonald. Both were read. Mr. Hendricks at once pronounced the McDonald plank by far the preferable. It was then agreed that every effort be put forth to secure the adoption of this declaration by the Committee on Resolutions. That, as developed later on, wasn't as easy a task as some had imagined. But for one or two changes made in the selection of members of the Platform Committee the submissionists would have had a clear majority. As it was, neither side was in absolute control of the situation. Admirable as it was in its original construction, the McDonald resolution underwent considerable trimming before it became acceptable to a majority of the committee. The committee was in session until early in the morning before an agreement could be reached.

The State convention met on Wednesday, August 1, 1882. It was called to order by State Chairman William H. English. The committee on permanent organization recommended for Chairman John R. Coffroth, of Lafayette; for Secretary, John R. Simpson, of Paoli; Assistant Secretaries, John H. Poole, Newton; Charles E. Barrett, Hancock; Scott Ray Williams, Tipton. Their report was unanimously agreed to.

Three candidates for Secretary of State were presented: Captain William R. Myers, of Anderson; William Wesley Woollen, of Indianapolis; William A. Peelle, Jr., of Indianapolis. After the first ballot Peelle withdrew in favor of Myers. The trend being unquestionably in favor of that gentleman, Mr. Woollen also withdrew, and the nomination of Captain Myers was made unanimous by acclamation.

For Auditor of State three aspirants entered the race. They were: James H. Rice, of New Albany; Daniel McDonald, of Plymouth; A. B. Pitzer, of Tipton. Rice had the lead. After the second ballot Mr. Pitzer moved that the genial gentleman from New Albany be declared the unanimous choice of the convention. Agreed to, amidst manifestations of unalloyed joy.

There were five entries for State Treasurer: John J. Cooper, of Indianapolis; Thomas B. Byrnes, of Evansville; Thomas B. Hunt, of Henry county; Bernhard Schweitzer, of Owen county, and William M. McPheeters, of Washington county. The race was between Cooper and Byrnes. After the second ballot the latter moved that Mr. Cooper be declared duly nominated by acclamation. This was done with a hearty good will and unrestricted jubilation.

For the office of Attorney-General four distinguished lawyers were proposed: David Turpie, of Indianapolis; Joel Williamson, of Fayette county; Francis T. Hord, of Columbus, and William C. Forey, of Connersville. The contest was a sharp one, but Mr. Hord had such a strong lead that after the second ballot Mr. Forey considerably moved that a unanimous nomination be accorded that gentleman. This was done with vociferous acclaim.

Three candidates for the Supreme Court were to be nominated—for the first, second and third districts. For the first district William E. Niblack was renominated by acclamation. For the second district former Judge A. C. Downey was pitted against George V. Howk, who desired a re-nomination. On the first ballot Howk was so honored by a close vote—566 for Howk, 555 for Downey; a majority of 11. For the fourth district there were three candidates—Allen Zollars of Allen county, W. A. Bickle of Wayne, and J. T. Brown of Henry. The first ballot resulted in the nomination of Mr. Zollars, who received 656 votes as against 252 for Bickle and 213 for Brown.

With the nomination of John W. Holcomb, of Valparaiso, for Superintendent of Public Instruction, and of Simon P. Sheerin, of Logansport, for Clerk of the Supreme Court, the ticket was completed. Notwithstanding the strained feeling engendered by the seductive yet delusive "submission scheme," those who fully understood the situation freely predicted the triumphant election of the ticket in the fall. This prediction was amply verified by the verdict of the ballot.

THE PLATFORM.

In seventeen paragraphs expression is given to party sentiment and feeling. Most of these constitute arraignments of the Republican party for the abuse of power and the disregard of right and justice. The submission question was disposed of in this manner:

"The Democratic party is now, as it has always been, opposed to all sumptuary legislation, and it is especially opposed to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of Indiana, known as the prohibitory amendment, and we are in favor of the submission of said proposed amendment, as well as other proposed amendments, to the people, according to the provisions of the Constitution for its own amendment, and the people have the right to oppose or favor the adoption of any or all the amendments at all stages of their consideration, and any submission of constitutional amendments to a vote of the people should be at a time and under circumstances most favorable to a full vote, and therefore should be at a general election."

The last paragraph appreciatively remembers Senator Voorhees with this merited endorsement:

"We esteem Daniel W. Voorhees as an able and faithful representative of our State in the Senate, and especially commend him for his active sympathy in behalf of the soldier."

Though the Committee on Resolutions strained a point to make the plank relating to the proposed amendment to the Constitution palatable to the submissionists, the reading of that particular declaration by Governor Hendricks was loudly hissed. This was a new experience for that gentleman. A counter demonstration followed with three cheers for Hendricks. This, to some extent at least, neutralized the offensive manifestation of displeasure and hostility. When, at the conclusion of the reading of the report of the Committee on Resolutions, Mr. Hendricks demanded the previous question, another outburst of indignation startled timid on-lookers and frightened party leaders. Fortunately a gentleman was in the chair who knew a good deal about convention tumults. He handled the gavel judiciously and effectively. John R. East, of Bloomington, a tall member of the legal profession, with striking physiognomy and of commanding presence, was the leader of the submissionists. He had a larger following than he seemed to be aware of. It is well that he didn't know this. Had it been otherwise, the fight might have been prolonged and made far more bitter. The demand for the previous question was made effective and the platform as reported by Mr. Hendricks was finally adopted. It is due to Mr. East to say that later on he "saw the light" and took the stump for the ticket and the cause.

The outcome of the election demonstrated very clearly what can be accomplished by a judiciously directed campaign of education. The work of enlightening the people as to the real issue involved was begun by the publication of a series of letters written by prominent Democrats throughout the State. These were originally published in the Ligonier Banner and subsequently printed in pamphlet form and extensively circulated. In these letters it was made clear that the real object of the Republicans in putting forth the submission proposition was to evade a square issue on prohibition. It was held that when an amendment to the Constitution is proposed, those contending for its submission to popular vote should favor the adoption thereof and not disown or repudiate its purpose. No member of the General Assembly should vote for the submission of a proposed amendment unless he favors the same. Responsibility must accompany such action, otherwise the State would be kept in a constant turmoil over amendments to the basic law. Amending the Constitution was purposely and intentionally rendered difficult by the framers of that document, so that no change in the fundamental law of the State should be made unless the General Assembly believed such change to be necessary and desirable. During the progress of the campaign the Republicans discovered that what they at first regarded a sure winner had turned into a boomerang. Judge Turpie was especially forceful in the presentation and discussion of these points. For that reason he was very much in demand in all parts of the State. After the votes had been counted the Republican ascendancy gained in 1880 was reversed by the election of a Democratic Legislature and the triumph of the entire Democratic State ticket by more than 10,000 majority. Republican leaders were dumfounded. They wondered who had struck "Billy Patterson." A study of the election returns enlightened them.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

In the election of members of Congress the Republicans fared unusually badly. They pulled through only four of their candidates, and of these one (Stanton J. Peelle, of the Indianapolis district) was unseated in a contest instituted by Will E. English, then a staunch Democrat. The four successful Republicans were Thomas M. Browne, Stanton J. Peelle, George W. Steele and William H. Calkins. The latter was nominated for Governor in 1884 and resigned his seat in Congress. Benjamin F. Shively, Greenback and Democratic nominee, was chosen Calkins's successor. Of the nine Democrats chosen five were new men: John J. Kleiner of the First, John E. Lamb of the Eighth, Thomas B. Ward of the Ninth, Thomas J. Wood of the Tenth, and Robert Lowry of the Twelfth. Four Democrats were re-elected: Cobb, Stockslager, Holman and Matson. At the wind-up of the Forty-eighth Congress only two Republicans—Browne and Steele—were in the Indiana delegation. The "submission" dodge played havoc with Republican plans and calculations. The rebuke to cunning and duplicity was stunning.

STATE EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION.

The wisdom of organizing the Democratic State Editorial Association after the Hancock-English disaster became strikingly apparent during the 1882 campaign. A spirit of co-operation set in, more vigor was injected into the columns of Democratic papers, tolerance was cultivated, and the importance of mutuality received due attention. The idea of organizing a Democratic State Editorial Association had its inception in Northern Indiana. A preliminary meeting was held at Fort Wayne shortly after the November disaster of 1880. On historic Jackson Day, 1881, the association was formally organized at Indianapolis. In his admirable early history of this association the Hon. Luther Short, of Franklin, furnishes this authentic information:

"A constitution for the new organization was drafted by a committee consisting of John M. Goar, John B. Stoll, W. J.

Hilligoss, L. C. Jones and George W. Shanklin. Editors in attendance and signing the constitution thereupon adopted were:

Ad. Arnold, Columbus Democrat.
 M. A. Barnett, Danville Democrat.
 George W. Basler, Sullivan True Democracy.
 W. R. Brownlee, Anderson Democrat.
 Jerry Collins, Logansport Pharos.
 J. C. Dobelhower, Lafayette Dispatch.
 W. A. Donnell, Decatur News.
 T. J. Foster, Ft. Wayne Journal.
 Harry H. Francis, Michigan City Dispatch.
 John M. Goar, New Castle Democrat.
 Josiah Gwin, New Albany Ledger-Standard.
 H. E. Henderson, Kokomo Dispatch.
 W. J. Hilligoss, Huntington Democrat.
 William D. H. Hunter, Lawrenceburg Register.
 Lin C. Jones, Madison Herald.
 William Mitchell, Hancock Democrat.
 G. W. Shanklin, Evansville Courier.
 Luther Short, Franklin Democrat.
 George F. Shutt, Elkhart Democrat.
 John C. Shoemaker, Indianapolis Sentinel.
 John B. Stoll, Ligonier Banner.

"The officers elected for the first year were:

President—John B. Stoll, Ligonier Banner.
 First Vice-President—William D. H. Hunter, Lawrenceburg Register.
 Second Vice-President—George W. Shanklin, Evansville Courier.
 Recording Secretary—G. F. Shutt, Elkhart Democrat.
 Corresponding Secretary—Howard E. Henderson, Kokomo Dispatch.
 Treasurer—Josiah Gwin, New Albany Ledger-Standard.
 Executive Committee—H. H. Francis, L. C. Jones, W. J. Hilligoss, M. A. Barnett and J. C. Shoemaker.

"A committee of one from each Congressional district, with John B. Stoll as chairman, was appointed to prepare a suitable address embracing the opinion of the association upon the political issues of the day. Before adjournment a letter from Hon. Jeremiah S. Black of Pennsylvania was read, in which he most forcibly denounced the Republican frauds on the ballot box, and in unmeasured terms condemned that party for rewarding the corruptors with office.

"Of the twenty-one editors who took part in the organization only three besides the writer are members at the present time. They are Howard E. Henderson, Josiah Gwin and John B. Stoll. Of the other seventeen all are dead except John C. Shoemaker, Ad. Arnold, L. C. Jones, John M. Goar, George F. Shutt, W. R. Brownlee and Jerry Collins, none of whom are now engaged in the newspaper business. To the Hon. John B. Stoll more than any other one person belongs the credit of originating this organization, and as its first president he did much to insure its permanent character."

Since the publication of Mr. Short's history death has called of those mentioned in the preceding paragraph Howard E. Henderson, Josiah Gwin, John C. Shoemaker, and John M. Goar.

OCTOBER ELECTION ABOLISHED.

Under the constitution of 1851, election of State officers was fixed upon the first Tuesday after the first Monday in October. In presidential years, therefore, two elections became necessary. This involved a great deal of expense. That the system was so long maintained is among things difficult to understand. But needless expensiveness did not constitute the sole nor even the most serious objection. The October election was more objectionable on account of its corrupting tendency. Many years ago Pennsylvania was an October State. It quit being such when a new constitution was adopted during the Seventies. For years the "October States" were made the battleground in presidential years. The result in these States would serve as a forecast of how the political wind was blowing. Naturally this served as an incentive for contesting political parties to throw their entire force into these States. Indiana was especially inviting on account of the nearly equal division of its electorate. Money to corrupt venal voters was poured into the coffers of committees with a lavishness that was appalling to all who had a decent regard for legitimate campaigning and the purity of the ballot.

As the result of persistent agitation a movement was inaugurated to amend the constitution so as to abolish October elections. An amendment to that effect was adopted by two successive legislatures—those of 1877 and 1879, and submitted to the people the latter year for adoption or rejection. It commanded a majority of the vote on that proposition, but not a constitutional majority as interpreted by the supreme court. The amendment was again submitted to popular vote at a special election held March 4, 1881, duly ratified and authoritatively declared part of the constitution March 24, 1881.

ISAAC P. GRAY IN THE SADDLE

NOMINATED FOR GOVERNOR — JOSEPH E. McDONALD
ENDORSED FOR THE PRESIDENCY

SHORTLY after the opening of the morning session of the January meeting of the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association at Indianapolis, Mr. William Henderson, a relative of Thos. A. Hendricks and prominent citizen of the State capital, appeared in the hall where the meeting was being held and somewhat excitedly told me that a movement was on foot to introduce a resolution at this meeting of Democratic editors to formally declare Joseph E. McDonald to be the choice of the Indiana Democracy for the Presidency of the United States. Besides questioning the right of an editorial association to speak for the party in a matter of such importance, he declared that to adopt a resolution of this character during the absence of Mr. Hendricks in Europe—Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks then being on an extended tour of the Old World—would be manifestly a gross injustice if not an indignity to the man who for so many years had been the recognized and undisputed leader of the Indiana Democracy. He expatiated with a good deal of feeling on what he declared to be an increasing awakening of Democratic sentiment throughout the country in favor of the renomination of the 1876 ticket and the importance of avoiding any friction that might be caused by precipitating the launching of rival candidacies. I listened attentively to what Mr. Henderson had to present, then proceeded to say that while I would gladly once more be enlisted in waging political battle for "Tilden, Hendricks and Reform," I feared that the opportunity for avenging the wrong of 1876-7 had been frittered away; that the bringing of a new Richmond into the field seemed to me inevitable; that I doubted the policy of antagonizing Mr. McDonald's aspirations in view of his steadfast support of Mr. Hendricks' candidacies in the past, and that I deemed it of the utmost importance to maintain harmony within the party ranks in this State. However, I would see what could be done to guard against "snap judgment" being taken in the premises while Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks were abroad and if possible keep the field open until their return. By the application of some diplomacy presidential preferences were happily held in abeyance so far as the editorial association was concerned. For this Mr. Henderson expressed high appreciation after the association had completed its work without taking any action with reference to the Presidential nomination in 1884.

Immediately upon Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks' return from their European tour I received a telegram announcing that Mr. Hendricks desired to see me at Indianapolis. I hastened to the State capital and had a two hours' conference with Mr. Hendricks in his private office. The presidential situation was the sole subject of our conversation. Cautiously and diplomatically Mr. Hendricks reviewed the events of the past eight years. In regard to his refusal to stand for renomination in 1880 he seemed somewhat evasive. What little he said on that subject led me to believe that he did have some feeling in regard to being ignored as to the course that should have been pursued in the electoral contest of 1877, but this was adroitly smoothed over by the declaration that he then did not know or understand Mr. Tilden as well as he had since learned to know and understand him; that he (Tilden) was a much greater man than he appeared to him (Hendricks) in former years; that as a matter of fact he (Hendricks) regarded Mr. Tilden, next to Bismarck, the greatest statesman in the world, "and when I say that," Mr. Hendricks added, significantly and impressively, "I think I am paying him the highest compliment one man can pay another." In substance I reiterated with reference to the presidential situation what I had previously said to Mr. Henderson—that even if inclined belatedly to go before the American people for the vindication of the majesty of the ballot, Mr. Tilden's impaired health would forbid the making of another race with all the exactions, trials and tribulations incident thereto. Yet, if the party should decide to press Mr. Tilden into service, despite his protests, nothing could or would afford me greater pleasure than to devote myself to the advocacy of the "old ticket" with all the energy and enthusiasm at my command.

STATE CONVENTION, JUNE 25, 1884.

The convention was called to order by State Chairman Joseph E. McDonald. The committee on permanent organization recommended that Senator Daniel W. Voorhies be chosen president of the convention, and Lincoln Dixon of Jennings county, serve as secretary. The recommendation was unanimously and enthusiastically concurred in. A ringing keynote speech was delivered by Senator Voorhies on taking the chair. He was, as always, accorded a demonstrative greeting.

GRAY HAD THINGS HIS OWN WAY.

It had become plainly apparent that Isaac P. Gray was the undoubted choice of a majority of the delegates for the Gubernatorial nomination. This, however, does not warrant the inference that all the delegates favored his nomination. A goodly number would gladly have seen General Mahlon D. Manson, Judge David Turpie or Senator D. W. Voorhies selected. Strong pressure was, especially, brought upon the latter to enter the race. Men of commanding influence in the organization pleaded with him to make the race for the sake of the party. Most of these gentlemen believed Colonel Gray had not affiliated with the Democratic party long enough to be made its chosen State leader. The part he had in securing the ratification of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution in 1869 was especially held against him. The Indianapolis Sentinel thus referred to the pressure brought on Senator Voorhies:

"Early in the morning it was announced that Senator Voorhies was giving way to the arguments of his friends and had concluded to be a candidate for Governor. A reporter asked Senator Voorhies about this and he neither affirmed or denied, but said: 'I was opposed to this thing from the first and do not care to talk about it. If I had known what I do now, I would not have come here. I do not care to discuss the matter in the newspapers.'

"Leaving Senator Voorhies' room, the reporter met Eb. Henderson and asked him about the matter. Mr. Henderson said: 'Mr. Voorhies did not come here as a candidate against any of the gentlemen in the field, and when his friends solicited him to be a candidate he positively refused. When asked if he would accept the nomination if it were tendered him he replied that he owed all he was to the Democratic party and he would not refuse any position that the voice of that party asked him to take.' Mr. Henderson did not believe that the Senator's name would be presented."

When the convention settled down to the nomination of a State ticket Judge J. H. Stotsenburg, of New Albany, moved the nomination of Daniel W. Voorhees for Governor. Promptly that gentleman cleared the situation with this terse and explicit statement:

"Gentlemen of the convention, under no possible circumstances that now exist can my name be presented to this convention for any other position than the one I now enjoy as your representative in the United States Senate, and thanking the delegate who has paid me the compliment, being authorized to control my own name, I withdraw it from the convention."

Judge Bickle presented the name of Isaac P. Gray, of Randolph county, for Governor. Bayless W. Hanna, of Crawfordsville, put in nomination General Mahlon D. Manson, which nomination was enthusiastically seconded by the Cass county delegation. The Tenth Congressional District presented the name of Judge David Turpie, of Indianapolis. So evident was the trend to Colonel Gray that before roll call General Manson moved that his nomination be made by acclamation, which motion, upon being seconded by Judge Turpie, was adopted with tumultuous applause.

For Lieutenant-Governor there were put in nomination James E. McCullough, of Gibson county; Judge Louis Jordan, of Indianapolis; General Mahlon D. Manson, of Crawfordsville; James H. Willard, of Lawrence county; Colonel Isaiah B. McDonald, of Whitley county. As the roll was called and county upon county voted for General Manson, the names of the other gentlemen were withdrawn one after another and the nomination of that veteran made unanimous.

For Supreme Judge, Captain Joseph A. S. Mitchell, of Goshen, was nominated by acclamation.

All the State officers nominated and elected two years prior were honored with unanimous renominations, as follows:

Secretary of State—Captain Wm. R. Myers.
Auditor of State—James H. Rice.
Treasurer of State—John J. Cooper.

teen employed in factories and mines and workshops; enforcement of the laws against Chinese immigration.

"Approves the passage of a Metropolitan Police Bill which provides for mixed political incumbents instead of partisan police.

"Resolved, That we are opposed to the calling of a convention to amend the Constitution of the State; that we demand the repeal of the laws passed by the Republicans designed to place the elections under Federal control in direct violation of State rights."

Joseph E. McDonald was presented as Indiana's choice for the Presidency of the United States and the delegation was instructed to support him as a unit.

The notable features of the convention were the graceful manner in which General Manson and Judge Turpie took themselves out of the Gubernatorial race, thus making the nomination of Colonel Gray the unanimous action of the convention, and the acquiescence of General Manson in having the nomination for Lieutenant-Governor thrust upon him when that wasn't at all what he wanted.

VOORHEES ON HENDRICKS' ATTITUDE.

Under date of July 18, 1883, Senator Voorhees wrote to me from his home, Terre Haute:

"I note what you say about Hendricks. I think he will finally come out all right, but I confess his present attitude gives me pain. He may not perhaps hurt McDonald, but I fear that he will injure and belittle himself. I am strongly attached to him, and don't want him to exhibit the small side of human nature, as a man always does when he shows jealousy or envy. I do not know that Hendricks has any feelings of that kind, but the public will be swift to draw such a conclusion.

"There is nothing in the old ticket movement. I have seen Mr. Tilden within the last year. He is a broken-down, trembling, palsied old man, all the fabricating to the contrary notwithstanding. If he had not force enough in him to assert his rights in 1876-7, still less has he now. He is out of the question. Since the adjournment of Congress I have been in eleven different States, and I have no doubt of McDonald's nomination unless some great change takes place. The movement for him did not originate in Indiana; it is everywhere else as well."

CLEVELAND AND HENDRICKS NOMINATED AT CHICAGO.

Grover Cleveland, of New York; Senator Thomas Francis Bayard, of Delaware; Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio; Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania; Joseph E. McDonald, of Indiana, and John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, had earnest, active support at the Democratic National Convention, convened in Chicago, July 8. Tilden put a quietus on the further use of his name in connection with the Presidential nomination. Most of his lieutenants in the Empire State united with Daniel Manning in the support of Grover Cleveland. Manning proved himself a very capable manager. Tilden himself was not partial to Cleveland; his personal preference was Samuel J. Randall, but the latter's pronounced views on protective tariff made the distinguished Pennsylvanian an impossibility. Randall himself fully understood this aspect of the case. Tammany fought Cleveland as viciously as it fought Tilden at St. Louis and four years later at Cincinnati. It was this hostility to Cleveland that led General Edward S. Bragg, a Wisconsin Congressman, to exclaim in a fiery speech: "We love him (Cleveland) for the enemies he has made." At one time there seemed to be a prospect of forming a combination to defeat Cleveland by uniting all the elements of opposition on Thomas A. Hendricks. A mighty demonstration had been arranged and was carried into effect in the convention hall, but owing to the defection of the Illinois delegation, largely controlled by Mayor Carter H. Harrison, the scheme miscarried. Randall advised his friends to support Cleveland. That made the latter invincible.

Richard D. Hubbard, of Texas, served as temporary and Colonel William F. Vilas, of Wisconsin, as permanent chairman of the convention. It was a great assemblage. Ben Butler cut some figure in it. He had a following that was clamorous for his nomination to the Presidency, but when it came to voting there was but little Butler sentiment visible to the naked eye.

Thomas A. Hendricks placed in nomination for the Presidency of the United States his fellow-townsmen, Joseph E. McDonald, in a speech of which the following is a verbatim report, as delivered on the 9th day of July, 1884:

"Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Convention—This is my first experience as a delegate in a National Convention, and as I rise to present the name of a distinguished citizen of Indiana in connection with the office of President of the United States, I feel the delicacy and great responsibility of the duty I have undertaken. The people now demand a change in the management of Federal affairs; and if this convention will give them half an opportunity they will execute that purpose in the election of a President in the coming fall.

"I believe the nominee of this convention will soon become the chosen President of the United States. (Cheers.) He will be the first inaugurated President for twenty-four years. (Cheers.) He will come in burdened with all the duties that usually belong to high office, and in addition such duties and delicate responsibilities as belong to the transfer of public affairs from the representatives of one party to the representatives of another, after long control by the latter.

"Mr. President and gentlemen, I have to suggest for your consideration a citizen of the State of Indiana, the Hon. Joseph E. McDonald. (Loud and long-continued applause.) I thank you for the reception you have given to his name. Born in an adjoining State, Indiana became his home when but a boy. He learned a trade, and that made him self-dependent and very respectable (applause), and after that he pursued his studies with such opportunities as he had, and finally prepared himself for the profession of law; and from the time that he took his stand in the court house of his county until the present time, when he stands, it may be, in the Supreme Court of the United States, he has been the peer of the best of that profession in the West. (Loud applause.) First, he was solicited by the district in which he lived to prosecute the pleas of the State; afterward chosen by the State to represent her as the Attorney-General; next—not next to that, but before that—he went from his own district in which he was raised from boyhood to the Congress of the United States, and afterward the people of the whole State sent him as a Senator to Washington. Faithfully, diligently, ably, for six years he represented Indiana in the Senate. He was welcomed by the ablest of the Senators as his peer. Mr. McDonald has been a student of the learning that has made the Democracy of the United States what it is today. (Loud applause.) He is familiar with the writings of the fathers, and his opinions are based upon the sentiments that came to him from their pages. He is of clear perception, of strong judgment, of earnest convictions, fair-minded and just. If you shall honor him with your nomination, no man will have occasion to find fault with the candid and frank manner of his reception when he may go to the White House.

"Gentlemen of the convention, I do not speak for Mr. McDonald alone. I do not speak for myself alone. I do not speak for those thirty gentlemen who directed me to stand here and speak for them—I speak for a mighty State. (Continued applause.) But ten days ago a Democracy that never steps backward, a Democracy that meets the contest when and where it may (applause) instructed those thirty gentlemen and myself to say to you that Joseph E. McDonald is worthy of your consideration as the candidate for President of the United States. (Loud applause.) What is Indiana, and what is the Democracy of Indiana? This mighty State, that is neither of the East nor of the West, resting upon Ohio, associating in commerce, in trade, in good neighborhood with adjoining States, this great State has said to me, 'Present the name of Mr. McDonald to the greatest convention the world has ever seen' (applause), and for Indiana I make my appeal to you today. What heed will you give to Indiana? For twenty-five years, during which I have had some responsible connection with this great party, she has been without strife or discord in her ranks. (Applause.) She acted always as one man, and when the election days have come, the tread of her Democracy has been as the tread of one regiment when the hour of battle is at hand. (Applause.) You know very well, gentlemen, that Indiana makes no question whether your candidate shall live in New York, Delaware or Kentucky. You know very well that when the crisis comes Indiana will give him her vote. Are you going to make it against Indiana because she is so faithful, because she will not hesitate? Are you going to say from election to election, from convention to convention, 'We need not trouble about that solid State. She is all right. Her votes will go well at election. We must take care—oh, just by way of illustration—we must take care of New York.' (Great laughter and applause.) Is that where, as a representative of the Democracy of Indiana, these thirty gentlemen and myself have to stand in your presence? We ask not a favor because Indiana is true always, but we ask that you shall not come in judgment against her. (Applause.) When many of your States hesitated when war had passed, when the smoke of battle had blown away, and the sound of guns upon the plains and among the mountains had ceased, and you struggled and we struggled, Indiana was the first State to carry the banner of Democracy to the front.

"And now, gentlemen, a man of good attainments, of high character, endorsed by my State—I present his name to you—and all I ask is justice. The humblest of us may ask that much; and when it shall come to be that in a Democratic convention justice may not be asked, then perhaps I would better review the practices of the past and not come to convention at all. I thank you, brother Democrats, I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the attention you have given me while I have spoken for a friend." (Great and continued applause, a great number of the delegates rising to their feet and swinging their hats, etc.)

The first ballot resulted: Cleveland,

392; Bayard, 170; Thurman, 88; Randall, 78; McDonald, 56; Carlisle, 27; scattering, 8.

On the second ballot Cleveland was nominated by the decisive vote of 683 to 81½ for Bayard, 145½ for Hendricks, 4 for Thurman, 4 for Randall and 2 for McDonald. Thomas A. Hendricks was unanimously nominated for Vice-President. On a motion to make the nomination of Cleveland unanimous, vigorous "noes" came up from the Tammany crowd, but the nomination of Hendricks was greeted with an outburst of enthusiasm that admitted of no doubt of his popularity with the great crowd that witnessed the nomination of the Democratic Presidential ticket in 1884.

THE CAMPAIGN IN INDIANA.

A more vigorous campaign than that fought by the Democracy of Indiana in 1884 could hardly be imagined. Every Democrat in the State seemed to have designated himself a committee of one to win a great and glorious victory. Some bitterness was occasioned by the publication in the columns of the Indianapolis Sentinel of an ancient story reflecting upon the moral character of James G. Blaine, the idol of his party and head of the Republican National ticket. The Sentinel's plea of justification was that the Republicans had mercilessly and scandalously utilized the Maria Halpin story to render Grover Cleveland unpopular with voters of a high moral standard and that Republicans, therefore, had no right to complain upon having a dose of their own medicine administered to them. Libel suit was instituted against the Sentinel for defamation of character. In view of the politics involved in this case the proprietor of the Sentinel, Mr. John C. Shoemaker, contended that the Democratic State Committee ought to pay the attorney's fee in defense of the case, but the chairman of the committee was unable to concur in this view, whereupon the Sen- tinel refused to follow the custom observed for years of publishing gratuitously from day to day the party ticket—National, State, county, etc. Eb. Henderson was Chairman of the State committee and came in for a share of Mr. Shoemaker's displeasure. The result of the election in Indiana is told by these figures:

FOR PRESIDENT.

|-----------------------------------|---------|
| Grover Cleveland, Democrat..... | 244,990 |
| James G. Blaine, Republican..... | 238,463 |
| Benj. F. Butler, Greenbacker..... | 8,293 |

FOR GOVERNOR.

| | |
|---|---------|
| Isaac P. Gray, Democrat..... | 245,140 |
| William H. Calkins, Republican..... | 237,748 |
| Hiram Z. Leonard, Greenbacker..... | 8,338 |
| Robert S. D. Wiggins, Prohibitionist..... | 3,868 |

| | |
|---------------------------------------|---------|
| Mahlon D. Manson, Democrat..... | 245,476 |
| Eugene H. Bundy, Republican..... | 237,538 |
| John B. Milroy, Greenbacker..... | 8,384 |
| Elwood C. Silver, Prohibitionist..... | 3,689 |

The pluralities were: Cleveland for President, 6,527; Gray for Governor, 7,392; Manson for Lieutenant-Governor, 7,938; Captain William R. Myers for Secretary of State, 7,097; James H. Rice for Auditor of State, 7,261; John J. Cooper for Treasurer of State, 9,903.

The General Assembly chosen at this election was politically divided as follows: Senate—36 Democrats, 14 Republicans. House—63 Democrats, 36 Republicans, 1 Greenbacker.

NINE DEMOCRATS, FOUR REPUBLICANS SENT TO CONGRESS.

There is a remarkable similarity between the result of the election for members of Congress in 1882 and 1884. On the Democratic side Kleiner, Cobb, Holman, Matson, Ward and Lowry were re-elected. Jonas G. Howard, Democrat, succeeded Strother M. Stockslager, Democrat, in the Third District; William D. Bynum succeeded Will E. English, both Democrats, in the Indianapolis District; James T. Johnson, Republican, succeeded John E. Lamb, Democrat, in the Terre Haute District. Two Republicans, Brown and Steele, were re-elected. George Ford was elected for the full term in the Thirtieth, and Benjamin F. Shively for the unexpired term of Major Calkins.

FOR FIVE YEARS DEATH HOVERED OVER MR. HENDRICKS.

The active part taken by Mr. Hendricks in the 1884 campaign left everybody under the impression that he was in prime physical condition. Not a hint to the contrary was given from the opening to the close of the campaign. The real facts in the case became known only after his death, and then but vaguely. It devolved upon Senator Voorhees to reveal the well-kept secret. He did this in his masterly, eloquent and touching tribute to the departed statesman delivered in the Senate of the United States January 26, 1886:

"Five years ago the unremitting labors and the incessant strain of more than a third of a century caused the powerful and compact physical constitution of Governor Hendricks to put forth its first signals of distress, and to reel for a time like a disabled ship in the breakers. In the autumn of 1880, seeking for rest and surcease of toil, he visited that famous canyon of the Ozark mountains, in Arkansas, where magical springs pour forth their hot and healing waters. While there in repose and apparent security the icy finger of paralysis, sure precursor of skeleton death, touched him with its fatal premonition.

"The extent of his danger at that time was never known, except to her whose life was as his own, and to his physicians, who did not conceive it their duty to publish their patient's ailments in the newspapers. He came home, however, to his beloved State, and again took up his public and private duties with serenity and composure, but he knew from that time forward that he walked in the constant shadow of an impending blow. Not a word ever escaped him on the subject outside of his domestic circle. No wail, nor murmur, nor lament ever shook his lofty fortitude or passed his lips. When, two years later, he was stricken with lameness in his foot, and informed that he could rise no more to take part in the affairs of life, he was the only party to the scene unmoved by the great change then apparently so near. He spoke of his work as finished, and quietly waited for the curtains which divide time from eternity to be drawn aside. But medical opinion had erred, and it was reserved for him to receive one more promotion at the hands of his countrymen, to be crowned with another and higher honor, and to fall at last, when his hour did come, within a single step of the summit of human greatness.

"At the Chicago convention, in 1884, Governor Hendricks made the only appearance of his life in such a body. The old familiar light was in his face, and his mental vision was as clear and penetrating as ever, but he was physically not strong, and the prompt alert movement and elastic tread which his friends knew so well were wanting. His presence in that convention was contagious, and the vast multitude shouted themselves hoarse and shook the mighty amphitheater with his name whenever he appeared, but no exultation came for a moment into his look or manner. To those near him he simply appeared to enjoy in a quiet, silent way the popular approval of his long and faithful services, under the weight of which he was then wearily walking in the rich and glowing sunset of a great and well-spent life. When he was nominated for Vice-President he was seeking repose and sleep on his bed at the hotel at the close of an exciting day. He did not hear the tender words and strains of 'Auld Lang Syne' break forth from ten thousand voices at the mention of his name, exclaiming:

Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?

"The effect of the nomination on Governor Hendricks himself was immediate and remarkable. The position of Vice-President was one to which he had never aspired, nor were its duties congenial to his talents or tastes. He knew and accepted the fact that a dread specter was hovering near him and liable to cast its fatal dart at any moment, and more especially in the midst of labor and excitement. He had so often, however, led his party, and had always so fully met the expectations of his devoted friends in Indiana, that his iron will at once determined not to disappoint them on the last field where he was to appear. His resolution seemed to summon up all the vigor of the best years of his manhood.

"The energy and activity he displayed were never surpassed in a political contest. He declared himself ready to answer for his State, as he did in 1876, and the response of the people justified his promise and his claim. The brilliant and gifted leader of the Republican party, known in the lists of the political tournament as the Plumed Knight, crossed the borders of Indiana, was welcomed with all the pomp and circumstance of a great party long accustomed to national victories, made a tour of the State with his banner full high advanced, inspiring the confidence and kindling into a flame the zeal and devotion of those who believed in his destiny and followed his star. As Mr. Blaine closed his engagements in Indiana and drew off to other fields, it was determined that his dramatic and dazzling expedition into the West should have its bold and effective counterpart.

"Governor Hendricks, upon brief announcement, passed rapidly from point to point, and the people rose up to do him honor until the whole State seemed one vast continuous assemblage. It was his farewell engagement on the hustings, and he filled it like a master. Such an ovation was rarely ever given to hero or statesman in ancient or modern times, and the children of this generation will recall its scenes when they are old men and women in the distant future.

"But while he moved in the midst of these pageants, honors and allurements, it was known to a chosen and silent few that his mind and heart dwelt apart from them, and were engaged with matters of higher import than those of earth. During the last two years of his life he selected and prepared the beautiful spot where he now reposes. He gave his close personal attention to the finish and erection of the stately marble shaft which bears his name and marks his final abode. His only child died when but three years old, and for more than thirty years had rested at the old home at Shelbyville. As he felt the evening shadows coming on, the strong man, the able lawyer, the distinguished senator, and governor, and vice-president, wished his long-lost little boy to sleep by his side. He tenderly transferred the sacred dust from Shelbyville, and when he himself was by loving hands laid to rest, the grave of a child was observed close by covered with flowers. At times he visited this hallowed spot and lingered there while his own name was ringing with applause or provoking fierce controversy. His thoughts were then far away, and with deep emotion he gathered up the broken links of the past, and by a faith that never faltered nor grew dim, reunited them in that high world beyond the sun and beyond the stars.

"Governor Hendricks was a believing and practical Christian all the days of his life. His duties to the church were no more neglected nor evaded than his duties to the State. He held official relations with both, but never mingled them. He bore open and public testimony on all proper occasions to his reliance upon the teachings of Christianity for the advancement of civilization and for the happiness of mankind. In his private life he exemplified the beautiful virtues of his religion.
He was much given to charity, not merely in the bestowal of alms to the poor, but in the kindness of his heart and the tolerance of his spirit toward all. He obeyed the apostolic injunction, and lived in peace with all men as far as it lay in his power to do so. He never gave the first blow in a personal controversy, and often forbore to return those he received. He loved his neighbors, and was by them beloved.

"Sir, we shall see Thomas A. Hendricks no more with our mortal eyes. He is gone from the high place of earth to the higher realms of immortality. He is lost to the senate chamber, to the forum, and to home and friends. We will follow him;
he will return no more to us. As long,
however, as American history treasures up pure lives and faithful public services;
as long as public and private virtue, stainless and without blemish, is revered, so long will his name be cherished by the American people as an example worthy the highest emulation. Monuments of brass and marble will lift their heads toward heaven in honor of his fame, but a monument more precious to his memory and more valuable to the world has already been founded in the hearts of the people whom he served so long, so faithfully, and with such signal ability. In the busy harvest time of death, in the year 1885, there was gathered into eternity no nobler spirit, no higher intelligence, no fairer soul."

(Mr. Hendricks died at his home in Indianapolis, November 25, 1885. He was born on a farm in Muskingum county, Ohio, September 7, 1819.)

At the memorial services of the Indianapolis Bar Joseph E. McDonald spoke thus of Mr. Hendricks:

"The national flag at half-mast, the city draped in mourning, and the many sad faces that throng our streets, all attest the fact that one who has enshrined himself in the hearts of the people of this State and had inscribed his name high up in the roll of the distinguished men of our country has closed his earthly career; and while we, his brothers of the bar, have met to pay to his memory that honor to which it is entitled, on account of the high rank he held in our profession, a nation bows its head in sorrow. Monuments may be erected to perpetuate his name, but none will be more enduring than the memorial you will this day enroll upon the records of the courts. It is the lawyers' monument, and will remain when monuments of brass or stone have crumbled, and fallen, and mingled with the dust. The memorial and resolutions you are about to adopt speak of him, his character and career, and render it unnecessary for me to more than briefly allude to them."

MR. HENDRICKS' DEATH SUDDEN AND UNEXPECTED.

As stated in his eloquent tribute to the departed, the Hon. William D. Bynum says on the evening prior to his death Mr. Hendricks "Attended a reception at the residence of State Treasurer Cooper, and, though slightly complaining, was the recipient of many congratulations upon his healthful and robust appearance. On this occasion he was exceptionally affable, and participated in the pleasures of the evening with rare grace and extreme joy. Upon his return home he did not rest well, and the next morning the family physician was summoned, who, finding nothing serious the matter, administered an anodyne to relieve the pain of which he complained. No one but himself entertained any thoughts of approaching danger, and the only manifestation of fear upon his part was the gloom of doubt which seemed to hovering around his mind, causing him to crave the continued presence of Mrs. Hendricks by his side. She was constantly with him on the day of his death until late in the afternoon, when she left him alone, resting comfortably and apparently safely, to receive some friends. She was absent only a few minutes, but when she returned his great spirit was gone.

"The news of his death flew fast and far, and 'ere the noon of night had passed a feeling of sorrow was in every heart and a shade of sadness upon every brow. Death had not stricken the first-born, yet there was mourning in every household. When the startling news of his death was first communicated to me I was reminded of the time when Burke was making a speech at the hustings in a race for the House of Commons news was brought him of the death of his competitor. Dropping the subject of his speech, he exclaimed, 'This teaches us what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue.'"

HENDRICKS' BROADMINDEDNESS.

A remark that Mr. Hendricks made in 1880 illustrates his conscientiousness and sincerity. He was walking toward the Wigwam one evening with his friend, William Wesley Woollen, to hear Hon. George W. Julian speak. It will be remembered that Mr. Julian had been an Abolitionist before and during the war, noted on the stump and in Congress for the force of his argumentation and bitterness of his invective. He came over to the Democrats with the Greeley movement and had been an able assailant of the Republican administration. Mr. Hendricks fell to commenting on Mr. Julian as a speaker and feared that his sharpness and vigor would not prove so effective as a more winning and persuasive style. "But," he said, "what a fine courage Julian has shown throughout; and, Woollen, he was right in his abolition views and we were wrong." Then, after a moment's thought, he continued: "But if I had my life to go over, I could not do otherwise than I did. At each step I did what I thought right by the light I then had."

POLITICAL SEE-SAWING CONTINUES

FOUR YEARS OF DEMOCRATIC ASCENDENCY FOLLOWED BY FOUR YEARS OF REPUBLICAN SUPREMACY

FOR the first time after the Civil War the Democrats of Indiana scored a signal triumph in 1870. A Democratic Governor and a Democratic Superintendent of Public Instruction were chosen in 1872, but the remainder of the Republican State ticket squeezed in at the October election of that year. The country at large was swept by the Republicans under the leadership of Grant, owing to the adversities engendered by the ill-fated Greeley movement. Two years later victory was again inscribed on the Democratic banner. This was repeated in 1878. In 1880, Democracy discouraged and for a time dismayed, the Republicans emerged out of the contest victoriously, both State and Nation. A hocus-pocus game sought to be shrewdly played by the Republicans in 1882 was rebuked by a Democratic victory exceeding 10,000 votes. Nearly equally decisive was the Democratic triumph in 1884. Democratic discontent and apathy in 1886 caused the political pendulum again to swing in the Republican direction. Democratic apathy in that campaign was due to the reluctance with which the Cleveland administration recognized the just claims of the Democratic "boys in the trenches." After having been out in the cold for so many years, "the boys in the trenches," who had battled for so long a time to place the country under Democratic control, had become imbued with the idea that some consideration should be shown them at the "pie counter," so greedily monopolized by Republican workers and partisans. Sore disappointment thus occasioned cropped out everywhere and had a depressing effect on both campaign and election.

By dint of persistent hammering away some recognition was accorded about a half-dozen more or less prominent Indiana Democrats. Colonel John S. Williams of Lafayette was made Third Auditor; S. M. Stockslager of Corydon became Assistant Commissioner of the Land Office, and Eb. Henderson landed a fairly good job in one of the numerous bureaus at Washington.

In the diplomatic service Indiana fared better. Two important positions were awarded to distinguished and deserving Indiana Democrats: Colonel Charles Denby of Evansville was made Ambassador to China and the Hon. Rufus Magee of Logansport was named as Minister to Norway and Sweden. Both were excellent selections. Both were credited to Joseph E. McDonald. Mr. Magee sustained very close relations to that gentleman. During the earlier part of Mr. Magee's career he was a member of the McDonald family. For some years Mr. Magee was connected with the Indianapolis Sentinel and served several terms as Secretary of the Democratic State Committee. In these positions he developed unusual ability, that contributed largely to his subsequent advancement and well-deserved prominence in State affairs. As editor and proprietor of the Logansport Pharos, he wielded commanding influence in State politics, and as State Senator he achieved fame and distinction by virtue of the excellence of his legislative work. As Minister to Norway and Sweden he made a record to which his friends may well point with satisfaction and pride. That the appointment of Colonel Denby to the Chinese ambassadorship was a wise one is attested by the fact that he was retained by the Harrison administration and that twelve years of the Colonel's life were devoted to straightening out the innumerable complications that arose during his long and useful diplomatic service.

Indiana having failed to gain recognition in the formation of the Cleveland Cabinet—influences having been set at work to prevent Joseph E. McDonald from being made Attorney-General—intimations were thrown out that Indiana might be favored with the award of the public printership. Vice-President Hendricks and the solid Indiana delegation in Congress held a meeting and unanimously formally presented the name of John B. Stoll for that position. In course of time it leaked out that strong influences were at work to retain the then "present incumbent," S. P. Rounds of Chicago. Whenever urged to come to some decision in the premises, President Cleveland bemoaned the tremendous pressure brought upon him from all directions and pleaded that more time be given him to reach a conclusion. Repeated month after month, this plea became monotonous, and about the middle of the Cleveland administration Mr. Stoll went to Washington to have a personal interview with the President on the subject.

With utmost frankness President Cleveland was told that so much time having been consumed in determining the public printership, an appointment now would no longer serve as a gratification of ambition; that public office had lost its charms so far as this applicant was concerned, and that rather than be further held in suspense he (Mr. Stoll) would prefer to withdraw his papers and forget all about having been a candidate for the position. The President earnestly objected to this being done, promising that in the near future he would take up this particular case and come to a decision. Shortly after this interview Stilson Hutchins, a former newspaper publisher at St. Louis and then in control of an administration organ at Washington, sent word to Mr. Stoll by a trustworthy envoy that if he (Hutchins) were permitted to name the chief clerk of the Government Printing Office the appointment of Mr. Stoll would soon be announced. The reply to this overture was that Mr. Stoll would not place himself under any such obligation to any human being. Interest in the public printership had by this time been eliminated from Mr. Stoll's mind, he having reached the conclusion that henceforth his time and attention would be centered on his newspaper work. The effect of banishing political ambition and giving unremitting attention to business was marvelous and resulted in such advancement along material lines that the denial of an appointment at the hands of Mr. Cleveland partook of the nature of a blessing in disguise. Stilson Hutchins became a multi-millionaire. How much satisfaction and pleasure this afforded him is not a matter of record. It is a matter of record, however, that after having devoted a lifetime to the accumulation of millions he became involved in a legal squabble with his family and that he ended his career a mental as well as a physical wreck.

In an interview that the Hon. Eli W. Brown, for many years a prominent Democrat of Whitley county and at the time editor of the Frankfort Crescent, had with Senator McDonald, at the latter's law office in Indianapolis, soon after the inauguration of the Cleveland administration, Mr. McDonald expressed himself quite freely with reference to his attitude toward Mr. Hendricks. "The time has come," Mr. McDonald said to Mr. Brown, "when lines must be drawn sharply in this State. We have come to the crossing of the roads. The adherents of Mr. Hendricks will choose one; my friends will travel in the other direction." When the substance of this conversation was repeated to Mr. Hendricks he showed no signs of surprise, anger or fear. He simply listened, meditated and then maintained an ominous silence.

An unexpected complication arose in Indiana politics as a result of the appointment of Lieutenant-Governor Mahlon D. Manson to the collectorship of internal revenue, headquarters at Terre Haute. By the acceptance of a Federal appointment General Manson vacated the office to which the people of Indiana had elected him in 1884. Being a man of wealth, his acceptance of an office such as the collectorship created considerable surprise. After he had filed his letter of resignation as Lieutenant-Governor, the question as to filling the vacancy at the ensuing election was by Governor Gray officially referred to Attorney-General Francis T. Hord. Upon giving due consideration to the subject the Attorney-General held that the vacancy must be filled by popular election. Governor Gray accepted this view of the case and in his official capacity announced that it would be in order for all political parties in the State to nominate a candidate for the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

THE DEMOCRATIC STATE TICKET HEADED BY CAPTAIN JOHN C. NELSON.

When the Democratic State Convention assembled at Indianapolis, August 11, 1886, the Committee on Permanent Organization, through its Chairman, W. Scott Ray, named Senator Voorhees for presiding officer and W. J. Craig as principal secretary. The convention ratified these nominations unanimously and enthusiastically.

THE PLATFORM OF 1886.

As compared with some other platform declarations that of 1886 may be pronounced a model of terseness. Its main planks read thus:

"Resolved, That the Democracy of Indiana, in convention assembled, cordially approves the administration of President Cleveland, for its ability, integrity and economy in the management of national affairs, and recognize in the President and members of his Cabinet faithful and patriotic servants.

"Resolved, That the Democrats of Indiana sincerely lament the loss of their honored and trusted leader, the late Thomas A. Hendricks. By his wise counsel and superb leadership the Democracy of Indiana gained and enjoyed an enviable reputation for heroic and unselfish devotion to the principles of just government. The memory of our late beloved leader can not be better perpetuated than by a steadfast observance of his conciliatory counsel and patriotic teachings, to the end that the efforts of all true Democratic citizens may be directed to the faithful application of those grand and ennobling principles that conduce to the welfare and happiness of a liberty-loving people.

"We also profoundly deplore that during a brief period of time the Nation, and particularly the Democratic party, has suffered the loss of four other eminent citizens in the person of the gallant leader, George B. McClellan; the superb hero, Winfield Scott Hancock; the pure and wise statesman, Horatio Seymour; and more recently the demise of that discerning statesman, sagacious counselor and profound political philosopher, Samuel J. Tilden. The career of these illustrious men may well serve as examples for those upon whom shall devolve the responsibility of leadership.

"Resolved, That taxation of the people for other purposes than raising revenue for the expenses of the Government, economically administered, is robbery under the forms of law. We are, therefore, in favor of a reduction of the present unjust tariff to a revenue basis, and we hereby reaffirm the principles laid down in the Chicago platform on that subject and heartily indorse the action of the Democratic Representatives in Congress from this State for their fidelity to the cause of tariff reform.

"Resolved, That the Democratic party of Indiana is now, as it has always been, opposed in principle to all sumptuary laws and prohibitory legislation, but it is in favor of just and proper measures for regulating traffic in spirituous and intoxicating liquors under a license system designed to repress the evils of intemperance, and it favors a reasonable increase of the license tax, discriminating between malt liquor and wines and distilled spirits so as to place the highest license on distilled spirits. The proceeds of such tax to be applied to the support of the common schools.

"Resolved, That in the enactment of all laws a strict regard should be had for the rights of the laboring masses; that taxation should be restricted to the lowest amounts required by an economical administration of public affairs; that wage-workers should be protected by legislation from the oppressive power of monopolies and corporations; and that all laws not in harmony with the foregoing purposes should be repealed."

The remainder of the platform is devoted to a declaration approving the forfeiture of about one hundred million acres of railroad grant lands; condemning alien ownership of land in Indiana; favoring gold and silver and convertible paper money as a circulating medium; bestowing praise on Democratic officials then in power for their efficiency and fidelity; demanding the repeal of all laws that do not bear equally on capital and labor; paying tribute to the soldiers and sailors who saved the Union; favoring a revision of the tax law so as to bring about equitable valuation of property; approving a pending amendment to the Constitution making the term of all county officers four years; felicitating Ireland on the prospective establishment of home rule; approving increased pensions to the widows and dependent parents of deceased soldiers and to soldiers who were disabled in the Union army.

Nominations having been declared in order, Dr. Thomas H. Harrison of Lebanon presented the name of James McCabe of Warren for Lieutenant-Governor. Alonzo Green Smith was also placed before the convention, but he immediately arose and declared that he could not be a candidate. Dr. Harrison withdrew the name of Mr. McCabe. Thereupon Michael L. Fansler presented the name of Captain John C. Nelson of Logansport, whose nomination was effected by acclamation.

For Secretary of State, Robert W. Miers of Bloomington; Lewis Jordan of Indianapolis; Samuel R. Downey of Ohio county, and Myron D. King were proposed by their respective friends. After the second ballot Mr. King made a motion, seconded by Mr. Jordan, that Robert W. Miers be declared the unanimous choice of the convention for Secretary of State. It was so decreed.

Charles A. Munson of Fort Wayne, Gerard Reiter of Vincennes and A. B. Pitzer of Tipton were named for Auditor of State. On the first ballot Mr. Munson received 618½ votes, Reiter 337½, Pitzer 275. Mr. Munson, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was declared duly nominated.

No one ventured to contest with popular Thomas B. Byrnes of Evansville the nomination for State Treasurer, and he was accordingly made the nominee by acclamation.

For Attorney-General James V. Kent of Frankfort and Hugh D. McMullen entered the race. McMullen was nominated on the first ballot by receiving 704½ votes, Kent 515½. On motion of Mr. Kent the McMullen nomination was declared to be the unanimous action of the convention.

Four candidates for Superintendent of Public Instruction were placed before the convention: Andrew M. Sweeney of Dubois county, John W. Holcombe of Porter county, Frederick S. Caldwell of Randolph county and Benjamin F. Morgan of Wayne county. After the second ballot Mr. Holcombe moved that Mr. Sweeney's nomination be made unanimous. It was so declared.

The business of the convention having been completed, adjournment was ordered. There was in the minds of the assembled delegation an abundance of hopefulness, but positiveness as to victory seemed to be lacking.

The ticket as nominated was composed of strong men, all of them possessing a high degree of personal popularity. A combination of greater cleverness could hardly have been formed. A more admirable selection for the head of the ticket could not have been conceived. Captain John C. Nelson, as man, soldier and lawyer, had the respect and confidence of all who enjoyed the pleasure and good fortune of his acquaintance. But this did not save him from defeat at the November election. Democratic disaffection, attributable to Cleveland's ostentatious flirtation with mugwumpery, rendered Democratic defeat at the polls inevitable. The result of the election for Lieutenant-Governor is thus officially recorded: Colonel R. S. Robertson, Republican, 231,922; Captain John C. Nelson, Democrat, 228,598. The figures as to the other candidates on the two State tickets did not vary much from those credited to the candidates for Lieutenant-Governor.

The election of members of the General Assembly proved unfortunate in this, that on account of its closeness on joint ballot complications arose that are not creditable to the State. What these complications were will be found narrated at length later on.

In the election of Representatives in Congress, the Democrats met with several deplorable losses. They lost out in the Evansville and the Fort Wayne districts. In the latter district there were so many hungry and inferentially thirsty patriots whose appetite Judge-Robert Lowry could not appease that he was defeated in his third race for continuous Congressional service. No man ever so little deserved defeat as did Judge Lowry. He had made many sacrifices for his party, had rendered it much valuable service, was a man of superior ability, and ought to have been kept in Congress as long as his party could retain its ascendancy. But because he was unable to meet the voracious demand for official loaves and fishes he was ruthlessly slaughtered at the polls and mercilessly relegated to private life.

Alvin P. Hovey, Republican, was elected in the First district. Upon his election to the Governorship in 1888 he resigned his seat in Congress and was succeeded by Frank B. Posey, also a Republican. John H. O'Neill, Democrat, succeeded Thomas R. Cobb, Democrat, in the Second. Howard, Holman, Matson and Bynum, all Democrats, were triumphantly re-elected, as were Browne, Johnson, Owen and Steele on the Republican side of the House. Joseph B. Cheadle of Frankfort, a Republican, succeeded Tom Ward in the Lafayette district. James B. White, a popular Fort Wayne grocer, defeated Judge Lowry in the Twelfth. One term satisfied George Ford, of the South Bend district, and he was succeeded by Benjamin F. Shively.

By reason of the commotion created by the refusal of the State Senate to permit the newly-elected Lieutenant-Governor to take his seat and preside over the State Senate, I desired to obtain the version of a gentleman who not only participated in what was done during that exciting period, but who also had the ability and the inclination to state the facts in the case fully and reliably. What he says on this subject in the following pages contains historic information of high value. I doubt if any other Indianian now living could equal in comprehensive completeness the story of the legislative imbroglio of 1887 as written by Judge Timothy E. Howard. Fortunately there has been no recurrence of any such outbreak since those unhappy days of partisan frenzy.

THE LEGISLATURE OF 1887.

(Written upon special request by Hon. Timothy E. Howard, representing St. Joseph county in the State Senate of 1887.)

The Indiana Legislature of 1887 was in many respects one of the most remarkable that ever assembled at the State Capitol. The Senate, as organized, consisted of thirty-one Democrats and nineteen Republicans. The House, as organized, consisted of fifty-two Republicans, forty-four Democrats and four members of the Greenback Labor party. A United States Senator was to be elected at that session to succeed the Hon. Benjamin Harrison, whose term would expire on the fourth day of March, following. No party had a majority of both Houses and the outcome was exceedingly uncertain. The Greenback Labor vote seemed to be able to control the election. As the Houses were organized, the Democrats had a majority in the Senate and the Republicans in the House. The vote in joint convention would be: Democrats 75, Republicans 71, and the third party 4. It was known that three members of the Greenback Labor party would probably favor the Republican candidate rather than the Democrat, while the fourth member had strong Democratic affiliations. Seventy-six would be a majority on joint ballot, and it was of the utmost importance that the Democrats should maintain their plurality of 75 and also gain the vote of one of the third party in order to succeed in the election of a United States Senator. The Republicans having a majority in the House, their plan seemed to be to unseat enough Democrats in that body to secure the needed majority of 76 on joint ballot. They appeared to forget that the Democrats controlled the Senate and might retaliate by unseating such Republican Senators as might be found to have defective titles to their places.

On January 14 the Republicans unseated

Cornelius Meagher in the House and seated a Republican in his place. On January 17 the Senate unseated Senator McDonald, a Republican, and seated a Democrat in his place, thus restoring the relative strength of the parties as it stood before the unseating of Meagher. Both parties then concluded that this suicidal procedure had gone far enough. Senator Kennedy, a Republican farmer, whose own seat was not free from danger, gave his colleagues the safe advice that it was very poor policy to trade four-year-olds for two-year-olds—Republican Senators for Democratic Representatives. Accordingly a modus vivendi was "proposed by the Committee of the Republican Caucus to the Democratic members of the Fifty-first General Assembly," which was accepted by the latter and thereafter acted upon by both parties. One provision of this agreement was, "That the roll of each House is to stand and be called as it existed on Tuesday, January 18, 1887." The Democrats thus secured their seventy-five votes on joint ballot, as the same had been elected by the people.

But to secure the additional vote necessary to make up the seventy-six believed to constitute a majority on joint ballot, care must be taken in nominating a candidate for United States Senator who should be acceptable to at least one of the third party members.

Isaac P. Gray was at the time Governor of the State. General Mahlon D. Manson, a distinguished veteran of the civil war, was elected Lieutenant-Governor with Governor Gray. It was Governor Gray's ambition to be elected United States Senator from Indiana. As General Manson was desirous of becoming Governor of Indiana, it seemed that two laudable ambitions were to be satisfied, Governor Gray going to the Senate and General Manson succeeding to the Governorship. However, certain influential Democrats were unwilling that the Governor's ambition should be gratified, and they sought to have the brave old General resign his office of Lieutenant-Governor and accept a petty Federal office in its place. In a weak moment the General consented, and Governor Gray was too good a Democrat to seek the Senatorial toga without leaving the office of Governor in the hands of a man chosen by the people.

In this dilemma the Governor conceived the idea of seeking the election of Lieutenant-Governor in the place of General Manson. The Attorney-General advised that such an election would be constitutional, and both parties nominated candidates for the office of Lieutenant-Governor, to fill the vacancy left by the resignation of General Manson. But here again Governor Gray was disappointed. The Democratic candidate, Captain John C. Nelson, another civil war veteran and a most competent gentleman, was defeated by the Republican candidate, Colonel Robert S. Robertson.

The House of Representatives recognized the election of Colonel Robertson as Lieutenant-Governor, but the Senate declined to do so, claiming, by resolution duly passed, that there could be no election of Lieutenant-Governor "except at times prescribed in the Constitution," that is, "at the time and place of electing members of the General Assembly in the year 1852, and every four years thereafter." Holding, therefore, that there was no Lieutenant-Governor elected, the Senate refused to allow Colonel Robertson to preside over its deliberations, but continued to recognize Senator Alonzo G. Smith as the only chosen President of the Senate. The case was to be taken to the courts, and in the Marion Circuit Court a temporary restraining order was issued forbidding Colonel Robertson from attempting to preside over the Senate. An appeal was taken from this order to the Supreme Court, where the injunction was dissolved, the Supreme Court holding that the question raised was one for the decision of the Legislature and that the courts had no jurisdiction over it. The case was very elaborately considered in the Supreme Court, all the judges writing separate opinions, and the record extending over eighty pages of the reports. (See 109 Ind. Reports, page 79 to page 159.)

According to the famous agreement heretofore referred to, "proposed by the Committee of the Republican Caucus to the Democratic members of the Fifty-fifth General Assembly," and assented to by the Democrats, the position taken by the Senate, including the rights claimed for Alonzo G. Smith as President of the Senate, was acknowledged, in so far as pertaining to the joint convention of the House and Senate for the election of United States Senator, and in conformity with that agreement the election finally took place.

The Republican candidate was Benjamin Harrison, then filling the office and candidate for re-election. The Democratic candidate was long in doubt. Under the circumstances, Governor Gray refused to be a candidate. It was understood that he desired his friends to vote for William E. Niblack, then one of the judges of the Supreme Court. Joseph E. McDonald, formerly a United States Senator, was also a candidate, and it seemed at first that either of these would be selected. However, when the first vote in the Democratic caucus was announced it was found that five ballots had been cast for David Turpie, also a former United States Senator from Indiana. There was no concert of action on the part of those casting these five votes. It was afterward discovered that the two Representatives and the Senator from St. Joseph county, in deference to the sentiments of their constituents, had cast three of the Turpie votes. The venerable Dr. Thompson, Senator from Marion county, cast the fourth vote, but whose was the fifth is unknown to the writer. After several ballots the friends of Senator McDonald, preferring Mr. Turpie to Judge Niblack, voted solidly for the former, and he was declared the candidate. The nomination of David Turpie proved to be a happy one, in view of the strong labor sentiment in the Legislature. His selection was at the same time received with favor by the friends of the Governor, as well as by those of Judge Niblack and ex-Senator McDonald.

On January 18 the candidates for United States Senator were formally placed in nomination in each House and a vote was taken. The vote in the Senate showed 32 for David Turpie and 18 for Benjamin Harrison. In the House the vote stood: Harrison 53, Turpie 43 and Jackson H. Allen 4. On the next day the two Houses met in joint convention. The party agreement heretofore referred to was presented by the Speaker of the House, as presiding officer, and "was read for the information of the joint convention." By the terms of this agreement the duties of the presiding officer were, in a manner, divided between the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. President Smith was to call the convention to order, while Speaker Warren G. Sayre was to conduct the subsequent proceedings, "no legal right of the said Smith to be thereby waived or affected." The President of the Senate was to order the calling of the Senate roll, and the Speaker of the House the roll of the House. A very important provision was that "The result of the balloting by said joint convention shall be announced by the said Smith, and the Speaker shall thereupon adjourn the joint convention." An express provision was added that Colonel Robertson was "to take no part in the holding of said joint convention, or in anywise to attempt to participate therein."

The first joint ballot showed the vote to be as in the separate vote of the Houses on the previous day, namely: Senators—Turpie 32, Harrison 18. Representatives—Turpie 43, Harrison 53 and Allen 4; total on joint ballot, Turpie 75, Harrison 71 and Allen 4; necessary to choice, 76. A motion was then made to adjourn, which was lost, 74 for and 76 against. On this vote the four third party votes were divided, three voting with the Republicans and one with the Democrats. This vote foreshadowed the final result, namely, that one of the third party men, Mr. Robinson, would, in the end, vote for the Democratic candidate, Mr. Turpie, and so it proved. A second ballot for Senator showed no change. Thereafter, until the second day of February, the two Houses met in joint convention at 12 o'clock each day, taking fifteen ballots in all, without change of result. On February 2, on the sixteenth ballot, the four third party men, as anticipated, voted one for Turpie and three for Harrison, giving Mr. Turpie 76 votes and General Harrison 74 votes. The election of David Turpie was thereupon declared and the joint convention adjourned in a storm of excitement and protest.

The peace agreement, under the terms of which David Turpie was elected United States Senator, having come to an end on his election, and the Supreme Court having decided that the courts had no jurisdiction to decide whether Mr. Robertson had been elected Lieutenant-Governor or not, the old quarrel between the House and Senate on this subject was reopened with more virulence than ever. The court had held that the question was one to be decided by the Legislature and not by the courts. But the Legislature was itself divided on the question. The House maintained that Mr. Robertson was elected in one form by vote of the people, while the Senate contended that, by the terms of the Constitution, there could be no valid election of Lieutenant-Governor except at the four-year periods provided in that instrument for the election of Governor and Lieutenant-Governor.

Accordingly, on February 24, 1887, when Mr. Robertson proceeded to take his place as President of the Senate, by virtue of his office of Lieutenant-Governor, the Senate refused to allow him to take the seat, and on his persisting in his effort, he was led out of the chamber by the door-keeper of the Senate. The result of this action was that the House refused to have any further intercourse with the Senate. More than this, the eighteen Republican Senators, while retaining their seats in the Senate chamber, refused any longer to answer to their names on roll-call or to take any further part in the proceedings of the Senate.

Here arose, it is believed for the first time in an American legislative body, the practice of counting those present and not voting as a part of the quorum necessary to transact business. Ordinarily, the practice had been, in order to determine whether a quorum was present or not, to call the roll, and only those answering to their names on the roll-call were counted as making up the quorum. President Smith, however, directed the clerk to mark as present those actually in their seats and not answering to their names, quite the same as if they answered when their names were called. This practice of "counting a quorum" was at the time stigmatized as arbitrary and even tyrannical, but Speaker Reed, of the United States House of Representatives, afterward resorted to the same practice, and though his action was also criticised, yet the reasonableness of the practice continued to gain favor with deliberative bodies, and Vice-President Marshall has recently "counted a quorum" in the United States Senate by noting the presence in their seats of Senators "present and not voting," even as President Smith did in the Indiana Senate in 1887.

Since, however, the House refused to receive any communication from the Senate after February 24, the usefulness of the Legislature was practically at an end from that date. Still some very necessary legislation was enacted in a peculiar and unusual manner. Though the two Houses did not communicate with one another, yet each was in communication with the Governor, and a few bills were so passed from House to House through the hands of the Governor and thus became laws. The volume of the session laws of 1887 is accordingly a very thin publication, consisting, with tables of contents and indexes, altogether of only seventy-seven pages. It was for a time called, in derision, "Green Smith's primer." It is remarkable, however, that this little volume contains some of the most important laws of the State of Indiana, among them "An Act to Authorize the Erection on the State Grounds at Indianapolis, of Monuments to Thomas A. Hendricks and Schuyler Colfax," both of which have since been erected; "An Act to Regulate the Practice of Dentistry;" "An Act to Establish at Fort Wayne a School for the Feeble-Minded;" "An Act to Establish at Knightstown the Indiana Soldiers and Sailors' Orphans' Home;" and "An Act to Provide for the Erection of a State Soldiers and Sailors' Monument in the Circle Park at Indianapolis." These patriotic laws will always reflect honor upon the Legislature of 1887, as indeed they do upon the great State of Indiana. Notwithstanding the unhappy disagreement between the two Houses, it may confidently be asserted that no Legislature of the State ever contained more eminent men or men whose acts proved in the end of greater benefit to the commonwealth than the wise and brave men of the Legislature of 1887.

The real character of the victory of the Democrats in the Legislature of 1887 has been somewhat obscured by the spectacular nature of some of the circumstances connected with it. The victory did not consist in maintaining Alonzo Greene Smith as President of the Senate. That was an incident, a means to the end to be secured. Neither did the victory consist in the election of David Turpie to the United States Senate. That was the most notable result of Democratic success, but the victory itself was something greater.

The people had elected a Democratic plurality of the Legislature. The membership of that body consisted of seventy-five Democrats, seventy-one Republicans and four Greenback-Labor men. The Democratic victory consisted in maintaining the plurality given to the party by the vote of the people. The Republicans, by their control of the House, proposed to unseat Democrats in that body and thus upset the verdict of the people. No secret was made of this purpose. The determination to elect General Harrison could not be more emphatically asserted than it was if the Republicans themselves had the plurality, or even the majority, in the Legislature. Nor did they conceal the means by which this result was to be accomplished. They would unseat Democratic Representatives enough for the purpose. A large number of Democrats in the House were notified that their seats were to be contested. The causes alleged were generally of the flimsiest character. For example, Representatives William H. Stull and Edward A. Metzger, of St. Joseph county, were to be unseated, although one had received over 80 majority and the other over 100. The reason for this extraordinary proposition was based on an accident in transmitting a telegraphic dispatch from South Bend. In answer to an inquiry from Indianapolis, this reply, in substance, was sent: "Stull and Metzger have been elected by a fair majority." The telegram as received at Indianapolis read, "Stull and Metzger have been elected by four majority." It was accordingly concluded that, in a contest, these four votes could be thrown out and the two Democrats could be unseated. Under such circumstances the Democrats in the Senate proposed to use their power in that body to fight fire with fire and so preserve the plurality given them by the people. The Republicans evidently did not think the Democrats would attempt to go so far. Besides, the Republicans would have the Lieutenant-Governor to preside over the Senate, and through his power the Senate majority would be unable to carry out its plans. That boast sealed the fate of the Lieutenant-Governor. He would not be allowed to preside over the Senate. The Senate would retain its own presiding officer and so carry out the will of the majority in preserving the Democratic plurality of seventy-five votes on joint ballot. Whether the Democrats would secure the additional vote necessary to elect a United States Senator might be uncertain, but they would at all events retain their plurality of seventy-five as given to them by the people. This was the grim resolution reached by the Democratic caucus, and this resolution was carried out. The true victory of the Democrats of the Legislature of 1887 was the vindication of popular elections by the people. That Colonel Robertson was not allowed to preside over the Senate was a mere incident; that David Turpie was elected to the United States Senate was a result of the Democratic victory—not the victory itself.

Another result of this victory was the enthusiasm aroused in the Democratic masses of the State. They felt that they were represented in the General Assembly by courageous men, that their votes at the ballot box were made to count. Time had been when Democratic officials were cowed, were made to be subservient. That day was passed. Democrats were thenceforth manly men, ready to stand by their principles, to carry out the will of their constituents by all lawful means. The victory of the Democrats of 1887 was a vindication of popular representative government. The spirit then aroused has since continued to animate the Democracy of Indiana.

THE SUPREME COURT'S ACTION IN THE PREMISES.

When this "celebrated case" was taken into the Supreme Court, that tribunal was composed of Judges William E. Niblack, George V. Howk, Byron K. Elliott, Allen Zollars and Joseph A. S. Mitchell—all Democrats except Elliott. The court seemed inclined to make short work of it by declaring that the points involved were for legislative, not for judicial procedure. This conclusion greatly incensed extreme partisans on both sides of the political fence. Among those coming within this category was William J. Craig, then in control of the Indianapolis Sentinel. The readers of that paper were shocked to find in the Sentinel of the day after the court had made known its conclusions an editorial headed: "Damn Their Cowardly Souls." This outburst of vehemence and profanity caused a sensation throughout the State, eliciting much unfavorable comment and in some instances severe criticism. Naturally of conservative trend of mind, the bitterness engendered over this issue was deeply deplored in my discussion of the various aspects of the case. The articles emanating from my pen, relating to this subject, were extensively reproduced with generous recognition of their fairness. Judge Mitchell himself felt impelled to send me this note of appreciation and approval:

"Indianapolis, January 10, 1887.

"My Dear Friend—That you have the right view of the Lieutenant-Governor question is, I think, beyond all question. For purely personal ends the question has been forced upon the party, and my own opinion is that the party will inevitably suffer. If the consequences could be confined to the disappointment of the schemers who involved us (the party) in the complications, it would not be a matter of much regret, but, as usual, men who have worked unselfishly all their lives for the success and elevation of the party suffer the consequences of the stupidity, and worse, of those who are always ready when anything is to be had. I thank you for sustaining the court. I have all my life abhorred decisions made for partisan purposes and cannot now, at any cost, give the lie to my professions.

"Your friend,

"J. A. S. MITCHELL.

"Hon. J. B. Stoll, South Bend."

COL. COURTLAND C. MATSON NAMED FOR GOVERNOR

CAPT. WM. R. MYERS HIS RUNNING MATE—CLEVELAND AND THURMAN IN THE NATIONAL RACE

THE Senatorial fight in Indiana in 1887 attracted a great deal of attention throughout the country. It gave much prominence to General Benjamin Harrison, not only because his own reelection was involved in the contest, but because he delivered before the Supreme Court of Indiana an argument in support of the contention that the people having elected Colonel Robert S. Robertson of Fort Wayne as Lieutenant-Governor, his exclusion from that office was an act of usurpation of power indefensible from any standpoint it might be viewed. This speech, it was generally contended, constituted Harrison's masterpiece and doubtless contributed largely to his nomination to the Presidency by the Republicans in 1888.

The Democratic State Convention for 1888 was held on April 26. It was presided over by Charles L. Jewett, of New Albany, who soon demonstrated his ability to preside acceptably and capably over a largely-attended political assemblage.

PLATFORM DECLARATIONS.

"We congratulate the people of the whole country upon the eminently successful administration of President Cleveland.

"Coming into power under circumstances peculiarly difficult and embarrassing, after a long period of Republican rule, he has conducted the affairs of the executive department with such prudence and ability as to challenge the approval of all unprejudiced people.

"That he has earnestly labored to discharge the duties of his great office in the interest of all the people there can be no question. That he has succeeded so well is a source of pride and gratification to those who elected him, as it should be to all his countrymen. Not even party malice dares to assail his honesty or integrity, and all his acts have not only been clean, but above suspicion.

"The country is at peace with all the world, the laws are faithfully administered, good order and economy prevail wherever the executive has control, and the whole country is enjoying remarkable prosperity under his wise and beneficent administration; therefore the Democracy of Indiana feels that it would be unwise to risk the hazard of a change and declare themselves emphatically in favor of his re-election.

"The Democratic party of Indiana favors such rules and regulations for the civil service, both national and State, as will secure honest, capable and deserving public officers, but, where honesty, ability and merit are equal, we believe there would be both wisdom and justice in giving preference to those who would harmonize in principle and policy with the party having the responsibility of administration.

"We recognize the right of all men to organize for social or material advancement; the right of wage-workers to use all lawful means to protect themselves against the encroachments of moneyed monopolists and the right to fix a price for their labor commensurate with the work required of them, and we hold that every man has the right to dispose of his own labor upon such terms as he may think will best promote his interests. In relations between capital and labor the Democratic party favors such measures and policies as will promote harmony between them and will adequately protect the interests of both.

"It is provided by the constitution of this State that the liberty of the people should be protected and that their private property should not be taken without just compensation, and we are opposed to any change in the constitution tending to weaken these safeguards, or to any legislation which asserts the power to take or destroy the private property of any portion of the people of this State without compensation, or which unjustly interferes with their personal liberty as to what they shall eat or drink or as to the kind of clothing they shall wear, believing that the government should be administered in that way best calculated to confer the greatest good upon the greatest number without sacrificing the rights of persons or property, and leaving the innocent creeds, habits, customs and business of the people unfettered by sumptuary laws, class legislation or extortionate monopolies. While standing faithfully by the rights of property and personal liberty guaranteed to the people by the constitution, we distinctly declare that we are in favor of sobriety and temperance, and all proper means for the promotion of these virtues, but we believe that a well regulated license system, and reasonable and just laws upon that subject, faithfully enforced, would be better than extreme measures which, being subversive of personal liberty and in conflict with public sentiment, would never be effectively executed, thus bringing law into disrepute and tending to make sneaks and hypocrites of our people.

"We unqualifiedly condemn the action of the Republican party in the last General Assembly of the State of Indiana in their revolutionary scheme to unseat Democratic members, and thus obstruct needful legislation and subvert the will of the people as expressed at the ballot box, and we heartily commend and endorse the action of the Democratic members thereof in their successful effort to preserve that majority.

"The Democratic party of Indiana believes in fair elections and an honest count, and deplores and holds up for the detestation of the people the supreme fraud of 1876-7 by which the will of the people was set aside and men not elected were placed in two of the most important offices of the country; also for the use of vast sums of money in controlling and corrupting the elections in 1880, which leading men of that party have admitted reached the enormous sum of $400,000 in this State alone;

also for setting the bad example in various other ways of carrying elections by unfair and unlawful methods, both in this State and elsewhere.

"Resolved, That our confidence and esteem for the Hon. Daniel W. Voorhees and the Hon. David Turpie, our great representatives in the United States Senate, continues unabated, and we cheerfully greet them and their Democratic associates from Indiana in the House of Representatives with the plaudit, 'Well done, good and faithful public servants.'

"We heartily indorse the pure and able administration of Governor Isaac P. Gray, and commend him to the Democratic National Convention as the choice of the Democracy of Indiana for Vice-President, and hereby instruct our delegates to present his name to the convention for that high office, and to cast their votes for him as a unit while his name is before the National Convention as a candidate."

STATE TICKET PUT IN NOMINATION.

There was a spirited yet entirely friendly contest over the nomination for Governor. The contestants were Colonel Courtland C. Matson of Greencastle and Captain W. R. Myers of Anderson. The former had been sent to Congress four times; the latter once. Matson was nominated on the first ballot, the vote standing 762½ for Matson, 458½ for Myers. Matson's nomination was made unanimous.

For Lieutenant-Governor, Captain William R. Myers was, on motion of Judge David S. Gooding, nominated by acclamation. In like manner Robert W. Miers of Bloomington was nominated for Secretary of State.

Three candidates were entered for the State Auditorship: Charles A. Munson of Fort Wayne, Hugh Dougherty of Bluffton and Eli W. Brown of Columbia City. On the first ballot Munson had 624 votes, Dougherty 442½, Brown 118, James 46½. On motion of Mr. Dougherty, the nomination of Charles A. Munson was made unanimous.

For State Treasurer, Thomas B. Byrnes of Evansville was nominated by acclamation.

The race for the Attorney-Generalship was quite spirited. There were four entries: John R. Wilson of Indianapolis, Senator Alonzo Greene Smith of North Vernon, Judge O. J. Glessner of Shelbyville and Judge James McCabe of Warren county. After the second ballot Senator Smith moved that the nomination of Mr. Wilson be made by acclamation. This was seconded by Judge McCabe and the convention so declared without dissent.

As in 1882, Judge William E. Niblack was again honored with a renomination for the supreme bench for the First district. For the Second district Judge George V. Howk was renominated by the decisive vote of 922 as against 309 for Hugh D. McMullen of Dearborn county. For the Fourth district Judge Allen Zollars was also renominated on the first ballot, he receiving 1,029 votes as against 202 votes cast for William H. Carroll of Grant county.

In the main the convention was harmonious and fairly but not boisterously enthusiastic.

CLEVELAND AND THURMAN NOMINATED AT ST. LOUIS.

There is substantial agreement among those who attended the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis that it was a decidedly tame affair. Everybody took it for granted that Grover Cleveland would be renominated by acclamation, and that whomsoever his campaign managers might name as his running mate would be chosen. How and in what spirit this was done is thus told by Colonel A. K. McClure, who was there:

"The Democratic National Convention of 1888 met at St. Louis on June 5, and it was the most perfunctory body of the kind I have ever witnessed. I never saw a national political body so entirely devoid of enthusiasm, yet it was entirely fixed in its purpose to renominate President Cleveland. He appealed strongly to the convictions and judgment of the party, but not to its affection or enthusiasm. He was nominated by a unanimous vote without the formality of a ballot, and it had been settled long before the convention met that the sturdy old Roman of Ohio, ex-Senator Thurman, should be the candidate for the second place, as Vice-President Hendricks had died in office.

"Patrick A. Collins of Massachusetts was permanent president of the body, and there were no questions of rules or party policy to excite discussion. Cleveland's nomination was unanimous, and on the single ballot for Vice-President, Allen G. Thurman of Ohio had 690 votes to 105 for Isaac P. Gray of Indiana, and 25 for John C. Black of Illinois."

In regard to the campaign of 1888, I am also going to let Colonel McClure tell the story. He does it fairly in these words:

"The contest of 1888 differed from the Cleveland contest of 1884 in its freedom from vituperation and bitterness. It was conducted with earnestness and dignity on both sides. Neither of the candidates greatly enthused the rank and file of their party, as did Blaine and Hancock in former national conflicts, but they commanded not only the entire confidence and respect of their parties, but also of the whole country. Cleveland took little personal part in the conflict, but Harrison made a most vigorous and telling campaign by his almost daily speeches delivered to visiting delegations at Indianapolis, in which he discussed every phase of the public questions of the day. These addresses were doubtless carefully prepared and given to the Associated Press, but they were not only very able, but they were singularly versatile and adroit, and presented Harrison to the public in an entirely new light. I cannot recall another Presidential contest that was conducted on both sides with greater dignity and decency than that between Cleveland and Harrison in 1888. Nearly equal respect was shown to both candidates in the Garfield-Hancock contest of 1880, but the famous forgery of the Morey letter to control the vote of the Pacific States against Garfield and the Credit Mobilier scandal marred the dignity of that conflict."

The vote of Indiana for President and Governor is here given:

|--------------------------------------|---------|
| Benjamin Harrison, Republican..... | 263,361 |
| Grover Cleveland, Democrat..... | 261,013 |
| Clinton B. Fisk, Prohibitionist..... | 9,881 |
| Alson J. Streeter, Union Labor..... | 2,694 |

FOR GOVERNOR.

| | |
|---------------------------------------|---------|
| Alvin P. Hovey, Republican..... | 263,194 |
| Courtland C. Matson, Democrat..... | 260,994 |
| Jasper S. Hughes, Prohibitionist..... | 9,920 |
| John B. Milroy, Labor Union..... | 2,702 |

FOR LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR.

|-------------------------------------|---------|
| Ira J. Chase, Republican..... | 263,166 |
| William R. Myers, Democrat..... | 261,011 |
| John W. Baxter, Prohibitionist..... | 10,066 |
| Hiram Maine, Union Labor..... | 2,737 |

The pluralities were: Hovey over Matson, 2,200; Chase over Myers, 2,155; Charles F. Griffin over Robert W. Miers for Secretary of State, 2,319; Julius A. Lemcke over Thomas B. Byrnes for Treasurer of State, 2,374; Bruce Carr over Charles A. Munson for State Auditor, 1,946.

In the election of members of Congress the Republicans fared badly this year. They succeeded in electing only three of their thirteen nominees. These three were Thomas M. Browne in the Sixth, Joseph B. Cheadle in the Ninth, William D. Owen in the Tenth. New men chosen by the Democrats were William F. Parrett in the First, George W. Cooper in the Fifth, Elijah V. Brookshire in the Eighth, Augustus N. Martin in the Eleventh, Charles A. O. McClellan in the Twelfth. Democrats re-elected were O'Neill, Holman, Bynum and Shively.

The 1888 campaign in Indiana was not an overly exciting one. A good deal of stress was laid upon the fact that for the first time in its history Indiana had been honored with a Presidential nomination in the person of Benjamin Harrison. State pride was strongly appealed to, but judging from the slight difference in the votes cast for General Harrison for President and General Hovey for Governor this appeal to State pride did not sway many voters.

It is worthy of note that General Alvin

Peterson Hovey, the Republican nominee for Governor, was in former years a Democrat of considerable prominence. He was admitted to the bar in 1842, commissioned first lieutenant in 1846 for service in the war with Mexico, elected a delegate to the Constitutional Convention of Indiana, 1850; Circuit Judge, 1851-1854; was defeated as Democratic nominee for Supreme Judge in 1854, but by Governor Wright appointed to fill a vacancy in that tribunal; appointed United States District Attorney by President Pierce in 1856 and removed by President Buchanan in 1858; served with distinction in the Union army until 1865; commissioned as United States Minister to the Republic of Peru in 1865; resigned in 1870; elected to Congress in 1886, serving until January 17, 1889, when he resigned to be inaugurated as Governor of Indiana, to which position he had been elected a few months before. He served as Governor until his death in Indianapolis, November 23, 1891, and was succeeded by Lieutenant-Governor Ira J. Chase, who became Acting-Governor for the remainder of the term and was succeeded by Claude Matthews, Democrat, in January, 1893.

Hovey's unsuccessful competitor in the gubernatorial race of 1888, Courtland C. Matson, was born at Brookville, Ind., April 25, 1841; the son of John A. Matson, who, during the forties, as nominee of the Whig party, made an unsuccessful race for the Governorship of Indiana. Young Matson graduated from Asbury University (now De Pauw) in 1862; enlisted as a private in the Sixteenth Indiana Volunteers, and after one year's service entered the Indiana Sixth Cavalry, served until October, 1865, and rose to the rank of colonel. After the war he qualified himself for the law; was three times elected Prosecuting Attorney; served as Chairman of the Democratic State Committee in 1878, and was for four successive terms elected to Congress. Upon his retirement from Congressional service he resumed the practice of law. Governor Marshall appointed him a State Tax Commissioner, which position he filled most acceptably for a term of four years. At this writing (August, 1915,) he is a resident of Chicago. He is highly esteemed as a man of pure character and inflexible integrity.

Col. Matson died in Chicago from the effects of an operation, September 4, 1915. Burial at Greencastle.

POLITICAL PENDULUM AGAIN SWINGS

IN THE DIRECTION OF IRREPRESSIBLE DEMOCRACY—
A SWEEPING VICTORY IN 1890

DELEGATED as one of the trustees of the Institute for the Education of the Blind in part to represent Indiana at the National Conference of Correction and Charities for 1889, at Baltimore, I concluded, at the close of the deliberations of that gathering, to run over to the National Capital with a view to mingling with the statesmen and absorbing some of the political wisdom that permeates the atmosphere in that locality. The famous Kentucky journalist, George D. Prentice, used to say in his inimitable style that he never got in sight of the National Capital but that he experienced an irresistible longing to steal something. Though making, in my younger days, frequent pilgrimages to the Capital of the Nation, I never experienced any such longing as Prentice facetiously ascribed to himself. On the contrary, I always congratulated myself on carefully guarding my usually scant yet adequate supply of legal tender to meet my modest requirements.

Upon meeting Senator Voorhees, that whole-souled, big-hearted statesman invited me to take a ride with him on the following morning. He said that while out riding, away from the haunts and immune from being importuned for this or that, afforded the best of opportunities for quietly and uninterruptedly talking matters over, comparing notes, etc. At the appointed hour we started out on our journey. It did not take long for the Senator to unburden his mind and to pour out his soul. He started out by inquiring whether I had given any thought to the make-up of the Democratic State ticket for next year. In answer I told him that some very excellent men had announced their readiness to go on the ticket, among them Captain W. J. Hilligoss, formerly editor of the Huntington Democrat and later on in charge of the Citizens street railroad at Muncie, who would consider himself honored by being nominated for Secretary of State. "That's the very position about which I feel deeply concerned," the Senator replied. "I have given the political situation in Indiana much earnest thought and have reached the conclusion that the welfare of our party demands the nomination of some intelligent farmer to head the ticket. I have such a man in mind. He lives in my part of the State, in an adjoining county. You must have met him at our State convention in 1880, when he was persuaded to offer himself as a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor. Political conditions then made his nomination impossible. As you know, the nomination for that office was thrust upon Colonel Isaac P. Gray. The man who, in my judgment, ought to head our ticket for 1890 is Claude Matthews, a progressive farmer in Vermilion county, and in all respects qualified for the office of Secretary of State and capable of conducting a campaign creditably and effectively. He is a native of Kentucky; his wife is a daughter of former Governor and United States Senator Whitcomb, in his day the idol of Indiana Democracy. I appreciate fully your relations to Captain Hilligoss as a fellow-newspaper man, but on the other hand you must admit that in politics we cannot always be governed by personal relations or personal feeling. An emergency exists that points unerringly to duty to nominate a man like Claude Matthews to head our ticket in 1890. I don't like to ask you to sacrifice personal friendship; I wouldn't urge this matter upon you with so much earnestness; but you and I have been in political life long enough to know that there are times when the strongest personal friendships must be subordinated to political emergency and party necessity. That is the situation now with us in Indiana, and I am making this appeal to you because I regard it a duty so to do. On your return home think this matter over. If at all compatible with your ideas of party expediency, publish a ringing editorial in your paper setting forth the reasons why Mr. Matthews should be nominated. I feel assured such an article from your pen will accomplish the purpose I have so much at heart."

Any one having for any length of time sustained close relations to big-hearted, large-brained, ever generous Dan Voorhees can readily understand that such an appeal could not be withstood. I wilted; I acquiesced. Without even opening any correspondence with Mr. Matthews, I vigorously espoused his cause personally and through the columns of my paper. The support he received from the northern counties, in which he was wholly unknown, secured his nomination on the second ballot. It is due to the memory of my good friend, Captain Hilligoss, long since gathered to his fathers, to say that upon explaining to him the reasons that impelled me to champion the nomination of Claude Matthews he gave the gratifying assurance that he bore me no ill-feeling, and I believe he meant what he said, although I thought there was just a tinge of poignancy in his remark: "If you had kept out of this fight I would easily have secured the nomination."

August 28 was the date fixed for the holding of the convention. The permanent organization was made to consist of ex-Governor Isaac P. Gray, chairman; Captain John C. Nelson of Logansport, principal secretary.

Vice-Presidents—W. N. Underwood, Perry county; Elijah Sanford, Knox;

James A. Cravens, Washington; E. G. Nicholson, Jefferson; J. J. Smiley, Putnam; George W. Goodwin, Henry; Charles A. Henderson, Madison; C. W. Ward, Vermillion; Henry C. Harris, Benton; Charles R. Pollard, Carroll; James C. Branhan, Huntington; W. F. McNagny, Whitley; A. G. Wood, Kosciusko.

Assistant Secretaries—L. M. Wade, Posey county; John Johnson, Jr., Lawrence; Josiah Gwin, Floyd; M. W. Fish, Ohio; J. W. Cravens, Monroe; D. W. McKee, Fayette; A. L. Major, Shelby; George W. Tipton, Fountain; J. M. Whistler, Hamilton; J. A. Rothrock, White; W. J. Houck, Grant; Wright Rockhill, Allen; James C. Fletcher, Knox.

THE PLATFORM.

The platform adopted by this convention was a hummer. It contained twenty-eight paragraphs or planks. There is snap and ginger in every sentence. This vigorous pronunciamento is herewith in part reproduced verbatim, the remainder being given in epitomized form:

"We, the Democracy of Indiana, in convention assembled for the first time since the memorable contest of 1888, when we went down in defeat but not in dishonor, overcome by the shameless methods of Dudleyism and the blocks-of-five, do solemnly declare:

"That the electoral vote of Indiana was obtained for Harrison and Morton by the most flagrant crimes against the ballot box ever perpetrated in an American commonwealth; that these crimes were committed under the direct auspices of William Wade Dudley, then and now Treasurer of the National Republican Committee, and by the procurement and connivance of Republican leaders in this State and in the Nation; that the administration of Benjamin Harrison has made itself an accessory after the fact to these crimes by shielding the criminals from punishment, and even by rewarding them for their knavery; and that the brazen prostitution of the machinery of the Federal court for the district of Indiana, by its judges and attorney, to the protection of these conspirators against the suffrage, constitutes the most infamous chapter in the judicial annals of the Republic. The Federal court of Indiana has decided that advising and organizing bribery is not a crime. We appeal from the decision to the people of Indiana, and we demand a verdict against William A. Woods, and the miscreants whom he saved from legal punishment.

"We denounce the administration of Benjamin Harrison for its deliberate abandonment of civil service reform; for its use of Cabinet positions and other high stations in payment of financial campaign debts; for treating the public patronage as a family appendage instead of a public trust, and quartering a host of relatives, by blood and by marriage, upon the national treasury; for dismissing honest and competent public servants in violation of solemn pledges, because of their political opinions, and filling their places with men devoid of character or capacity and whose only title to preferment rested upon disreputable partisan work; for its dalliance with questionable gift enterprises; for its complete subservience to Wall street and the money power, and its undisguised hostility or indifference to the rights and interests of the producing and laboring masses.

"We denounce the tariff monopolists for their efforts to perpetuate themselves in power by measures inconsistent with free institutions and contrary to good morals. We find in the force election bill, the bills creating rotten borough States and the McKinley tariff bill, the open manifestations of a gigantic conspiracy of the minority to oppress a groaning people with additional burdens of taxation for private benefit and to fasten it onto the country in such a way that the people cannot free themselves from the galling load.

"We condemn the Republican party for the deliberate theft of two seats in the Senate of the United States from the people of Montana; for degrading the House of Representatives from a deliberate body into a one-man despotism under the false and hypocritical pretense of expediting the public business; for unseating legally elected representatives of the people in order to strengthen a partisan majority, which was originally the product of fraud; for trampling upon the rights of the minority in disregard as well as justice and decency as of parliamentary usage and the plain requirements of the Constitution; and for reckless prodigality in appropriations, which has converted the surplus accumulated under the wise, frugal and statesmanlike administration of Grover Cleveland into a deficit of alarming dimensions, involving in the near future a further heavy increase of the people's burden.

"We denounce the McKinley tariff bill as the most outrageous measure of taxation ever proposed in the American Congress. It will increase taxes upon the necessities of life and reduce taxes upon the luxuries. It will make life harder for every farmer and wage-earner in the land in order that the profits of the monopolies and trusts may be swelled. It affords no relief whatever to the agricultural interests of the country, already staggering under the heavy burdens of protection; in the words of James G. Blaine, 'It will not open a market for a single bushel of wheat or a single barrel of pork.' We are opposed to legislation which compels Indiana farmers to pay bounties to the sugar planters and silk growers of other States. We are opposed to class legislation of every kind; to subsidies and bounties of every description and in every disguise. We are in favor of that wide measure of commercial freedom proposed by Grover Cleveland which would benefit the farmers and laborers of the entire country, instead of that limited measure of so-called reciprocity offered by Mr. Blaine, which would benefit only a few Eastern manufacturers. So long as the Government depends for support in any degree upon a tariff, we demand that it be levied for revenue only, and so far as possible upon the luxuries of the classes, instead of the necessities of the masses.

"We are rejoiced at the evidences of an awakening of the farmers of the country to the necessity for organized efforts to better their own condition and protect themselves against unjust legislation and oppressive administration. We invite attention to the fact that farmers are demanding, in substance, the same measures of relief which the Democratic party has been advocating for years, but has not had the power to enact, and that the surest and speediest way of obtaining this relief is to restore the Democracy to power in every department of the Government.

"We favor the election of United States Senators by the people.

"We endorse most heartily the legislation of the General Assembly of 1889. We applaud the election reform laws and pledge ourselves to their support and full enforcement. We applaud the school textbook laws by which the people are given school books at one-half their former price. We favor such additional legislation as will give full effect to the objects of this act, and will extend its scope as far as practicable, and pledge ourselves to resist every attempt of the school book trust to regain its old control over our public schools. We favor such simplification of the school laws affecting township trustees and county superintendents, and their duties as will increase their efficiency and decrease expenses.

"We applaud the State Board of Charities law, and commend the excellent work done by that board in improving the conditions and methods of our benevolent and reformatory institutions. The creation of our splendid system of public charities, and their honest and efficient management, constitutes one of the strongest titles of the Indiana Democracy to popular confidence and support.

"The State debt obligations should not be hawked over the country, but should be made a popular domestic security, issued direct to the people of the State in bonds of small denomination, drawing a low rate of interest, and non-taxable, that the interest paid may remain at home, and the securities may be made a safe investment for trust funds and the people's savings.

"We demand the adoption of a system of equalizing the appraisement of real and personal property in this State, to the end that an equal and proper uniformity in such assessments shall be secured, for the reason that under existing regulations many counties are compelled to pay an unjust proportion of the State's expenses, which others as unjustly escape.

"Judges Coffey, Berkshire and Olds, Republican members of the supreme bench, deserve the contempt of the people of Indiana for their action in overturning the settled construction of the Constitution, reversing all legal precedents and contradicting their own rulings for the sake of a few petty offices and at the dictation of unscrupulous political tricksters.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that hereafter the members of the State Central Committee shall be chosen on the 8th of January of each alternate year (commencing in the year 1892) by the voters of the respective congressional districts represented by delegates appointed by the respective counties, and such delegates shall assemble at the call of the chairman of the State Central Committee. The members of the State Central Committee thus chosen shall hold their position for two years and until their successors are respectively elected."

The platform in vigorous terms condemns a lot of things charged against the Republican party. So numerous and so grave are the offenses alleged against the party then in power that it must be assumed to have reached the acme of misconduct. Condemnation is pronounced upon force election bills as destructive of home rule and local self-government; upon sectionalism and bayonet rule; upon partisan returning boards; upon violation of the Andrews election law. Then comes denunciation of the then recently enacted silver bill and demand for the free and unrestricted coinage of silver upon the basis existing prior to 1873. Still more liberal pension laws are demanded. Demand for legislation to prohibit alien ownership is reiterated. Farmers' institutes praised and commended. Funding of school debt is lauded. Republican officials and newspapers are charged with conspiracy to destroy the State's credit for partisan purposes. The eight-hour labor law is applauded and the importation of Pinkerton detectives denounced. Fees and perquisites for officers are condemned and fair salaries for all public officials favored. Interference with parochial schools deprecated and denounced. Township libraries strongly approved. The course of Senators Voorhees and Turpie most heartily approved and commended.

The committee that drafted and reported these resolutions was composed of John G. Shanklin, Lycurgus Dalton, Jason B. Brown, Charles E. Korbly, Eb. Henderson, Robert Dora, Samuel E. Morss, John E. Lamb, T. J. Terhune, Milton L. Humpston, J. M. Smith, D. C. Fawcett and David

R. Leeper. Three of them were newspaper men, one an author and one a member of Congress. They certainly knew how to construct a platform with plenty of bark on it.

STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

1. Anthony Stevenson, Spencer county.
2. James M. Andrew, Orange.
3. Alvin P. Smith, Harrison.
4. William H. O'Brien, Dearborn.
5. John W. Ragsdale, Franklin.
6. Thomas J. Study, Wayne.
7. D. W. Berg, Madison.
8. James M. Haskins, Clay.
9. David F. Allen, Clinton.
10. Benjamin F. Louthain, Cass.
11. Jerome Herff, Miami.
12. Herman Freygang, Steuben.
13. Martin T. Krueger, Laporte.

Nominations being declared next in order, George W. Shanklin of Evansville placed in nomination for the office of Secretary of State Claude Matthews of Vermilion county; Judge Lotz proposed Captain W. J. Hilligoss of Muncie; John R. East named James B. Clark, and Thomas F. Wilson put in nomination Colonel John Lee of Crawfordsville. The trend ran unmistakably in favor of Farmer Matthews, who was duly nominated on the second ballot. On motion of Captain Hilligoss the nomination was made unanimous.

For Auditor of State, Paul Hyatt named George S. Green of Vincennes; Cyrus E. Davis presented the name of James C. Lavelle of Daviess county, and Newton B. Smith put in nomination the winner, John Oscar Henderson of Kokomo. The vote stood: Henderson, 675; Lavelle, 375; Green, 253. Henderson's nomination was made unanimous.

The race for State Treasurer was a very spirited one. Placed before the convention were: Albert Gall of Indianapolis, Henry C. Berghoff of Fort Wayne, Thomas B. Byrnes of Evansville and James R. Slack, Jr., of Huntington. The contest from beginning to end was between Gall and Berghoff. Four ballots were required to produce a nomination. Gall proved a winner and was on motion of Mr. Berghoff declared the unanimous choice of the convention.

For Attorney-General, Alonzo Green Smith was nominated on the first ballot, the vote standing in his favor 787½ to 515½ for James McCabe of Warren.

For the Supreme Judgeship there was no contest. The unanimous sentiment of the party ran in favor of the renomination of Judge Joseph A. S. Mitchell. And it was so decreed by the convention. At the same time there existed a strong feeling throughout the State in favor of paving the way for his nomination, in the near future, for the Governorship. Having for years sustained very close relations to Judge Mitchell, I touched upon this subject in one of my communications as well as in some editorial references to the probabilities of future political action. This elicited the following unequivocal declarations as to his inclinations in private and public life:

"Indianapolis, February 20, 1890.

"My Dear Friend: I cannot but express to you the obligations I am under for your uniform courtesy and kindness to me covering a period of twenty years and more, and especially for the generous mention you have recently made of my name in connection with the Gubernatorial office. I assure you I am not insensible to expressions of confidence coming from one in whom the Democracy of the State repose well merited confidence, and whose course I have watched with pride and pleasure almost from boyhood. I do not want to be a candidate for Governor. My tastes are waning more and more from old time political strife, and while my preference would be to go back to my private business, I can only say if my friends wish me to accept a renomination for the office I am now occupying I would very much prefer that to any other office in the gift of the people of the State. It is in the line of work to which I have devoted my life, and if my friends think I have discharged the duties acceptably I would gratefully accept a renomination. This letter is of course for your eye alone, but you may say in your paper what you think appropriate with the assurance of the continuance of the personal esteem and regard of your friend,

"J. A. S. MITCHELL.

"P. S.—I have written this in great haste, hoping soon to see you."

Triumphantly re-elected to the exalted position to which he was originally assigned by the people of Indiana in 1884, that insidious foe of mankind, gallstone, had so undermined his otherwise superb physical condition that before the expiration of his first term the Grim Reaper cut short his useful earthly career. Death relieved him of intense suffering in the month of December, 1890.

Joseph A. S. Mitchell was born at Mercersburg, Franklin county, Pennsylvania, December 2, 1837. Upon attaining boyhood he worked on a farm, had the benefit of a common school education, taught school for a time and later on acquired higher educational knowledge at Blandsville, Ill., and Chambersburg, Pa. In the latter institution he fitted himself for the law. After his admission to the bar he practiced for a short time, traveled for a few months in the South and then located at Goshen, Ind. In response to the call of President Lincoln he enlisted in the Second Indiana Cavalry, serving two full years. For meritorious and gallant conduct he was promoted to a captaincy and later on assigned to duty on the staff of General McCook, which position he held to the close of the civil war. Returning from the seat of war, he resumed his residence at Goshen to again take up the practice of law in partnership with John H. Baker. He served as deputy prosecuting attorney and was elected mayor in 1872 and re-elected in 1874. In conjunction with Benjamin Harrison and Aaron Dyer he represented the Indiana Bar Association at Saratoga in 1879. Recognition of his eminent fitness for the place led to his nomination for Supreme Judge in 1880. With the rest of the ticket that year he was defeated. Four years later he was again nominated for the Supreme Judgeship and triumphantly elected. In the discharge of his judicial duties he gained the reputation of a "most righteous judge" and an exceptionally able expounder of the law. For a number of years he filled most acceptably the position of trustee of De Pauw University.

The mutations of politics worked some notable results during the 1880-1890 decade in the make-up of the Supreme Court. William E. Niblack and George V. Howk were elected in the Tilden campaign of 1876 and re-elected in 1882. This extended their tenure to 1889—twelve years. The Garfield triumph in 1880 brought on the bench William A. Woods and Byron K. Elliott. Woods was transferred to the Federal bench, resigning May 8, 1883. Edwin P. Hammond was appointed in Woods' place. Allen Zollars was elected in 1882 and served one full term of six years. Joseph A. S. Mitchell was elected in 1884, re-elected in 1900, and died in December of that year. The Harrison victory in 1888 resulted in the election of three Republican judges—John G. Berkshire, Silas D. Coffey and Walter Olds. Berkshire died after being on the bench two years and Olds resigned about the same time to become a corporation attorney.

WHAT WAS WORRYING SENATOR VOORHEES.

Some time before the meeting of the State convention I received a letter written by Senator Voorhees in his own hand, instead of being dictated and type-written as had become the custom and practice with members of Congress. It may be observed that Senator Voorhees at times became very gloomy and despondent. In all probability he was in that frame of mind when he penned the letter herewith reproduced. It hadn't been so very long since we had been out riding in and about Washington discussing State politics and I being an attentive listener to the Senator's irresistible plea for the nomination of Claude Matthews for Secretary of State, yet he seemed to have regarded that a long interval. But here is the letter; it affords highly interesting reading and illustrates anew how appearances and conjectures may bow down the heart and fill it with dire forebodings of impending disaster:

"My Dear Mr. Stoll: The sight of your familiar handwriting is good for my weary eyes and jaded spirits. I am sore at heart that I have not seen you for so long a time. The truth is that for a year after the election of 1888 I carried the effects of that hard campaign in my continued ill health, but I have now rounded the danger point and feel that I am my old self again. I am working hard and shall try to make a good record this session. At the same time the outlook here as to national politics is very dark to my mind. Under the ruling in the House there is nothing to stop this Republican Congress from enacting laws with which to control the results in every Southern State and there is not a doubt that such is their purpose at this time. The conspiracy is far-reaching, looking to the perpetuation of the Republican party in power and the overthrow of our system of State governments. Nothing so grave and perilous to my mind has occurred since the war as the issue presented here now. I wish I could talk it over with you. Can't you run on here for a few days? I would be glad to have you as my guest.

"With all my heart I thank you for your good, kind words about the Senatorial matter. I think there will be no want of harmony on that subject, and that is the great point in the success and welfare of the party. It is a mistake to suppose we are to have an easy fight in Indiana this year. I have it from the inside that a determined and moneyed campaign is to be made to carry the State and to retire me so that I may never trouble them again with another 'Blocks-of-five' speech in the Senate. In all my life I was never as obnoxious to the Republican leaders as I am now, and all on account of that speech. Benny and his people are bitter, and likewise Quay, who carries the money bags. Dudley also is openly threatening that he can encompass my defeat. I feel complimented by this opposition of the rogues, but it will have to be a vigilant, active, hardworking year on our part. Write to me and believe me, always,

"Your faithful friend,

"D. W. VOORHEES.

"Hon. John B. Stoll, South Bend, Ind."

The drastic partisan legislation which he apprehended failed to become a reality; the onslaught on his official life failed to materialize. Instead of these things happening, a Legislature was elected in 1890 that accorded to Daniel W. Voorhees a third full Senatorial term, which clothed him with authority to participate in the enactment of laws up to March 3, 1897. The General Assembly of 1891 was overwhelmingly Democratic. In the Senate there were thirty-five Democrats to fifteen Republicans; the House was composed of seventy-three Democrats and twenty-seven Republicans. Such an endorsement surely must have dispelled whatever gloom may have possessed itself of Senator Voorhees at times when he gave himself over to mournful cogitation of political disaster.

The Democratic platform of 1892 especially commends the enactment of a new, just and equitable tax law by the Democratic Legislature. The author of this law being a townsman of mine, I asked him to furnish me a statement of the manner in which the enactment was procured. In compliance with this request Judge Howard kindly furnished this comprehensive information bearing upon that important subject:

THE INDIANA TAX LAW.

(By Hon. Timothy E. Howard.)

“Professor John R. Commons, the noted political economist and secretary of the tax department of the National Civic Federation, has stated, as said in the Indianapolis News of February 21, 1903, that the tax law of Indiana is nearer perfect than that of any other State in the union. Like opinions have been given by many other persons competent to judge of the subject, and several of our sister States, in revising their systems of taxation, have drawn heavily upon the provisions of the Indiana law.

“This law, as has often happened in the case of other beneficent measures, owed its origin to dire necessity. The benevolent, reformatory and other institutions of the State had been extending and improving for years until the revenues had become inadequate for their support, after meeting the other expenses of the State government. The result was that the State had been compelled to resort to the borrowing of money from time to time to meet these expenses. The margin between the annual revenues and the necessary expenditures, instead of being closer, continued to widen from year to year. It became necessary even to borrow money to pay the interest on the obligations already incurred, the State thus paying interest on interest. In this way the outstanding debt of the State had gone on increasing from year to year until it amounted to more than eight millions of dollars, with no prospects of relief in sight. It seemed suicidal to continue borrowing money, and so putting off the day of reckoning. The Legislature was equally reluctant to raise the tax levy. That is always an unpopular measure. But what was to be done? How save the credit of the State?

"This was the grave financial situation which confronted the Legislature of 1891. The writer had been a member of the Senate in each of the two preceding sessions and had been impressed with the serious condition of the State's finances. He was satisfied that something must be done to save the good name of the State, and that without delay. A remedy must be found at this session of the Legislature. Borrowing money must cease, while an increased levy could not be thought of. An increased levy, to be adequate, must be so great as to incur a storm of opposition on the part of the people, and the members of the Legislature could never be induced to listen to the suggestion. Besides, such an increase in the levy would but add to the injustice of the existing system of taxation. The evil was in the unequal valuation of property, and a simple increase of the tax levy would but increase the burdens of those who were already paying more than their just share of taxes.

"Between the time of his re-election to the Senate and the convening of the General Assembly the writer had devoted much thought to the grave problem now before that body. During this interval he had visited and consulted with a relative who was then a local assessor at Ann Arbor, Mich. From this visit he brought home with him at least two ideas—one was the necessity of assessing all property at its true cash value. If this standard of valuation should be fixed and adhered to by the taxing officers the great inequality between the assessment of large properties, particularly corporate property, and the ordinary properties of the people would be done away with. The other idea that came from that conference at Ann Arbor was the creation of a County Board of Review. The then existing County Board of Equalization was but a feeble organization, with little power to revise the work of the local assessors and to correct errors and inequalities.

"On the organization of the Legislature and the appointment of committees, one of the first steps taken was the calling of a joint meeting of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House. Senator Rufus Magee, formerly Minister of the United States to Sweden and Norway, was chairman of the Senate Committee and he was called upon to preside over the joint conference.

"As said in a late interview by Mr. Jefferson H. Claypool, then a Republican member of the House Committee, 'It was evident to all that radical tax legislation was needed, but some of the members of the joint committee did not have a clearly defined idea of how to proceed.' This statement very well expresses the earnest but vague and indefinite character of the various remarks and suggestions made by the several members of the Senate and House Committees in that joint conference. Finally the writer, who was a member of the Senate Committee, gave expression to some thoughts of his own on the subject, referring particularly to ideas that had been suggested to his mind on his visit to Michigan. To his utter astonishment, no sooner had he taken his seat than the chairman announced that he would appoint the writer to prepare a bill for a general revision of the tax laws of the State, to be submitted to a future meeting of the joint committee. Protest was of no avail, Chairman Magee simply saying that the writer seemed to have some practical ideas on the subject of taxation, and as no one else had anything better to propose, there was nothing to be done but await the preparation of the new bill on the lines indicated in the writer's remarks. The members of the two committees agreed with the chairman, and the matter was so determined.

"Daily duties in the Senate chamber and on other committees made it necessary that the tax bill should be prepared at night. It was three weeks before the first draft could be reported to the joint committee. As this draft contained two hundred and sixty-two sections, the committee waived the reading, doing the writer the honor of accepting his word that the bill had been prepared with the provisions indicated at the former meeting of the joint conference. He was only requested to state whether any new provisions had been incorporated. In answer he said that, to secure the assessment of mortgage loans, bonds, moneys and other concealed property he had thought it necessary to provide for the creation of the office of county assessor and prescribe his duties. A vote was taken in the committee on this provision, and the creation of the office of county assessor was sanctioned. Representative Claypool, in the interview already referred to, speaking of the writer's preparation of the bill, says: 'He worked at it three weeks, until midnight every night. He had little in the way of suggestions from other members, for we felt that he was doing the work acceptably. At the end of three weeks he presented his measure. He said to me, "What do you think of it?" I said it would raise the taxes without a doubt, for while it did not increase the tax rate, it did increase the valuation. I thought it so radical that the people would almost rebel against it. But the committee seemed to think that the bill was along right lines, and it was decided to introduce it.' On February 5 the bill was introduced in the Senate, referred to the Committee on Finance and three hundred copies ordered printed.

"As the bill was one for 'raising revenue,' it was necessary, by a requirement of the Constitution, that it should 'originate in the House of Representatives.' A printed copy was accordingly introduced in the House, taking the place of three bills already introduced in that body—one by Mr. John T. Beasley, for the creation of a State Board of Tax Commissioners; one by Mr. William A. Cullop, for the taxation of franchises; and one by Mr. William S. Oppenheim, for paying all railroad taxes into the State treasury. All these provisions of the House bills were, however, incorporated in the Senate bill. The first two became a part of the law as finally enacted, but the third provision, that for paying all railroad taxes into the State treasury, proved to be exceedingly unpopular and came near defeating the whole measure. The bill was retained also in the Senate in order to protect the measure and make necessary amendments. This proved a wise precaution. When on February 25 the bill came to a final vote in the House, it was, by reason of the railroad tax provision, defeated by the decisive vote of 53 to 40. This was due chiefly to the unwillingness of taxpayers to be deprived of the benefit of their share of railroad taxes for local purposes. In many counties the railroad tax amounted to a very large part of the local revenues. On the same day, when this adverse vote was announced in the House, the bill was in committee of the whole in the Senate, and as soon as the news of the House vote came over the author of the bill arose in his place and moved to strike out the obnoxious provisions. This was at once agreed to and the bill thus saved. As soon as this action of the Senate was known in the House, the vote on the passage of the bill in that body was reconsidered, the objectionable railroad clauses stricken out and the bill again placed upon its passage and passed by the vote of sixty-eight to seven.

"This vote showed the favor with which all parties in the House regarded the bill, as was the case also in the Senate, and that it was the railroad provisions alone that caused the opposition in both bodies. On this point Representative Claypool says: 'Both branches of the Legislature that session were overwhelmingly Democratic. They favored some such measure, and though the matter was much debated, its passage was never in doubt after the elimination of the railroad tax feature.'

"On its passage in the House the bill went at once to the Senate, where, on February 26, it passed with the amendments as made by the Senate in committee of the whole. The vote here was thirty-six to nine. A conference committee was appointed to report on the Senate amendments. The report of this committee was adopted in the House, without division, on February 28 and in the Senate by a vote of thirty-seven to four on March 2. The bill became a law on March 6, 1891, by the signature of Governor Alvin P. Hovey, who at all stages had favored the legislation.

"Although the law had the approval and support of the Republican Governor, and, as the record shows, at every stage in its passage was supported by a goodly number of Republican votes; yet no sooner had the Legislature adjourned than an active and persistent war was waged against it in every part of the State. While the opposition was chiefly of a political character, still the Democrats themselves seemed rather lukewarm in the defense. In truth the very bulk and extent of the law made it difficult to grasp all its provisions and the Democratic press seemed indisposed to take up the vindication of a statute which took up over ninety pages of the session laws. The first Democrat outside the membership of the late Legislature who seemed to grasp and understand the provisions of the law was the Hon. Thomas Duncan, now the brilliant and efficient president of the Public Service Commission. Until the appearance of Mr. Duncan's comprehensive and illuminating article it would seem that the Democrats were almost willing to confess judgment in favor of the determined attacks of the opponents of the law. Some good Democratic editors seemed to fear that the Democratic Legislature had committed a huge blunder and that the party would be ruined in consequence. Mr. Duncan's article came when the law was in the depths. That article marked the turning point in favor of the legislation. Democratic writers and speakers took heart, though in a sort of desperate mood, and tried to make the best of what they still feared was an inconsiderate piece of legislation.

"But it was the real enemies of the law, those who had thoroughly studied its provisions and understood and feared them—it was these men who brought home to the people the true nature of this daring and radical revision of our tax laws. The law had been attacked as favoring corporations. The corporations themselves knew this to be untrue, and they at once went into the courts to overthrow the new act. Not until then did the people open their eyes. If the railroads, telegraph and express companies went into the courts to overthrow the law, well, then, said the people, surely the law must not be in favor of the corporations. Democrats now took renewed courage, studied the law and defended its provisions. A great light shone and the tax law was out of the depths. The decisions of the courts followed, sustaining the enactment at every point, even in the Supreme Court of the State and the Supreme Court of the United States. It was a great triumph. At last the corporations must bear their just share of the public burdens. The valuation of railroad property alone rose from sixty-nine millions in the State to a hundred and sixty-one millions, and other corporate property in proportion. It was seen that assessment of all property at its true valuation meant something. The new county assessors, all over the State, found concealed millions of mortgages, bonds and other securities and moneys that had never paid taxes. The huge State debt would come down. And it did come down, from eight millions and over, down it came, million by million, until finally the State debt of Indiana has become merely nominal, while her great public institutions have been constantly enlarged and improved and their inmates properly cared for.

"But it is said that the law has not been properly enforced. That is true. If the law were enforced according to its terms the condition would be ideal. The taxing officers, township assessors, county assessors, County Boards of Review and the State Board of Tax Commissioners are but human. Many of these have been admirable officials and have done their duties under the law in manly fashion, showing themselves conscientious, wise and courageous men. The State Board of Tax Commissioners and many county assessors, particularly, have, in the great majority of cases, done their full duty. If all had done so the judgment of Professor John R. Commons, that the Indiana tax law is nearer perfect than that of any other State, would be a simple truism. The law is exceedingly democratic in its provisions. Perhaps there is a fault in this. The administration and enforcement of the act has been left, so far as possible, in the hands of the people themselves. It may be that if the county assessors, for example, were given larger powers in revising the work of the township assessors, and if the State Board were given larger powers in revising the work of all the assessors and of the Boards of Review, a more just and equal assessment and appraisal of all the property of the State should be secured. Some level-headed, zealous advocate of more perfect administration of the law, such a one perhaps as the Hon. Dan Link, present Tax Commissioner, may yet prepare such improvement of the law and show the Legislature the wisdom of adopting it. But, even as it is, when we compare the work done under the present with that under the former law, we cannot fail to recognize the immense improvement. This improvement is seen particularly in the work of the county assessors and in that of the State Board of Tax Commissioners. Property does not escape taxation now as it did formerly, and the large properties are more adequately taxed.

"It has been said that while the Indiana law may be the best general property tax law in the country, yet that a general property tax law is itself not so satisfactory as other systems of taxation. There may be truth in this. If the State were new and we were about to lay down the first system of taxation, it may be that the single tax on land, as in New Zealand, might be satisfactory. But our general property tax system has been in operation for over a century and so radical a change of method would be detrimental to all our long-established methods of business. It is evident that we must be content to improve the general property system of taxation which we have so long followed. New methods, ideal systems, even though better from an abstract point of view, are yet undesirable when the people have grown familiar with other and perhaps inferior systems and methods. Wise taxation, as is indeed the case with all laws, is rather practical than scientific. That is best which is best for us.

"But many supplementary schemes of raising revenues, not antagonistic in any way with present systems of taxation, are reasonable, practical and altogether desirable. Such are license taxes, franchise taxes, income taxes, inheritance taxes and others of similar kind. All such taxes bear immediately upon the business and the persons benefited by the tax, are best able to bear the burdens of supporting the Government and its varied needs and institutions. The principal source of public revenues, however, must continue to be the general property tax. Of this method of taxation the Indiana tax law of 1891, with its wise amendments and improvements as suggested from year to year, will grow to be as near perfect as human institutions can ever become."

DEMOCRATIC LANDSLIDE IN 1892

WHAT AT FIRST SEEMED A HOPELESS FIGHT TURNED INTO SWEEPING VICTORY

THERE was sharp division in the Democratic camp of Indiana in 1892. Hostility to Grover Cleveland was intense; idolization, on the other hand, just as pronounced. The anti-Cleveland forces did not center on any one of the several avowed or assumed aspirants. Some favored the nomination of ex-Governor Isaac P. Gray, others were enthusiastic in their support of Senator David B. Hill, and some thought the strongest man to nominate was Senator Arthur P. Gorman of Maryland. These forces were also divided as to the nomination of a candidate for Governor. As a rule the supporters of Grover Cleveland favored the nomination of John G. Shanklin, former Secretary of State and editor of the Evansville Courier, while the anti-Cleveland men wanted Secretary of State Claude Matthews placed at the head of the ticket. For various reasons I was intensely interested in making Claude Matthews Governor of Indiana. He made an enviable record as Secretary of State, displayed sound judgment in matters that came before him for adjustment and had developed many of the traits of a most excellent public official. Besides, I was partial to having a farmer at the head of the State Government. When I first talked to him about the Governorship it was plainly apparent that the suggestion struck him quite favorably. But soon it became manifest that complications were in the way. In talking the matter over with intimate friends in various parts of the State the notion was hammered into Mr. Matthews' head that in view of the uncertainty of the gubernatorial contest he must have it understood that if he should happen to be defeated for that position he should be a receptive candidate for renomination as Secretary of State. As time passed Mr. Matthews became more and more impressed with the idea that this was the only assuring program for him to adopt. "With the single exception of yourself, all my friends are agreed as to this being the only safe course for me to pursue," he told me one day. He mentioned the names of many of his friends as among those who had thus expressed themselves. I told him that these friends of his might be entirely honest and sincere in their views, but that they were exceedingly short-sighted and laboring under a grievous delusion. "From the moment your candidacy for Governor is announced there will be in the field aspirants to the office of Secretary of State," I said to him. "Those opposed to you will ridicule your double-gear candidacy and form combinations against you. It is ruinous to entertain a scheme so utterly unfeasible and impracticable. Abandon it and proclaim yourself a candidate for Governor and nothing else." Tractable and deferential as he had usually shown himself in other matters, he seemed to be inseparably wedded to the double-gear proposition. In order to settle the matter once for all, I arranged for a final conference, at which I secured the earnest cooperation and support of ex-Governor Gray. Nearly two hours were spent before Mr. Matthews consented to accept our view of the case. He finally did so, but apparently not without misgivings. The formal announcement of his candidacy for Governor was received with marked favor. A stiff fight was put up in his behalf and he won the coveted prize.

The convention met in Tomlinson Hall on Thursday, April 21, 1892. Senator David Turpie was chosen to preside; Captain John C. Nelson was again honored with the principal secretaryship of the convention.

The contest over the nomination for Governor was spirited and exciting. The situation was somewhat complicated by the entry of several gentlemen who had not been considered as seriously in the race. The first ballot had hardly been completed when a number of delegations changed their vote, mostly in favor of Mr. Matthews. Much enthusiasm was aroused by the announcement of these changes. The vote showed this result: Claude Matthews, 652 $\frac{1}{4}$; John G. Shanklin, 360 $\frac{1}{4}$; Mason J. Niblack, 165 $\frac{3}{4}$; Mortimer Nye, 124 $\frac{3}{4}$. The contest ended by the adoption of a motion that the nomination of Claude Matthews for Governor be made by acclamation. Mortimer Nye, who was fourth in the race for the Gubernatorial nomination, became the convention's choice for Lieutenant-Governor. The ticket in its entirety was composed of the following-named gentlemen:

Governor—Claude Matthews, Vermilion county.
 Lieutenant-Governor—Mortimer Nye, Laporte.
 Secretary of State—Captain William R. Myers, Anderson.
 Auditor of State—J. O. Henderson, Kokomo.
 Treasurer of State—Albert Gall, Indianapolis.
 Attorney-General—Alonzo G. Smith, Jennings.
 Reporter of Supreme Court—Sidney R. Moon, Rochester.
 Supt. Public Instruction—Harvey D. Vories.
 Chief Bureau of Statistics—William A. Peelle, Jr., Indianapolis.
 Judges of Supreme Court—Leonard J. Hackney of Shelbyville, James McCabe of Warren, Timothy E. Howard of South Bend.

SHANKLIN - CLEVELAND DEMONSTRATION.

A remarkable demonstration of popular enthusiasm was made the night before the convention. The Cleveland Club of Indianapolis marched to the Grand Hotel, Democratic headquarters, to pay homage to John G. Shanklin, the Cleveland candidate for Governor. In response to vociferous calls Mr. Shanklin made his appearance on the balcony and delivered this remarkable speech:

"Fellow-countrymen: I can hardly express the gratification I feel at being honored by this call. I do not take it to myself altogether, for you know that in a recent utterance I said that 90 per cent. of the party in Indiana is in favor of Cleveland for President of the United States. I stand here upon the eve of the convention, before which my name is to be presented for Governor, and reiterate the statement. If my defeat is the price I must pay for this expression, I wish to say that I court the sacrifice. It is a matter of small moment, where the gentlemen who are my opponents are men of so much capacity and honor, which of us is selected as the standard bearer, but it is of vital consequence of everlasting importance that Cleveland be nominated for President at Chicago. We have all heard of a conference of gentlemen to devise a compromise as to the claims of the friends of Cleveland and the friends of ex-Governor Gray. Now, with all due respect to the gentlemen, all of whom are personal and political friends of mine, they do not all believe, perhaps, that I am the best one to lead on the State ticket, though the Lord may, perhaps, show them better in a dream tonight—the plan was not needed. There is no factional spirit in the Democratic party of Indiana. When 90 per cent. of the party is behind one name, one principal, there is not enough left to make a faction out of it. No Democrat wishes to humiliate or reflect upon our gallant leader, Hon. Isaac Pusey Gray—there is no man in this vast audience or in the State to whom I yield in respect to Mr. Gray. If word of ours would make him President, we would sound it with loud hurrah. But what sense is there in trying to hide or misrepresent the real sentiment of the party? I say the Democracy of Indiana is not for him, but for Grover Cleveland. Let me be understood as respecting the opinion of every Democrat. There may come up some conditions which might be more favorable to Governor Gray.

"I have never been charged with attempting the role of boss. Down in Indiana, on the banks of the classic Ohio, where I make my home and where everybody knows me, I don't believe any one will accuse me of trying to be a boss. I have the reputation, on the contrary, of being rather modest in my social and political relations. But has it ever occurred to our friends in that conference for compact and compromise, those self-appointed guardians who promulgated as essence of—well, I won't characterize—did it ever occur to them that perhaps they might be laying themselves liable to the faintest shadow of a suspicion of the charge of bossism? Why, they have themselves actually selected four delegates who shall represent the party at large. Now, if the whole of the party's interests and the expression of the party sentiment is to be committed to a half-dozen of our party leaders, no matter how much is involved, why shall the convention assemble at all? I believe that tomorrow, when the Democratic hosts are in convention assembled, they should be allowed to express their true sentiment and opinion. They should be given the opportunity frankly and candidly to express their real attitude toward Cleveland. He is the man who gave us the issue which led us to victory. He it was who found our banner trailing in the dust and raised its proud folds aloft. He it was that took our ship, stormbeaten and rudderless, and set it safely upon its course. He it is who stands for the great principles of Jefferson, equal rights to all and class privileges to none. It is to this feast of great principles that you are now invited, and at the head of the table is where McDougal sits. I wish again to say that if the sentiment of this convention is opposed to instructing our delegates for Cleveland, let us have no instructions. If the sentiment is for instructions for Gray, then let us have instructions for him. If there should be instructions, the sentiment should be bravely expressed. But I am sure the sentiment is for Cleveland. When the name of Cleveland is received with so loud acclaim, it is evidence to me that the party will not be satisfied with any other candidate. I undertake to say that not since Lincoln's second nomination has there been such a popular demand for the nomination of any one man as there is for Cleveland. I look upon the voice of the people as the voice of heaven, which should be respected. The minority should not be allowed to dictate the choice of the majority. There is, therefore, no such thing as compromise.

"The assumption of the compact reminds me of a story of Mark Twain. He said whenever he and his wife had a difference and she had her way, which she always did, she would call it a compromise. If we just let the conference and its compact in favor of the small per cent. who favor Gray, then that's what they call a compromise. I stand for the Democracy of Indiana. Our friends in the conference say in the written suggestion that it is unquestionably true that a large majority of the party favors Cleveland, and that he is therefore the logical candidate, therefore they resolve to cast their vote of Indiana for—Gray. This is trifling with the people. I make no charges personally. I believe these friends were doing what they thought for the best interests of the party, but we cannot afford to stultify ourselves. If the compact does not mean what I say, I do not understand it. I do not want to misrepresent it. What we are all striving for is success. It is not the personality of Cleveland; it is not Cleveland as an individual that we are so heartily in favor of him. It is because he is the incarnation of the Democratic theory of government. There is no one else who embodies so completely the Democratic ideas. Now, in conclusion, let me ask for three cheers for Cleveland, the next President of the United States."

Two years later he who delivered this fulsome laudation of Grover Cleveland denounced in unmeasured terms the subservience of Grover Cleveland to the money power. The idol of 1892 became an object of fiercest arraignment on the charge of having proved recreant to pure and undefiled Democracy. Verily, times change and politicians change with them.

In the contest for places on the supreme bench. Jephtha D. New was nominated on the first ballot over William R. Johnson for the Second district. Cyrus F. McNutt was pitted against James McCabe and defeated by 573½ to 729½. For the Fifth district there were three contestants—Timothy E. Howard of South Bend, Thomas J. Wood of Crown Point and George Burson of Winamac. Howard was declared duly nominated on the first ballot, the vote being: Howard, 870; Wood, 145; Burson, 287.

At the time Jephtha D. New was nominated for the supreme bench he held, by appointment of the Governor, the position of Appellate Judge. This court was created by the General Assembly of 1891, which was overwhelmingly Democratic. The Governor, in making the appointments, named three Republicans and two Democrats. They were: James B. Black, Milton S. Robinson and Edgar S. Crumacker (Republicans), and Jephtha D. New and George L. Reinhard (Democrats). At the 1892 election all the five Democratic nominees for the Appellate Court were chosen to serve six years from January 1, 1893. Judge New, honored citizen and intellectual giant that he was, terminated his useful career on earth July 9, 1892, and Leonard J. Hackney of Shelbyville was by the State Central Committee named to fill the vacancy on the ticket. Like the rest of his associates in that campaign, he was triumphantly elected.

DUAL CANDIDACY ABANDONED BY CLAUDE MATTHEWS.

Considerable time was required before Secretary of State Claude Matthews succeeded in persuading himself to publicly avow his candidacy for the governorship. It was less than two weeks before the holding of the State convention that he finally came to a decisive conclusion. The following letter, written in longhand, in a measure reveals the state of his mind with reference to letting go of a sure thing and taking chances on securing something higher:

"Indianapolis, Ind., April 9, 1892.

"Dear Mr. Stoll:—Herein I enclose you a letter announcing my candidacy for the nomination for Governor. It will be published in Monday's papers as it will be sent out through the Associated Press. I addressed it to Colonel Matson in reply to one just received from him, in which he urges that I owe it to my friends and party to no longer hesitate or decline.

"Well, the die is cast and the rubicon crossed, and I can only trust it is for the best. With the assistance of my friends, and I know they will cheerfully give it, I cannot but hope to succeed. Whatever the result may be, I am content if I have even in such small way discharged any of the obligations I am under to my party.

"About thirteen gentlemen, representative men (I wish you could have been with us), met here last Thursday night and all were of the opinion that I should boldly enter the race.

"I did not want to publish the letter until after the convention in this county today, and was so advised by all. I hope the letter will meet your approval, as I tried to make it brief, frank, and to the point. I am no longer in the equivocal position of holding on to one office and desiring another. Others will announce for Secretary of State. Among them, I believe, will be Captain Hilligoss and Hon. W. R. Myers. These have both been talked of.

"I shall ever bear in grateful remembrance the kind words spoken of me by yourself, and the generous acts and assistance to me.

"Should it ever be in my power to be of service to you, you will only have to command me.

"With sincerest regards, I remain,

"Most truly your friend,

"CLAUDE MATTHEWS."

MAIN PLANKS OF 1892 PLATFORM.

"We, the Democracy of Indiana, in delegate convention assembled, reaffirm our devotion to the time-honored principles of our historic party. We believe that the powers delegated by the people should be strictly construed; that the autonomy of the States and the rights of local self-government and home rule should be jealously guarded; that no money should be taken from the people under any pretext for other than public purposes; that the strictest economy should be exercised in all Government expenditures, whether local, State or national; that legislation should be confined to the legitimate objects of government; that public office is a solemn public trust. We are uncompromisingly opposed to the enlargement and concentration of Federal powers; to the usurpation by the central Government of the functions of the States; to bounties and subsidies in every form; to every species of class legislation and Government partnership with private enterprises; to the whole theory and practice of paternalism.

"We believe that in a 'free country the curtailment of the absolute rights of the individual should only be such as is essential to the peace and good order of the community,' and we regard all legislation looking to the infringement of liberty of person or conscience, not absolutely necessary to the maintenance of public order, as vicious in principle and demoralizing in practice.

"We arraign the administration of Benjamin Harrison for its subserviency to the interests of the money power, which created it, and its indifference to the welfare of the people; for its brazen violation of its solemn pledges to the country, to elevate and purify the public service; for its shameless prostitution of the public patronage to the vilest partisan purposes, as illustrated by the sale of a Cabinet office to John Wanamaker; by the employment of the Pension Bureau as a party machine, and by the promotion of William A. Woods to a higher post in the Federal judiciary as a reward for his services in saving the "blocks-of-five" conspirators from the penitentiary; for its contemptuous repudiation of its promises to the veteran soldiers of the Union; for its wicked attempt to fasten upon this country the odious and un-American force bill, intended to deprive the people of the right to regulate their own elections.

"We believe that there should be kept in constant circulation a full and sufficient volume of money, consisting of gold, silver and legal tender paper currency at par with each other.

"We favor the election of United States Senators directly by the people and commend Senator Turpie for his efforts in Congress to secure this great reform. We indorse the course of our distinguished Senators Daniel W. Voorhees and David Turpie.

"We most heartily applaud the action of our two last Legislatures in passing the school book laws, thereby giving the people of Indiana a complete series of school textbooks equal to those formerly used at one-half of the old trust prices. We pledge ourselves to resist every attempt of the school book combine to regain their control of Indiana and by that means bring about the frequent expensive changes in books, of which the people justly complained in former years.

"We heartily endorse the new tax law as a wise and beneficent act, by which the increased revenues necessary for the support of the State government are raised entirely from the corporations of the State that had heretofore unjustly escaped their fair proportion of taxation. We commend the Legislature for refusing to adopt Governor Hovey's recommendation to increase the State levy from 12 cents to 25 cents on the $100.00, and for meeting the necessary expenses of the State's benevolent institutions by a levy of 6 cents on the $100.00.

"For twenty years the Republican party has legislated for the rich and powerful and in the interest of corporate wealth. The Democratic party pledges itself to remedy the costs growing out of such class legislation and in all future contests to stand by the great producing masses whose toil and self-sacrificing are at the foundation of all natural wealth.

"Resolved, That this convention indorse the wise and patriotic administration of Grover Cleveland; that the Presidential campaign of 1892 should be conducted on the issue of tariff reform as defined in the Presidential message of 1887; that upon this issue Mr. Cleveland is the logical candidate of the Democratic party.

"Resolved, That the Democratic party of Indiana expresses its unalterable confidence in and attachment to its gallant leader, Isaac P. Gray; that it holds him worthy of any honor in the gift of the American people, and that his name be presented to the convention by the delegation this day appointed, and in the event that the national convention deems the nomination of Mr. Cleveland inexpedient, the delegation is instructed to use every honorable effort to secure the nomination of Governor Isaac P. Gray for the Presidency."

Patching up an agreement as to how the delegation to the national convention should vote was no easy task. Various constructions were placed on the resolutions bearing on this subject. The final outcome was that Cleveland got the benefit of Indiana's entire vote. This was brought about by a positive pledge of the Cleveland management to secure Governor Isaac P. Gray's nomination for Vice-President. Much bitterness came to the surface. Senator Voorhees, afflicted with gout, was in a very despondent mood over the situation. He was bitter in his denunciations and declared that nothing but disaster could come out of the chaotic conditions that had been created by the discordant elements that had been fighting so viciously from the moment they had reached Chicago. How Cleveland's nomination was effected is thus narrated by Colonel McClure:

"The Democratic National Convention met at Chicago on June 21, and Cleveland was nominated for a third time after the most desperate and acrimonious strife I have ever witnessed in a national convention. It was on that occasion that Bourke Cockran made a speech against Cleveland that gave him national fame, and it was one of extraordinary ability and power. The convention was really adverse to Cleveland's nomination. Had a majority of the delegates followed their own personal inclinations he would have been defeated, and he was nominated solely by the matchless leadership of William C. Whitney. But for him and his wonderful skill and energy the convention would have run away from Cleveland at the outset. Never in the history of American politics was there such an achievement as the nomination of Cleveland over the solid and aggressively hostile vote of his own State of New York, that was regarded as the pivotal State of the battle. Tammany had always opposed Cleveland in national conventions, but never before had control of the delegation against him, and a protest was published to the convention signed by every delegate from the State, demanding his defeat.

"Cleveland was strong with the people but weak with the political leaders, and it was only Whitney's masterful management of the convention that held it to Cleveland. The platform was made by the enemies of Cleveland; the nomination for Vice-President was made over his friends, and the hostility to him was so pronounced that the opposing leaders were confident of his defeat at the polls. The convention sat at night and far on in the morning hours, when Cleveland received 617 votes, just ten more than were necessary to nominate him. Had he not been nominated on that ballot his defeat would have been certain.

"The strength of Cleveland's position before the people was pointedly illustrated by his nomination in a convention that was not specially friendly, but that was forced to make him the candidate because of the overwhelming popular Democratic sentiment that demanded it. A year or so before the convention met he had written a brief and positive letter against the free coinage of silver, and the Democrats of the South and West almost with one voice declared against him at the time, but when the Democratic people faced the conditions presented by the battle of 1892, the masses came to the support of Cleveland and the leaders were compelled to follow. The cheap-money craze had made serious inroads in both of the great parties, and the Republican platform was a weak and awkward straddle of the whole issue, while the Democratic convention had an honest money plank declaring for bi-metalism and the free use of gold and silver with the intrinsic value of the dollar to be maintained.

"The Democratic convention at Chicago was presided over by William C. Owens of Kentucky as temporary president, and William L. Wilson of West Virginia as permanent president. After a protracted and acrimonious discussion that extended the session of the convention of the second day until long after midnight, the ballot for President was finally reached, resulting as follows:

|------------------------------|------|
| Grover Cleveland, New York | 617½ |
| David B. Hill, New York | 114 |
| Horace Boies, Iowa | 103 |
| Arthur P. Gorman, Maryland | 36½ |
| Adlai E. Stevenson, Illinois | 16½ |
| Scattering | 22 |

Cleveland were united in favor of Isaac P. Gray of Indiana, but they were defeated in their choice, as they were on several vital points of the platform. Only one ballot was had for Vice-President, resulting as follows:

|------------------------------|-----|
| Adlai E. Stevenson, Illinois | 402 |
| Isaac P. Gray, Indiana | 344 |
| Allen B. Morse, Michigan | 86 |
| John L. Mitchell, Wisconsin | 45 |
| Scattering | 33 |

"Stevenson had not received the requisite two-thirds, but he so far outstripped the candidate of the Cleveland leaders that they cordially acquiesced, and the nomination of Stevenson was made unanimous."

In view of the fact that no Democratic victories were scored in Indiana at any of the elections after 1892 up to 1908, it is fitting that unusual prominence be given to the returns of the two elections that stand out in bold relief as among the most decisive ballot verdicts recorded up to that period in the history of the State.

THE INDIANA MUNICIPAL CODE.

(By Hon. Timothy E. Howard.)

On January 12, 1891, Representative James E. McCullough of Marion county, Indiana, introduced into the lower House of the Legislature "a bill for an act concerning the incorporation and government of cities having more than one hundred thousand population." This was the first step taken in the General Assembly for the reform of the laws relating to the government of cities in this State. The bill had been for two years or over under consideration and in preparation by a committee of citizens of the city of Indianapolis, appointed by the Commercial Club of that city.

The draft of the bill as introduced by Mr. McCullough was prepared almost entirely by Mr. Augustus L. Mason of Indianapolis, under direction of the committee. As stated by W. W. Thornton, in the preface to his work on the municipal law of Indiana, the bill so prepared "was the result of careful and painstaking examination of all then recently advanced legislation concerning the government of municipalities." Or, as said by Senator Rufus Magee when the bill came before the Senate, "It was the result of the best thought of the best minds of the city of Indianapolis."

Indiana cities up to this time were governed by what has been called the "councilmanic system." The city was under the control of a Common Council, or of a Common Council and Board of Aldermen. These bodies were chosen by the voters of the several wards into which the city was divided; they enacted ordinances for the government of the municipality and elected all officers not elected by the people. The office of Mayor was rather ornamental than responsible. He was, ex officio, president of the Common Council and held a city court, in which he exercised the powers of a justice of the peace. This system had served very well in the early history of the State and while the cities were small, but when a city grew large the councilmen represented the wants of their several wards rather than the needs of the city at large. The creation of a Board of Aldermen, who shared with the Council the government of the city, served in some degree to check the loose government exercised by the Council. But the aldermen were also elected by the union of wards and also represented their wards rather than the city.

The chief object of the new legislation was to separate the powers of government into their constituent parts—legislative, executive and judicial; to confine the duties of the Council to the enactment of ordinances and the control of the revenues; to make the Mayor the executive officer of the city, and to assign judicial functions to a city judge.

There was little opposition to the McCullough bill in the House, and it passed that body on February 16 by a vote of sixty-five to thirteen. In the Senate, however, an active spirit of opposition at once manifested itself. On February 28 the Committee on the Affairs of the City of Indianapolis, to which the bill had been referred, brought in a majority report, by the Democratic members, and a minority report signed by the two Republican members. Several amendments were proposed in the majority report and three in the minority. The members of the citizens' committee who had prepared the bill were decidedly opposed to the majority report and in favor of the minority. The voice of the majority report was substantially that it favored the retention of many of the features of the old councilmanic form of city government; it would leave the control of the executive department still in the Council. The bill, as presented, placed the appointment of all executive officers and boards in the hands of the Mayor and made him solely responsible for their acts, thus centering the administration of the affairs of the city in the hands of the chief executive and making him directly responsible to the people. An amendment insisted upon in the majority report would give only a very limited power of appointment to the Mayor, namely: "To appoint the heads of departments, by and with the consent of the Common Council." The Citizens' Committee were of opinion that this amendment alone would defeat the real purpose of the new legislation, and they preferred that the bill should be defeated rather than that the amendments proposed in the majority report should be adopted.

There was, however, a practical difficulty in carrying out the wishes of the friends of the reform legislation. The Democrats in the Senate were in a large majority, and this majority appeared to be represented by the majority report of the committee which was so decidedly in opposition to the reform. Besides, every Senator from Indianapolis was against the bill, unless it should be amended as indicated in the majority report. Would it do to attempt the passage of a measure which was opposed by the majority of the committee to which it was referred, and opposed also by every senator of the city for the government of which the bill was intended; while it was favored only in the minority report signed by the two Republicans on the committee? But the Citizens' Committee, composed of members of all political parties, contended that in the other legislation of the Senate at this session—the Suburban Street Railway bill, the far-reaching Tax law, the Appellate Court act, the amended School Text-Book law, the amended act for the establishment of a Board of Children's Guardians, and other like liberal legislation—this Democratic body had shown itself devoted to the most decided reform legislation, and they were therefore of opinion that if an appeal could be made to the patriotism of a majority of the Senate this act for the reform of the law of city government would also be carried by a decided vote of the Senate. The Citizens' Committee, as was necessary, exercised much tact in this crisis. They selected two of their number, both Democrats of high standing, to look after the bill, with directions to select a Democratic Senator to take charge of it in the Senate. The writer had recently, under some difficulties, succeeded in securing the passage of a suburban street railway bill in which the city of Indianapolis was greatly interested. He was therefore selected now for this delicate task of securing the passage through the Senate of this reform city legislation in the face of the majority report against it, and with all the Senators of the city also opposed to it. The event justified this confidence. When the questions involved were fairly and candidly presented, those great Senators of 1891 were quick to see that the proposed reform legislation was in the line of good government; and on March 3 the bill, with the amendments favored in the minority report, passed the Senate by a vote of forty-two to three. On March 6 the bill was signed by the Governor and became the law.

The Indianapolis Charter, as it was called, was thought by many to give too large powers to the Mayor, and at first had some honest opposition, even after it became a law. In time, however, those fears were found to be groundless. The direct responsibility of the executive to the people saved the city from any danger of undue exercise of power by that officer, and the people had good cause to rejoice that the councilmanic form of government was done away with, and that hereafter the administration of city affairs would be for the welfare of the whole city and not for that of any particular ward or section. The Council itself was liberalized by the election of some of its members by the city at large. The separation of executive from legislative functions was the central idea of the new system; while the direct responsibility of the Mayor was a grateful change from the uncertain and irresponsible government of a Common Council elected from the several wards. The latter body was relegated to its proper function of making laws for the city and keeping watch over the funds of the government.

By degrees, this form of city government became popular in the larger cities; and in the General Assembly of 1893, Evansville and Fort Wayne procured so-called "charters," which were, in substance, copies of the Indianapolis law. Terre Haute received a like charter in 1899; South Bend, in 1901; and Muncie, in 1903 (rejected by popular vote). These charters consisted of about one hundred and fifty sections each, and were practically repetitions of the same provisions. There began to be some fault-finding that the statutes of the State were encumbered by these repetitions of the same or similar enactments, and people raised the question as to how far this multiplication of city charters was to extend. There seemed, indeed, to be no reason why each city should not have its own special charter, one city being as much entitled to its charter as another.

This was the condition of city government in Indiana in 1903, when the same Legislature that granted the last of the forgoing charters, that of Muncie, provided also for the creation of a commission for the revision and codification of the laws relating to public and private corporations, "and such other statute laws of the State of Indiana as such commission shall deem proper." Through the favor of Governor Winfield T. Durbin the writer was appointed the minority member of this commission. The other members were the Hon. Marcellus A. Chipman, Chairman, and the Hon. Daniel E. Storms, the Secretary of State. The Hon. George Shirts was selected as clerk of the commission.

One of the first matters that engaged the attention of the commission was the confusion that existed in the laws relating to city government. The "charters," already referred to, provided, by separate enactments, for the government of cities of more than one hundred thousand inhabitants; for those of more than fifty and less than one hundred thousand; of more than forty-three and less than forty-nine thousand; of more than thirty-six thousand five hundred, and less than forty-three thousand; of more than thirty thousand and less than thirty-six thousand five hundred; and of more than twenty thousand nine hundred, and less than thirty thousand. There was, besides, the "general law" for cities; also special laws for various cities: For those of seventy thousand or over; seventy thousand or less; fifty thousand; forty-five thousand; twenty-nine thousand; between twenty thousand two hundred and twenty thousand nine hundred; seventeen to eighteen thousand; fifteen thousand; ten thousand; between six thousand and seven thousand; between fifty-three and fifty-eight hundred; between forty-five hundred and forty and forty-five hundred and forty-five; between four thousand and twenty-five and four thousand and fifty; between seven thousand eight hundred and seven thousand eight hundred and twenty; between thirty-four hundred and ten and thirty-four hundred and twenty, and many others. There were corresponding variations in the laws for the government of towns.

On the organization of the commission the minority member was assigned the task of bringing into some order or system these various enactments. The task at first seemed a hopeless one. After some days' study he suggested to the commission that it might be possible to frame a single code for all cities and towns. To do this it would be necessary to classify the cities according to population and modify provisions in many cases in accordance with the classifications. In answer to the suggestion the other members of the commission, while of opinion that a single code, adapted to all the cities and towns of the State, was greatly to be desired, yet believed that it would be most difficult of accomplishment. However, the plan proposed was approved and the work authorized.

The town being the primary municipal corporation, the law in regard to towns was first developed, beginning with the survey of the proposed corporate territory, the census of its inhabitants and the corporate election necessary to create the body corporate. The form of government provided was in effect a simplification of the city government which was to follow. This was supplemented by regulations according to which the town might become a city.

The cities of the State were divided into five classes: Those having one hundred thousand population or over; those having forty-five thousand or over and less than one hundred thousand; those having twenty thousand or over and less than forty-five thousand; those having ten thousand or over and less than twenty thousand; and those having less than ten thousand. The general plan of government already adopted in the various charters was taken as the basis of the new code. The separation of authority into the legislative, executive and judicial branches was strictly adhered to. But the different provisions, wherever it seemed necessary, were modified in their application to the five different classes into which the cities were divided. These modifications had to do chiefly with the number of officers; their salaries; the amount of the tax levy; the union of the functions of two or more offices in the hands of one official; the number of deputies; the assignment to committees of the Council, in small cities and in towns, of the work of boards in larger cities; the requirement that the duties of city treasurer, in certain cities, should be performed by the county treasurer; the requirements as to parks, playgrounds, boulevards, levees and harbors; provisions for fire and police pension funds. In regard to these matters, and in other cases also, when deemed necessary, the requirements were varied to suit the class to which the city was assigned. But the underlying principles of government were made uniform for all cities throughout the State. This was also the case as to towns so far as possible.

In many important details there was a wide departure from the procedure followed in the charters. The terms of officers and the periods and dates of elections were radically changed. The elections were fixed for "the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, in the year 1905, and on the same day every four years thereafter." In this provision city elections would be held in the "off year," and so not come in the year of general political campaigns and elections. The aim in this was to enable voters to look out for the welfare of the city, and, so far as possible, without being swayed by political considerations. The elections were fixed for every four years instead of every two years, thus saving the expense of one election in each four years, and also giving the officials time and experience to carry out any policy which might be for the good of the city. To counteract any evil that might result from so long a term, it was provided that no city officer should be eligible to succeed himself in office. As city elections had previously occurred at different dates, so the terms of officials had begun at different times. The bill fixed the first Monday of January, every fourth year, as the date when the new officers should begin their terms. This gave them time, from their election in November to the first of January, to acquaint themselves with their duties. Many other improvements on the former laws were introduced into the code. The numerous statutes on the books in relation to city and town government had consisted of nearly eighteen hundred sections. The code, as it was finally adopted by the Legislature, contained but two hundred and seventy-two sections.

The essential principle of the Indiana Municipal Code is the fixing of responsibility. The Council is restricted to the enactment of ordinances and the fixing of annual appropriations and tax levies. The executive duties, the administrative functions, are fixed in the Mayor, who appoints all boards and officers who are charged with the actual duties of city government. The affairs of the city, the care of the finances, the public works of all kinds, the peace and good order of the city, all are in the hands of the one man, the Mayor himself. To him the people look for good government; in his hands they have placed the welfare of the community. If he fails them, if he is untrue to his responsibilities, they have the remedy in their own hands.

It is said that the code forms a strong central government—not by the people, as in a democracy, not by their representatives, as in a republic. This argument was strongly presented in the Legislature and in the press, during the whole period from the time when the first reform was proposed and inaugurated in our municipal affairs, until the culmination was reached in this code. But the sufficient answer was then, as it is now, that our cities can no longer be well governed by the simple old plan, which served so well when the communities were small and the population of the country sparse. "Safety first" is a maxim not confined to the use of machinery or the various modes of public travel. It applies also to our dense centers of population, to modern city government. The Indiana Municipal Code secures safety first, but it secures this end with the least possible yielding to arbitrary government. The "checks and balances" which for over a century and a quarter have proved so serviceable in our national and State governments is here happily adapted to our city government. We have set up no irresponsible dictator, but one charged with the administration of the law and subject to its control, at the same time that he is set up in the sunlight, in the presence of all the people who can thus hold him responsible for the enforcement of the law, the good order of the community and the public welfare. Liberty within the law must be his motto and it must be theirs. This end, sought in every good form of government, is in none more safely and sanely attained than in the Indiana Municipal Code.

DEFEAT STARED THEM IN THE FACE UNDER SUCH CIRCUMSTANCES THE 1894 CONVENTION WAS A TAME AFFAIR

THE date fixed for holding the Democratic State Convention, August 14, happened to be in the midst of the heated term. There surely were hot days in the month of August that year, and the assembled delegates felt it. They felt something else, and that wasn't to their liking, either. The signs of the times were ominous. They pointed unerringly to Democratic defeat in the melancholy days of November. But with admirable courage they faced the music and made their nominations just as if they thought the nominees had a fair chance for election. No other course was open to them. It is always good policy to present a bold front when engaged in any sort of a political fight.

Governor Claude Matthews was unanimously chosen to preside over the convention. It was a wise selection. His manner of conducting the proceedings of the convention proved that he had had previous experience in handling the gavel. Besides, upon taking the chair he delivered a spirited address that greatly enlivened the appreciative audience before him.

Senator S. M. Briscoe of Hartford City served as principal secretary. He had as assistants Joseph Blase, Samuel B. Boyd, J. H. Matlock, Nicholas Cornet, Thomas E. Coyle, W. H. Hamilton, Leon O. Bailey, Charles McCulloch, Jasper P. Davis, John Rothrock, H. B. Bannister, A. A. Adams, and Daniel Ford.

STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

(Elected at District Conventions in January.)

1. John G. Shanklin, Evansville.
2. Thomas B. Buskirk, Paoli.
3. Isaac N. Leydon, New Albany.
4. William H. O'Brien, Lawrenceburg.

5. W. C. Duncan, Columbus.
6. John M. Lontz, Richmond.
7. Thomas Taggart, Indianapolis.
8. Thomas J. Mann, Sullivan.
9. William M. Blackstock, Lafayette.
10. M. M. Hathaway, Winamac.
11. Jere A. M. Kintz, Huntington.
12. Judge Allen Zollars, Fort Wayne.
13. William Conrad, Warsaw.

There were no contests for any of the positions on the ticket, hence all the nominations were made by acclamation, as follows:

For Secretary of State—Captain William R. Myers of Anderson.

For Auditor of State—Joseph T. Fanning of Indianapolis.

For Treasurer of State—Morgan Chandler of Hancock county.

For Attorney-General—Francis M. Griffith of Switzerland county.

For Superintendent of Public Instruction—Charles W. Thomas.

For Clerk Supreme Court—Charles W. Wellman of Sullivan.

For Chief Bureau of Statistics—Eli T. J. Jordan.

For Judge of the Supreme Court—George L. Reinhard of Rockport and Joseph S. Dailey of Bluffton.

Judge Robert Lowry of Fort Wayne, who had attended every Democratic State Convention held since 1852, was dumfounded in sizing up this gathering. "Appalling! appalling!" he exclaimed. "It portends but one thing—overwhelming defeat."

And such it proved, although untiring efforts were put forth by the Democratic State Committee, under the inspiring leadership of Thomas Taggart, to put ginger into the campaign and to impress upon members of the party the importance of exerting themselves to the utmost to keep afloat the banner of Democracy. A day was fixed on which to open the campaign simultaneously in every county of the State. Some of these meetings were well attended and awakened hope of a fair showing being made at the polls in November. But as the day of election came, and the yeomanry exercised the prerogative of citizenship, it became painfully apparent that Judge Lowry's forebodings were well founded. When the smoke of battle had cleared away it was found that the Republicans had elected their entire State ticket by the then unprecedented majority of 46,000; that every successful candidate for Congress was a Republican, and that the Republicans were overwhelmingly in the ascendancy in both houses of the Legislature. Nothing anywhere approximate to this landslide had ever before occurred in the State of Indiana. It exceeded by far the most extravagant forecasts of the Republican party leaders and campaign managers.

COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

PLATFORM DECLARATIONS.

The Democratic party of Indiana takes just pride in the strength of the record it has made in the legislative and executive departments of this commonwealth by the enactment and enforcement of wise and beneficent laws in the interest of the people and in the fulfillment of its pledges.

It passed the mechanic lien laws and the law giving laborers a lien upon the product of their labor for wages and materials furnished, the law protecting labor organizations, the law providing for the safety of miners and proper ventilation of mines, constituting eight hours a day's labor in public employment, prohibiting the blacklisting of employes, prohibiting "pluck-me" stores, the employes' liability law, forbidding the employment and importation of Pinkerton detectives, against the importation of alien or foreign labor. It enacted the school book law, saving large sums to the people, breaking down an oppressive monopoly and placing the instruments of education within the reach of the poorest and humblest citizens; it enacted our existing laws purifying elections, giving an untrammelled ballot to the voter, and by the Australian ballot successfully preventing fraud and intimidation of employes and others at the polls. It framed and passed our present tax law, thus adding millions of property to our tax duplicates; it passed the present fee and salary law; it enacted the Barrett improvement law, which has proven a blessing wherever used; it also passed the state board of charities law, which has insured honest, humane and intelligent administration of our public institutions.

All this has been accomplished in almost every instance, in spite of the determined objection and opposition of the Republican party. By this course of legislation in fulfillment of pledges to the people, Indiana has been placed at the forefront of all States in matters of this kind and kindred reform legislation, and we pledge ourselves to the maintenance and enforcement of these measures, while the Republican party stands pledged, at the first opportunity, to destroy, either by repeal or amendment, the most important of these wise laws.

We congratulate the people of Indiana upon the upholding of the tax law of 1891, under which more than a hundred millions of dollars of corporate property has been added to the tax duplicate. And we especially commend the action of the State officers in charge in prosecuting and enforcing to a successful conclusion the provisions of said laws.

The other planks denounce in vigorous terms all forms of class legislation, including miscalled protection; the McKinley tariff enacted by the Fifty-first Congress; approve the course of Senators Voorhees and Turpie; especially condemn "a small coterie of Senators who, masquerading as Democrats, by threats to defeat all tariff legislation have temporarily prevented the Democratic party from carrying out all of its pledges to the people for tariff reform, as announced in the Democratic national platform of 1892." (This was intended as a slap at Senators Arthur P. Gorman of Maryland, David B. Hill of New York, James Smith of New Jersey and Calvin S. Brice of Ohio.)

The platform further commends the action of Congress in placing on the free list raw materials; in reducing duties on iron ore and coal and on woollens and on the necessities of life. The income tax is approved as a wise and equitable measure, designed to place a fair share of the burdens of government upon the property of the country, for the benefit of which the expenses of Government are so largely incurred. Further commended is the taxation of greenbacks and the repeal of odious election laws. An oath-bound organization then known as the American Protective Association comes in for emphatic denunciation. The importation of pauper labor is sharply condemned. Responsibility for the hard times caused by panic is placed upon the shoulders of the Republican party. Arbitration for the adjustment of labor troubles is recommended. Declaration against the enactment of sumptuary laws. Repeal of the Sherman silver purchasing act is highly praised as a step in the right direction. Bi-metallism is specifically approved. The administrations of President Cleveland and Governor Matthews are heartily commended. Praise for the saviors of the Union, our gallant soldiers and sailors, is unstintedly bestowed.

THE FREE SILVER PROPAGANDA

BROUGHT ABOUT NEW ALIGNMENTS AND A TREMENDOUS POLITICAL UPHEAVAL

THE panic of 1893 came about very much as preceding panics had come upon the country. In its effect it was appallingly disastrous. Factories closed, banks suspended, business was prostrated, bankruptcies became frightfully numerous, thousands upon thousands of workmen were thrown out of employment, the cry of distress came from every direction.

Although it is a matter of general knowledge that a panicky feeling was discernible in industrial and commercial circles during the latter part of the Harrison administration, responsibility for its bursting upon the country in all its ferocity was laid at the door of the Cleveland administration, which came into power March 4, 1893. The situation is thus brought to view by that distinguished Ohio publicist, Gen. Thomas E. Powell:

"The year 1893 will always be remembered as the date of one of the great commercial panics in this country. It was caused directly by the calamity campaign of the Republican newspapers of the country, and indirectly by vicious legislation of the Republican party. Cleveland found a depleted treasury caused by the extravagance of a Republican Congress—the first billion dollar Congress of which the country can boast. Silver legislation enacted by the Republican party in Congress had started the agitation of that question, which finally became a campaign issue in 1896. Also nearly six hundred millions of fiat money had been put in circulation by the Republicans and this along with three hundred and fifty millions of legal tender notes issued during the Civil War had given the country a tremendously inflated currency. Great inflation is as bad, if not worse, than too much contraction of the circulating medium. The balloon that bursts is more dangerous than an empty one. It was the unreasonable expansion of credit which had no foundation of business basis, accelerated by nearly a billion dollars of fiat money with nothing in the treasury back of it, which placed President Cleveland in a difficult position immediately after his inauguration. The bursting of the credit balloon was inevitable and could not be avoided by Cleveland or the Democratic party.

"The hard times had commenced before the election of Cleveland and as it was well known into what position the Republicans forced the country through an unwise financial policy and the depletion of the treasury, the Republican press of the country began to prophesy disaster and to preach ruin with an energy that has never been equaled since the days of Habakuk. They based their attack upon the ground that Cleveland and the Democratic party were in favor of a low tariff, completely ignoring the true condition of affairs. The assault was kept up against Cleveland and the Democratic party until the desired result, namely, the undermining of public confidence, was accomplished. They sowed the wind and the whole country reaped the whirlwind. Five hundred national banks closed their doors and the money stringency was felt all over the land. It should be added that failure of crops and labor troubles further aggravated the situation.

"On the 30th Grover Cleveland called a special session of the Fifty-third Congress to convene on August 7th. His reason for issuing this call was set forth as follows:

The distrust and apprehension concerning the financial situation which pervade all business circles have already caused great loss and damage to our people and threatened to cripple our merchants, stop the wheels of manufacture, bring distress and privation to our farmers and withhold from our workmen the wages of labor.

The present perilous condition is largely the result of a financial policy which the executive branch of the Government finds embodied in unwise laws which must be executed until repealed by Congress.

"At the special session of Congress, Wilson of West Virginia introduced a bill to repeal the silver purchase act, known as the Bland-Allison bill. Bland of Missouri offered a provision to authorize the free coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, which was defeated. Other proposals for the coinage of silver at ratios ranging from 17 to 1 to 20 to 1 were also made, but all were rejected. The Wilson bill finally passed.

"The silver question was injected into the national campaign of 1892, and as it became the paramount issue in 1896, a brief history of the white metal in America is appropriate here. Previous to 1834 the ratio of gold to silver at the mints of the United States had been 1 to 15, while the ratio in the principal European countries was 1 to 15½. This made it possible for Europeans to exchange fifteen and one-half parts of silver for one part of gold, retain the half part, send the fifteen parts to America and receive one part of gold therefor, thus having the half part for a profit. This was done extensively and gold flowed from the United States to Europe. To remedy this the ratio was changed by the act of 1834, making the ratio almost, but not quite, 16 to 1. Then gold did not leave the United States at all, but began to return to it, while silver flowed out rapidly because under the new arrangement banks in France, for instance, could exchange silver for gold and re-exchange gold for silver in America, making a profit. In order to keep this country with sufficient small coin for the needs of business, an act was passed in 1853 reducing the weight of fractional silver coins. In 1873 the coinage of silver dollars was stopped. This brought a great deal of criticism upon Congress and the Government, and in 1878 the Bland-Allison bill was passed, which revived the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains and required the purchase of not less than two million dollars and not more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion per month and its coinage into dollars. This did not establish free coinage, for under free coinage any one taking bullion to the United States mint could have it coined into dollars. By the common practice and consent of the nations gold has always been recognized as the standard of values and the objection to the free coinage of silver is that it would introduce bi-metallism. Every nation has free coinage of gold. The objection to the free coinage of silver is that fluctuations in the market price of the white metal might cause sudden and excessive exports of the metal that happened, for the time being, to be the more valuable in the markets of other countries. A double standard of gold and silver could be made possible only by the joint action of all the principal countries in establishing the same fixed ratio. If the bullion in the silver dollar were equal to the face value of the coin no harm would come from free coinage, but the market value of silver fluctuates like that of any other commodity. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States pointed out in 1887 that free coinage would lead either to the export of the silver dollar or to its depreciation. In 1893 the Bland-Allison bill of 1878 was repealed, an act which the advocates of silver resented and condemned. From 1873 to 1896 the people of the South and West demanded with an ever-increasing clamor that silver be placed upon a parity with gold at some fixed ratio. It was called the poor man's dollar to distinguish it from the rich man's dollar; which the gold dollar was called. They claimed also that there was not enough gold coin in the country to answer the needs of business. After the panic of 1893 the Government was unable to keep a sufficient amount of gold in the Treasury to secure the redemption of notes and United States securities in that metal. President Cleveland and his Cabinet believed that if the gold reserve should get so low that silver was used for such purposes there would at once be great financial distress; that the country would practically be upon a silver basis and that our credit would be ruined both at home and abroad. To secure gold the Government resorted to the sale of bonds, increasing the national debt by over two hundred and fifty million dollars and subjecting the Democratic President and his Cabinet to widespread condemnation. The sentiment in favor of the free coinage of silver became so widespread and intense that it became a plank in the national platform of the Democratic party in 1896 and six and one-half million citizens voted for it. It might be added here that the discovery of gold in Alaska produced the conditions which the silver advocates demanded and the question has now been out of politics for some years."

In Indiana the silver question became the all-absorbing topic of discussion. In 1893 the Evansville Courier in the southern part of the State and the Huntington Democrat in the northern part, two newspapers that had strongly supported the renomination of Mr. Cleveland the year before, broke openly with the administration upon its policy relating to the money question. John G. and George W. Shanklin were then editing the Courier, while Fred T. Loftin performed a like service on the Huntington paper. The Mount Vernon Democrat, under the editorship of Mr. Sparks, adopted a similar policy. The Logansport Pharos and the South Bend Times championed moderation, conciliation and harmony. The Pharos presented its views in this form:

"The Illinois Democrats are going to have a red-hot fight over the silver question. A convention has been called to take action on the question of free coinage. The action is ill-advised. It will be time to meet the issue a year hence at the State convention. The party should not be pledged to free silver at the present time. There are a great many Democrats who are unwilling to be bound to free silver. They are not willing to follow party leaders into by-ways that may lead to disaster. The silver question is one that should be studied carefully, and after studying it men should be actuated by conviction. If a man is convinced after study that the free coinage of silver will benefit his country, he should favor it. If, on the other hand, he is convinced that free coinage means ruin and disaster to the commercial interests of his country, he should oppose it."

The Indianapolis Sentinel and the Laporte Argus vigorously upheld the Cleveland attitude on the money question, as did the Terre Haute Gazette, then ably edited by W. C. Ball, who is still among the living, though no longer devoting his talents to newspaper work. The arguments advanced in opposition to the free silver movement, in epitomized form, ran thus: "Free silver coinage means granting the privilege to every holder of silver bullion, resident and non-resident, to take his bullion to the United States mint and have it coined into standard dollars free of cost,* as the holder of gold bullion does. Anyone can go into the market today and buy silver bullion at less than 70 cents an ounce. That ounce converted into coin would have a face value of $1.29. But the holder of gold bullion, when he takes 100 cents' worth of his bullion to the mint to coin, can only get 100 cents' worth of coin. The gold bullion man makes nothing by the transaction, but the silver bullion man would make 59 cents on every ounce of silver. There are a good many people who would look upon such a procedure on the part of Uncle Sam as rather too partial. When the two metals in bullion form at the ratio of 16 to 1 are of equal value, all would rejoice to see them coined on exactly the same terms."

A Democratic bi-metallist organization was formed at Washington. Senator Harris of Tennessee was placed at the head of this organization. Fred T. Loftin, secretary to Senator Turpie, was commissioned to form silver leagues in various parts of the country, especially in Indiana. When the Indiana Democratic Editorial Association met at Maxinkuckee in 1895 efforts were made to secure the adoption of a silver resolution. The proposition was debated at considerable length and with much earnestness. The principal speech in opposition was delivered by Jacob P. Dunn, of the Indianapolis Sentinel. It was a forceful argument and made a strong impression. Quietly a canvass was made to ascertain how a vote on the proposed resolution would probably result. This "feeler" revealed the probability of a tie. Therefore no action was advised. Immediately upon the adjournment of the editorial convention the Indiana Silver League was organized, with Allen W. Clark of the Greensburg New Era as president. He served in that capacity throughout the campaign. This league developed a good deal of energy by way of securing control of the organization of the Democratic State Convention of 1896. It was originally intended to make Senator Turpie the presiding officer of the convention, but on account of the impaired condition of his health it was deemed advisable to abandon this purpose. Thereupon Senator Robert C. Bell of Fort Wayne was agreed upon. This program was subsequently carried into effect. Senator Bell proved himself a very capable presiding officer. The convention, at the outset, was a stormy affair, but after the several speakers had relieved themselves of the belligerence that dwelt within their bosoms comparative quiet was restored. Not all ill-feeling had vanished; that was hardly to have been expected. But when the gold standard champions found themselves outnumbered and outvoted, they made a virtue of necessity in so far as it was possible for them to do. They predicted humiliation and defeat, and left the convention hall with the consciousness of at least having done their utmost to prevent committal to what they declared to be a colossal political blunder.

In view of his prominent connection with the free silver movement in the 'nineties, the information contained in a memorandum kindly furnished by Mr. Loftin will be found quite interesting and instructive:

"In the midst of that campaign and later while I was handling politics on the Sentinel, both Mr. Bryan and Mr. Morss admitted to me that some safeguard in the platform against possible silver depreciation would have strengthened us. But in those warm times it was difficult to get consideration of anything that looked like compromise. I suggested this: Independent 16 to 1. But if silver failed to rise to $1.29 plus under it, then the bullion owner pay to the Treasury the difference, this fund to be used to pay any holders of depreciated money if any such there should be. Mr. Morss was not in position to advocate this as effectually as he would have liked. In the convention of 1898 Mr. Ralston was chairman of the resolutions committee. We all felt that the Western people who had means were overconfident in 1896 and had failed to support us. This was true. Had not William P. St. John, New York banker, put up $17,500 sixty days before election of '96, the National Committee would have closed its doors. I think the Huntington Democrat, under my management, was the only paper advocating Mr. Bryan's nomination in 1896. I was cut off from being a delegate by reason of it. But, having been editor of the Macon (Ga.) News, briefly, in '94, I got the Georgia delegation and others to work with me to get Mr. Bryan on the resolutions committee, in such manner that he replied to Senator Hill. But in 1900 we were tired of the fact that the West, the mining States, had allowed us to 'hold the bag.' Hence I suggested to Mr. Ralston that Virginia had shown the way for an honorable retreat and we followed Senator Daniels's declaration in 1900. I was then on politics on the Sentinel."

VEHEMENT DEMAND FOR FREE COINAGE.

Under date of June 25, 1895, the following unequivocal demand for a free and unlimited silver coinage declaration came to me from that dauntless hero of innumerable political battles, Judge David Sanders Gooding, long since gathered to his fathers. He maintained a law office at Indianapolis, but his place of residence was Greenfield, Hancock county. With characteristic frankness he gave utterance to his feelings in these unequivocal terms:

"Excuse me for saying that I most sincerely hope that the Democratic Editorial Association will not be coaxed, seduced or bulldozed into showing 'the white feather' on the money question. The fight is on and cannot and ought not to be dodged by any equivocal resolution. It is better to speak out now in unequivocal language. If the Democratic party of Indiana has been sold, conveyed and delivered over to the Goldbugs by Grover Cleveland, the sooner we know it the better. Be sure the Democracy of Indiana will never again be deceived by the word 'parity,' nor will they understandingly worship the golden calf. Nothing can save Indiana, in the next election, to the Democratic party but an unmistakable and bold advocacy of the free coinage of silver money."

Well, my good old friend Gooding had the promptings of his yearning soul gratified by the adoption of a free silver coinage platform, both State and Nation, but when the verdict of the ballot was announced Indiana had given 18,001 against the free silver candidate and platform. Such is the irony of political miscalculation!

Pages upon pages might be filled with the reproduction of letters that came to me from all parts of Indiana, pro and con. But what good would their reproduction do? The writers of these letters were entirely sincere and honest in their beliefs, but how prone men are to reach erroneous conclusions and make false deductions from superficial observation!

Among my collection of old letters I ran across one that came to me from an excited politician in the State of Maryland. He animadverted with a good deal of vehemence on the instability and unreliableness of the Baltimore press as to political conditions in the West and asked me to give him "inside information" as to just how Indiana was likely to vote at the Presidential election—"not for publication, only for myself and friends' satisfaction." As to Maryland, he assured me, Bryan would carry the State by "not less than 10,000 majority, matters not what the goldbug papers say." But I found later on after the votes had been counted that Maryland "went hell-bent" for McKinley by 32,224 over Bryan, besides throwing in 2,507 votes for Buckner and Palmer!

Democrats who refused to accept Bryan as their leader and free coinage as their creed evidenced no disposition to apologize for their course. A fair idea of their feelings may be formed by perusal of the following letter from the pen of Hon. Rufus Magee, who, upon the nomination of Bryan to the Presidency and the committal of the party to 16 to 1, tendered his resignation as a member of the Democratic State Committee, of which he had been made a member by his district in January of that year. Mr. Magee had been active in Democratic politics from early manhood. For years he was connected with the Democratic press of Indiana and during part of that time served as secretary of the Democratic State Committee. He officiated as Minister to Norway and Sweden under Cleveland. This is how he felt and how he expressed himself after the smoke of battle had cleared away in 1896:

"Logansport, Ind., November 13, 1896.

"My Dear Mr. Stoll: . . . This whole business resulted as it should have resulted. The nomination of Bryan was a fatal mistake, and his canvass on the idea of free coinage an error that the people could not be brought to accept. Had the party at Chicago adhered to its principles as expressed in 1892 and nominated a representative man, we would have been defeated, but with defeat we would have preserved our honor as a party, and in 1900 would have destroyed that last stronghold of protection and founded a financial system acceptable to all the people. Can we gather up the remnants, or has this whole miserable business left us not only defeated, but irretrievably broken into fragments, disorganized and dishonored as a party? I wish I could sit down with you for a while and take an inventory of the remains. It would be a melancholy office, and perhaps on our separation we would be as uncertain of the future of the party as we are now. One thing this campaign settled, viz., Populism is not popular. It was embraced with the zeal of a harlot and abandoned with the effrontery of a prude. I hope it is done for and that all such coalitions and fusions are forever ended. From the beginning I would have nothing to do with it, and yet it was hard to divorce myself from my political associations. To you, my old and honored friend, I talked more freely than to any living man, and I believe I had your sympathy and respect. It is over now and I am content. A thousand good wishes for yourself and your household, and I am,

"Sincerely your friend,

"RUFUS MAGEE."

THE MEMORABLE CAMPAIGN OF 1896

PARTY ALIGNMENTS SWIFTLY CHANGED—STRANGE BEDFELLOWSHIP NATURAL SEQUENCE.

DURING the greater part of Claude Matthews's official life, first as Secretary of State, then as Governor, I happened to be a member of the board of trustees for the Institute for the Education of the Blind. To this position I was twice elected by the General Assembly. It devolved upon me, in the performance of official duty, to make monthly pilgrimages to the State Capital. Invariably on such occasions I made it a point to call on and enjoy a more or less protracted visit with Mr. Matthews. I recall these visits with unalloyed pleasure. To me the delight thereof was heightened by the pleasing personality not only of himself, but also that of his efficient staff, his affable and accomplished niece, Miss Callie McMechen, and the genial, widely-known and ever obliging Myron D. King.

About the time Presidential possibilities in 1896 came under consideration I made one of my customary calls at Governor Matthews's office. The papers were at that time eager to discover and to exploit candidacies, real or fancied. The main object of the Democratic gold standard organs seems to have been that of bringing as many "favorite sons" into the race as possible—the more the merrier. Aspirations were aroused and encouraged with undisguised gusto. John R. Walsh's Chicago Chronicle appeared one day with a picture of Governor Matthews perched on a heavily loaded hay wagon, rake in hand, and a captivating smile on his handsome face. It didn't take long to discover that the Presidential bee had been set to buzzing in the Governor's bonnet. Delicately, at first, I expatiated on the cunning and duplicity of scheming politicians in pretending to boost Presidential candidates. I cited the experiences of Hendricks, McDonald and Gray. Observing that a recital of these experiences seemed to have no effect upon the Governor, I became more positive and emphatic in the denunciation of time-servers, sycophants, marplots and place-seekers in professing undying friendship for and devotion to men in office and in position to dole out favors of one sort or another. I knew of some of these gentry, these vipers, and I felt like expressing my contempt for them right then and there. In course of the conversation Governor Matthews told me what had been going on at the State Capital and what was in contemplation. The program as mapped out then provided for a meeting of the State Central Committee and of prominent Democrats throughout the State for the purpose of formally proclaiming Governor Matthews the choice of the Indiana Democracy for the Presidential nomination in 1896. The tempters and boosters had told the Governor that such action would entitle him to name the delegates to the national convention. The party's choice for the Presidency, these seductive flatterers assured him, had always been privileged to exercise such authority. This was news to me. In reply I told him no such authority had ever been accorded to or wielded by any Presidential aspirant since I had any part in Indiana politics, and that dated back to 1866. Furthermore, I said, no State committee in Indiana has ever presumed to declare anybody the party's choice for the Presidential nomination. That is the sole and exclusive prerogative of the State convention. "That there may be no sort of misunderstanding in regard to these matters,

I want to say, tested and proved friend that you have repeatedly declared me to be, I shall oppose with all the power at my command the carrying out of any such program. If a meeting of the sort mentioned is attempted to be held, I shall be there and make myself heard and understood—not that I am opposed to you, but that I don't propose to be a silent or acquiescent witness to any performance that can result in one thing only: your discomfiture and humiliation." The proposed meeting was never held, but the State Central Committee later on adopted resolutions commendatory of Governor Matthews as a Presidential quantity. The Governor persisted to the very last that "his friends" insisted that precedent gave him the right to name the delegates to the national convention.

Under date of January 10, 1896, Governor Matthews favored me with this information: "The reports are now in from the district meetings and altogether went off well and with a good committee selected. On account of the resolutions adopted here last month at the meeting of Democrats I am gratified that so many of the conventions on the 8th endorsed the resolutions of the State Committee, all but three of the districts giving me a good send-off. These did not do so, ruling against the introduction of all resolutions. All that passed any resolutions, except your own district, gave me a very generous endorsement. I was just a little surprised at your district, owing to the chairman of the convention and the chairman of the committee on resolutions. I am glad all passed off so smoothly. We will soon know both place and the date of our national convention. For several reasons I am inclined to favor Cincinnati, but any place rather than New York. If the convention should be held in that city, no matter who the nominee or what the platform, they would be received with a certain suspicion in the South and West."

On the day before the State convention I called on him to ascertain whether he still believed that precedent gave him the right to name the delegates. Replying in the affirmative, I said to him: "Now, Governor, a seat in a national convention has no longer any especial attraction for me, but since you have seen fit to give credence to the false assertions of your pretended boosters, I have decided to become a candidate for delegate from my district at tonight's caucus. You scan the papers in the morning and see who is elected. I'll not call here tomorrow. If you read that I am chosen, you will probably want to see me. You'll find me at the Grand Hotel." He found me where indicated. The vote for delegate stood a little better than three to one in my favor. We had a pleasant little chat, in the course of which I indicated unreservedly that as Indiana Democracy's choice he would have my unqualified support, but at no time during the conversation did I delude him with any expression or statement that could have made him believe that I regarded his nomination at Chicago as at all probable.

A careful study of the situation made it entirely clear to my mind that Indiana would not furnish the Democratic nominee for the Presidency in 1896. Events amply vindicated this conclusion. At no time during the balloting did he receive more than seven over and above Indiana's thirty instructed votes. After it was all over we met and had a heart to heart talk. With tears in his eyes and quivering voice he told me how humiliated he felt that he had permitted himself to be belied, deceived and bamboozled by a lot of designing politicians whose sinister purposes had by passing events been made entirely clear to him. Over and over he expressed the hope that I had forgiven him for whatever unpleasantness might have been associated with this affair. Said he, "You are the one man in the entire State who has been absolutely truthful, outspoken and candid with me throughout this contest. I want to feel assured of your unstinted friendship. How I do wish I had listened to you instead of those who in moments of weakness overwhelmed me with their deceptive representations and assurances and their hypocritical professions." In subsequent letters he left no doubt in my mind as to the genuineness and sincerity of this utterance.

The Democratic State Convention for 1896 was called to order in Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, June 24, by Chairman Sterling R. Holt. The Committee on Permanent Organization, through its chairman, Captain W. J. Hilligoss of Muncie, recommended as presiding officer for the day Senator Robert C. Bell of Fort Wayne, and as principal secretary, Lincoln Dixon of North Vernon. The recommendations of the committee were unanimously concurred in with applause.

Upon the conclusion of the reading of the committee's report on the selection of delegates at large to the national convention, Judge J. C. Branyan of Huntington mounted a chair and asked that the name of John G. Shanklin be substituted for that of Major Menzies, as the Major was an advocate of the gold standard. Mr. Shanklin advanced to the platform and stated that he believed the substitution should not be made, as Major Menzies had agreed to stand by the dictates of the convention and begged leave to withdraw. This was met with cries of disapproval and Major Winfrey of the First district asked that Major Menzies give the convention an idea as to how he stood on the 16 to 1 proposition. The roll-call for substitution began and it was evident that the Evansville man would be substituted when Judge Richardson of Pike county appeared on the stage and demanded as Mr. Shanklin's friend and personal representative that the roll-call be stopped, saying that Mr. Shanklin's name was not before the convention. There were protests, but Chairman Holt said: "There being but one name before the convention now, the question is on the adoption of the report." The report was adopted by a close vote.

When it had been ascertained that the committee on permanent organization had selected John B. Stoll as one of the electors at large, he at once proceeded to make an earnest effort to have the name of his friend, Judge David S. Gooding, substituted. Reason assigned was that he (Stoll) had been chosen a delegate to the national convention and that, believing in a fair division of honors, it was but simple justice that the veteran campaigner, Judge Gooding, be placed at the head of the electoral ticket. The chairman refused to re-convene the committee and so the desired change was not made, much to the regret of Mr. Stoll.

PLATFORM DECLARATIONS.

The main planks of the platform as reported by the committee and adopted by the convention read thus:

"Resolved, That we reaffirm our adherence to and faith in the Democratic doctrine of bi-metallism by the free and unrestricted coinage of both silver and gold, as primary money, at the ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting the co-operation of Great Britain or any other foreign power, all such coinage to be full legal tender in the payment of all debts, private and public.

"We are opposed to the redemption and final cancellation of United States notes (greenbacks) or any other notes or certificates issued by the United States to circulate as money, such redemption and cancellation necessarily involving an increase of the public debt by the issue of bonds and the reduction of currency.

"We demand a sufficient, stable volume of money—gold, silver and paper—to meet the requirements of our ever-growing population and the constant increase of our productive interests.

"We demand that obligations of the Government, of every form, be paid and redeemed, in conformity with the laws under which they were issued, in coin, gold and silver, at the option of the Government of the United States, and not at the option of the creditor.

"To the gallant survivors of the army of the Union, to the widows and children of those deceased, we tender our steadfast regard and gratitude. We favor the prompt adjustment, the punctual and regular payment of all pensions as the same accrue. We believe that the pension is a vested right. We heartily indorse the rule of Commissioner Murphy that no name shall be arbitrarily dropped from the rolls, and the fact of enlistment and service should be deemed conclusive evidence against prior disease or disability.

"That we do most earnestly sympathize with the people of the island of Cuba in their gallant struggle against the Spanish monarchy, for freedom and independence. We believe that public war exists in Cuba and that the parties thereto ought to be accorded all the rights of belligerents.

"The Democratic party is the faithful and consistent adherent of that great principle of popular government known as personal liberty of the citizen and oppose intolerance of whatever character, and especially oppose any attempt to control the habits of the people where such habits are consistent with the public order and general welfare.

"The comfort and convenience of all the inhabitants of the State require good roads. We are, therefore, in favor of such legislation as will serve to stimulate the enterprise of the people to the end that such roads may be constructed.

"Resolved, That this convention fully and cordially indorses the course and action of Senator Voorhees and Senator Turpie in the Senate of the United States as having been at all times true and loyal to the interests of our State and country, and as having been distinguished by signal ability and success in the discharge of the duties of their high position, and we tender the Hon. Daniel W. Voorhees, the faithful and long-tried friend of the people, our sincere sympathies in the severe illness from which he has suffered, with our heartfelt wishes for his early and complete recovery.

"Resolved, That we indorse the administration of Hon. Claude Matthews, Governor of Indiana, as having been wise, prudent and patriotic, and that his practical ability, his executive genius and capacity for public affairs, as well as his high personal integrity and character and his popularity with the people all show him to be well worthy of higher honors.

"We therefore earnestly commend him, in full confidence of success at the election, to the Democracy of the United States as a candidate for the Presidency. And the delegates from Indiana to the national convention are hereby instructed to cast their votes in his favor for President, first, last and all the time, and to use all honorable efforts to secure his nomination.

"The thirty delegates selected to represent the Democracy of Indiana in the Chicago national convention are instructed to vote as a unit upon all questions involving platform or candidates in that convention."

THE TICKET NOMINATED.

When nominations for Governor were announced to be in order, the Ninth district presented the name of James M. Sellers of Montgomery. The Thirteenth district put in nomination Benjamin F. Shively of South Bend. The Seventh district named ex-Congressman George W. Cooper of Columbus. The Second district proposed John G. Shanklin of Evansville, who promptly withdrew his name and in a few eloquently worded sentences seconded the nomination of Mr. Shively. Before the roll-call had brought forth responses from four counties, Mr. Sellers withdrew his name. The roll-call showed the nomination of Mr. Shively by a large majority, and before the result of the ballot could be announced Mr. Cooper, who was the choice of the gold standard delegates, withdrew his name, and in a singularly happy speech moved that the nomination of Mr. Shively be declared the unanimous action of the convention. It was so ordered. Loud and persistent calls brought Mr. Shively upon the platform. He was accorded a most enthusiastic ovation, to which he responded in a speech of rare felicity and choice diction.

For Lieutenant-Governor, Captain John C. Lawler of Washington county, Michael Sweeney of Dubois county, General F. E. McGinley of Lafayette, and ex-Congressman George W. Cooper of Columbus were proposed. The latter at once forbade the use of his name in that connection. On the first ballot Captain Lawler was shown to have come within six votes of the nomination. After a number of counties had been called on the second ballot, Mr. Sweeney and General McGinley withdrew their names and Captain Lawler was nominated by acclamation.

Three names were proposed for Secretary of State: Samuel M. Ralston of Lebanon, Charles W. Welman of Sullivan and John G. Offut of Trafalgar. Ralston was nominated on the first ballot by the decisive vote of 1,020 1-2 to 473 1-3 for Welman and 245 1-3 for Offut. Ralston's nomination was made unanimous.

Joseph T. Fanning of Indianapolis, W. H. Ernst of Bluffton, Jerome Herff of Peru and Alvin H. Allen of Madison were put in nomination for State Auditor. Fanning was nominated on the first ballot. He received 974½ votes, Ernst 361½, Herff 261½, Allen 144.

Allen W. Clark of Greensburg and C. W. Bridges of Indianapolis were proposed for State Treasurer, but before balloting began their names were withdrawn and, on motion of Judge David S. Gooding, Morgan Chandler of Greenfield was nominated by acclamation.

For Attorney-General, J. G. McNutt of Terre Haute was nominated on the first ballot. He received 1,222 votes to 405 for C. J. Kollmeyer of Columbus and 119 for C. H. Hartford.

Henry Warrum of Indianapolis was nominated for Supreme Court Reporter on the second ballot over Sidney R. Moon of Rochester and H. G. Yergen of Henry county.

FOR JUDGES OF THE APPELLATE COURT.

Edwin A. Taylor, First district.
Theodore P. Davis, Second district.
Frank E. Gavin, Third district.
Orlando J. Lotz, Fourth district.
George E. Ross, Fifth district.

STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

(Elected at District Conventions in January.)

1. John W. Spencer, Evansville.
 2. Parks M. Martin, Spencer.
 3. Richard H. Willett, Leavenworth.
 4. Joel Matlock, Brownstown.
 5. Frank A. Horner, Brazil.
 6. K. M. Hord, Shelbyville.
 7. Thomas Taggart, Indianapolis.
 8. J. J. Netterville, Anderson.
 9. W. H. Johnson, Crawfordsville.
 10. William H. Blackstock, Lafayette.
 11. Rufus Magee, Logansport.
 12. Thomas R. Marshall, Columbia City.
 13. Peter J. Kruyer, Plymouth.
- Sterling R. Holt, chairman, Indianapolis.

The campaign in Indiana was vigorous-ly conducted on both sides. In the earlier part the enthusiasm ran higher on the Democratic side of the house than on the Republican. By and by it became apparent that the possession of abundant campaign funds was helping the Republicans amazingly. The Democrats had very little money at their command. Democratic disaffection on account of the money question was felt quite keenly, especially in the cities and larger towns. The situation was greatly aggravated by the resignation of Sterling R. Holt as chairman of the State committee. Like many other Democrats at Indianapolis, he identified himself with the gold standard forces. Parks M. Martin of the Second district was substituted. It was a good selection. He had very much to do to make up for time lost while Mr. Holt was hesitating as to whether he should hold on or step down and out. When he found he couldn't be in sympathy with the party on what was made the paramount issue, he did the proper thing by resigning the chairmanship. As a matter of course he came in for a good deal of censure and some abuse, but that was to be expected. So many people labor under the delusion that politics has nothing in common with conscience.

Toward the latter part of the campaign the Populists favorable to the election of Mr. Bryan made overtures to the Democrats to unite on the support of one electoral ticket. In view of their developed strength they were neither backward nor overly modest in naming conditions under which they would withdraw their electoral ticket and support a fusion ticket. They wanted five Democrats taken off and five Populists substituted. Some Democrats objected to this rather vehemently. I was unable to see anything particularly objectionable to such an arrangement. Thirty thousand votes were worth considering in an emergency like this, and I made haste to announce my willingness to step down and out and let some Populist take my place. But for some reason that never was explained to me insistence was made that I should stay on and Jason B. Brown, my associate elector at large, get off. When the time for consummating the deal came I proceeded to Indianapolis to sacrifice myself. Upon arriving at the Grand Hotel I found there my associate elector at large, ex-Congressman Jason B. Brown. He was furious and swore like a trooper. He didn't want to get off and I couldn't see any reason why he should be made to get off when I was more than willing to make room for a Populist. I did my utmost to pacify him, but he was not to be reconciled. I felt quite confident that in the end Jason would have his way. My plan was to make a speech to the State Central Committee that would satisfy the members thereof that Jason was much better suited to head a Demo-Populist electoral ticket than myself. He was an out-and-out champion of 16 to 1, while I was simply a conservative bi-metallist. Well, I delivered my speech, anything but populist in tone or sentiment. To my amazement the decision to take Jason off and keep me on was declared to be irrevocable. So on I stayed, and in November meekly and complacently marched up to the political slaughter-house, as Henry Watterson was wont to say.

THE FUSION ELECTORAL TICKET.

As agreed upon by the Democratic and Populist State Committees, the Bryan electoral ticket was composed of ten Democrats and five Populists. This is the amalgamated list:

At Large—John B. Stoll, Parla D. Drain.

1. James W. Henson.
2. Elisha A. Riggins.
3. George B. McIntyre.
4. Townsend Cope.
5. Delano E. Williamson.
6. George W. Pigman.
7. Maurice Donnelly.
8. Bartlett H. Campbell.
9. William C. Smith.
10. James W. Pierce.
11. Meredith H. Kidd.
12. Frank P. Van Auker.
13. John S. Bender.

Bryan came into the State and aroused unbounded enthusiasm. He drew immense crowds wherever he engaged to speak. Mr. Shively, the nominee for Governor, a very effective campaigner, also had large and enthusiastic meetings throughout the State. For some unexplained reason the middle-of-the-road Populists persisted in keeping their State ticket in the field. This explains the difference between the vote for Bryan and the vote for Shively and the other candidates on the State ticket.

The figures here given tell the story of the political battle of 1896 in Indiana:

The entire Republican State ticket was elected by something over 26,000 plurality.

To the General Assembly the Republicans did not elect as many of their candidates as they had hoped. The Senate stood 33 Republicans, 14 Democrats, 3 Populists. The House: 52 Republicans, 39 Democrats, 9 Populists. This resulted in the election of Charles W. Fairbanks to the United States Senate, to succeed Daniel W. Voorhees—the first Republican Senator chosen since 1881, sixteen years.

The Democrats recovered four of the seats they had lost two years before. Instead of a solid Republican delegation representing Indiana in the lower House of Congress, nine of that persuasion were chosen and four Democrats given credentials. In the Second district Robert W. Miers displaced Alexander M. Harvey, in the Third William T. Zenor got the better of Robert J. Tracewell, in the Fourth the faithful and ever-alert "watchdog of the Treasury," William S. Holman, came to his own again, and in the Twelfth (Fort Wayne) district James M. Robinson scored a victory over his Republican competitor. The Nation and State sustained an irreparable loss through the death of Judge Holman during the term. The vacancy was filled by the election of Francis M. Griffith, a very excellent representative of the younger element of the party.

THE NATIONAL CAMPAIGN AS DEPICTED BY GENERAL T. E.

POWELL.

In 1894 President Cleveland sent a message to Congress which dwelt particularly upon the tariff question. He believed that the election of 1892 was an endorsement of the Democratic ideas on the tariff, and he urged immediate action in the direction of a reduction. In accordance with his idea, Wilson of West Virginia introduced a tariff bill which provoked a long contest, but after much tinkering, changing and substitution, a bill denominated the Brice-Gorman-Wilson bill was finally passed. This general tariff bill became a law on August 27, 1894, without the President's signature. It did not suit him, but he would not veto it.

The campaign of 1896 brought forth the most remarkable Democratic leader the country has seen since Andrew Jackson. Like Jackson, he first attracted attention by unstable vagaries; like Jackson, he is guided more by animosities and prejudices than by patriotism, yet like "Old Hickory," he is not without statesmanlike qualities, and, moreover, he is so highly gifted as an orator that since he has ripened he is able to present his political beliefs in the most attractive form and even to garb revenge in the mantle of justice.

The Republican party began the Presidential campaign in 1895. The party was rich in Presidential timber and a full year before the national convention could be held the friends of several aspirants were busy in their behalf. The most prominent candidates were William McKinley of Ohio, Thomas B. Reed of Maine, Levi P. Morton of New York and William B. Allison of Iowa. There seemed to be but one issue, the tariff, and toward that the minds of the people were constantly directed by the politicians.

The panic of 1893, for which there had been no political cause, having been produced mainly through the disturbance of public confidence by the wanton clamor of the Republican press, had left the country with an impression that the Democratic party was responsible for the money stringency and the hard times. Cleveland's fair trade policy had been pictured like the seven lean kine of Egypt which followed and devoured the seven fat kine, and still remained lean. The protective tariff was lauded as the cure-all for every commercial and financial trouble. The Democrats attributed the hard times to the scarcity of gold, which, being the single and only standard of values for all other commodities, paralyzed business because of its scarcity. To this they added the further arguments that Republican spell-binders disturbed the people and that the high tariff was oppressive to the workingman and the farmer. Because of Republican assaults the Democracy of the country allowed the Republicans to hold their national conventions first and outline their policy to the country.

The Republican National Convention met at St. Louis June 16, 1896, and nominated William McKinley for President by acclamation amid a scene of wild enthusiasm. The nomination was announced to the world by a Presidential salute from a battery stationed outside the convention hall.

The Republican platform pledged the party to a gold standard, a high protective tariff and opposition to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world. The platform assailed the Democratic party in the following language:

For the first time since the Civil War the American people have witnessed the calamitous consequences of full and unrestricted Democratic control of the Government. It has been a record of unparalleled incapacity, dishonor and disaster. In administrative management it has ruthlessly sacrificed indispensable revenue, entailed an unceasing deficit, eked out ordinary current expenses with borrowed money, piled up the public debt by $262,000,000 in time of peace, forced an adverse balance of trade, kept a perpetual menace hanging over the redemption fund, pawned American credit to alien syndicates and reversed all the measures and results of successful Republican rule.

This quotation illustrates the lamentable disregard of truth which politicians too often evince. Congress at the time that platform was written was constituted as follows: In the Senate there were 45 Republicans, 39 Democrats and 6 Populists; in the House 246 Republicans, against 104 Democrats, a Republican majority of 147. Whatever that Congress had done could not be charged against the Democrats, and President Cleveland was one of the strongest gold standard advocates in the country. Congress had been Democratic under the last half of President Harrison's regime, but he had the power of veto in his hands and was equally culpable with Congress for any unwise legislation. The truth is that neither Congress deserved reprobation. Also the repeal of the Bland-Allison bill had ended the coinage of silver and the gold standard was perfectly safe with Cleveland in the President's chair. The hard times and discontent were the result of wild assertions like the above made by the Republican party. To disturb public confidence is to disturb business.

Garret A. Hobart of New Jersey was nominated for Vice-President on the ticket headed by William McKinley.

The Democratic National Convention met at Chicago, June 7, 1896. It was called to order by Chairman Harity of the National Committee, who pronounced the selection of David B. Hill of New York for temporary chairman. The Silverites objected to Hill, believing him to be a rigid gold standard man, and this brought on a contest in which the silver forces put forward John W. Daniel of Virginia for temporary chairman, and he was elected. The Silverites also selected the permanent chairman, choosing Stephen M. White of California.

Almost as soon as the convention met it became apparent that the delegates favoring the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 were largely in the majority and they continued to increase in strength by the accession of gold standard men who surrendered to them, thinking it the only course to pursue. At first the Silverites had a majority, but not two-thirds of the convention. The defection of the sound money men increased the majority to more than two-thirds. Had it not been for this the two-thirds rule, which had been in force in Democratic National Conventions since the nomination of James K. Polk in 1844, would have prevented the nomination of an extreme advocate of the free coinage of silver. When the platform came up for consideration strong speeches were made against the adoption of the free coinage plank, but it was adopted by an overwhelming majority. The resolutions were read by James K. Jones of Arkansas, and a minority report was presented by David B. Hill of New York, William F. Vilas of Wisconsin and fourteen others. Hill, Vilas and Governor Russell of Massachusetts led in speeches in favor of the minority resolutions, while Benjamin R. Tillman of South Carolina and William Jennings Bryan of Nebraska spoke in favor of the silver plank. Bryan closed the debate in a speech which not only brought him the nomination for President, but made him the dictator of the Democratic party from that time to this. In his peroration he uttered that wonderful sentence which must always remain one of the gems of English metaphor: "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns; you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold." The money plank in the platform read:

Recognizing that the money question is paramount to all others at this time, we invite attention to the fact that the Constitution names silver and gold together as the money metals of the United States, and that the first coinage law passed by Congress under the Constitution made the silver dollar the unit and admitted gold to free coinage at a ratio based upon the silver dollar unit.

We declare that the act of 1873 demonetizing silver without the knowledge or approval of the American people has resulted in the appreciation of gold, and a corresponding fall in the price of commodities produced by the people; a heavy increase in the burden of taxation and of all debts, public and private; the enrichment of the money-lending class at home and abroad; prostration of industry and the impoverishment of the people.

We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender, equally with gold, for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal tender money by private contract.

A resolution was presented to the convention endorsing the administration of President Cleveland in these words: "We commend the honesty, economy, courage and fidelity of the present Democratic national administration." The report as a whole was rejected by 628 to 301, whereupon David B. Hill demanded a separate vote on the resolution of endorsement of the President. It was rejected by a vote of 564 to 357.

The candidates nominated for President were Richard P. Bland of Missouri, William Jennings Bryan of Nebraska, Claude Matthews of Indiana, Horace Boies of Iowa, Joseph C. S. Blackburn of Kentucky and John R. McLean of Ohio. Besides these the following were also voted for: Robert E. Pattison of Pennsylvania, Benjamin R. Tillman of South Carolina, Sylvester Pennoyer of Oregon, Henry M. Teller of Colorado, Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois, William E. Russell of Massachusetts, David B. Hill of New York and James E. Campbell of Ohio. Delegations from several of the States either wholly or in part refused to vote on the first ballot, and even on the last ballot there were 162 who refused to vote. The result of the first ballot was: Bland, 235; Bryan, 119; Pattison, 95; Matthews, 37; Boies, 85; Stevenson, 7; Blackburn, 83; McLean, 54; Pennoyer, 8; Teller, 8; Russell, 2; Hill, 1;

Campbell, 1. Not voting, 178. Bryan showed a steady gain, and on the fifth ballot, when his vote had reached 500, delegations began to change their votes and turn to him, and he speedily passed the 512 required to nominate. Among the delegations which broke to him on the fifth ballot was that of Ohio, which had cast 46 votes for McLean on every ballot up to that time.

There were five ballots for a candidate for Vice-President, with the result that on the fifth ballot, of which no record was made, Arthur Sewall of Maine was unanimously declared the nominee of those who still took part in the convention. John R. McLean of Ohio led on the fourth ballot with 296 votes, while Sewall had 262, Daniels of Virginia 54, Clark of North Carolina 46, Williams of Massachusetts 19, Harrity of Pennsylvania 11 and Pattison of Pennsylvania 1.

On May 28th the Prohibitionists opened their national convention at Pittsburgh. Like the Democrats, they were divided into two sections. The majority declared for Prohibition as the sole issue in the campaign, while the minority, headed by John P. St. John of Kansas, demanded a free silver plank in the platform. The "Narrow Gauge," or strict Prohibitionists, controlled the convention and nominated Joshua Levering of Baltimore, Md., for President and Hale Johnson of Illinois for Vice-President. The minority then seceded, organized the National party and nominated Charles E. Bentley of Nebraska for President and James H. Southgate of North Carolina for Vice-President.

The Socialist Labor party held a national convention in New York City on July 9, 1896, and nominated Charles H. Matchett of New York and Matthew Maguire of New Jersey for President and Vice-President.

On July 22 the Populists met in their national convention at St. Louis and decided by a vote of 785 to 615 to nominate their Vice-Presidential candidate, before considering a President. Accordingly they nominated Thomas E. Watson of Georgia, over Arthur Sewall, after which they placed William Jennings Bryan at the head of their ticket. The Silver party also held a national convention at St. Louis on July 22 and endorsed Bryan and Sewall.

When all the nominations had been made by the conventions of the various parties and the candidates squared away for the race it became apparent that the "silver question" was to be the main issue of the campaign. The Republicans had started out with tariff as their battle-cry, but they speedily discovered that the free coinage of silver was occupying the public mind to a great extent and they were compelled to substitute the slogan of sound money for that of high protection. After the passage of the Wilson bill in 1893 a quiet campaign of education had been carried on throughout the South and West by the Silverites, vast amounts of literature being distributed advocating the free and unlimited coinage of silver. This phase of the campaign was accentuated when the Democrats of the country who were opposed to free silver formed an organization called National Democrats. They were known at the time as Gold Democrats. They held a national convention at Indianapolis on September 2 and 3, at which there were 888 delegates present, representing forty-one States. In their platform they said we "insist upon the maintenance of the gold standard and the parity therewith of every dollar issued by the Government, and are firmly opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and to the compulsory purchase of silver bullion."

The convention nominated John M. Palmer of Illinois for President and Simon B. Buckner of Kentucky for Vice-President.

Until about the end of September indications pointed to a Democratic victory, but during the month of October sentiment veered rapidly in favor of the Republican party. Mark Hanna, probably the greatest campaign manager the country has ever seen, was made chairman of the Republican Committee, and under his direction a vigorous educational campaign was carried on to offset the popular sentiment for free silver. Bryan made a tremendous canvass, making speeches all over the country, winning laurels as an orator and exciting admiration by his wonderful physical endurance. McKinley, on the other hand, remained at home in Canton, Ohio, where he received delegation after delegation throughout the campaign and made speeches from the front porch of his home. In this way he must have made hundreds of speeches during the campaign, and hundreds of thousands of people visited Canton to see him and hear his views on the money and tariff questions. The Democratic press of the country turned against Bryan and the newspapers of Ohio, with a few exceptions, followed the general trend.

Political conditions throughout the country were in a peculiar condition. Cleveland's administration had been condemned and repudiated by a majority of his own party. It was a common saying that if his last term had been his first he never would have had his last. The Democratic party was making a fight for one idea and one great advocate of that idea. If Bryan had lost the support of the Gold Democrats he had the endorsement and practical support of the Populists and Prohibitionists with the addition of Silver Republicans, whose number it seemed would offset the Gold

Democrats who had broken away from the party. But as the day of election drew nearer and nearer the people of the East and North grew more and more fearful of placing the finances of the country upon a silver basis. They were told that Bryan was trying to Mexicanize the country and that if the free silver theory were endorsed in the United States the country would be dishonored and discredited with all European nations.

The total vote of the United States at the Presidential election in 1896 was 13,926,757, of which McKinley and Hobart received 7,104,779 and Bryan and Sewall 6,502,925. Palmer and Buckner received 133,148. In the electoral college McKinley had 271 votes and Bryan 176.

SPIRITED CONVENTION IN 1898

DEFEATS IN 1894 AND 1896 LEFT NO DEPRESSING EFFECTS

THOSE who were in attendance at the State Convention of the Indiana Democracy for 1898, held June 22, were unable to espy any signs of dismay, discouragement or depression on the countenances of either delegates or spectators. A feeling of buoyancy and cheer was everywhere in evidence. And the eagerness with which nominations were sought afforded warrant for the belief that hope, if not absolute confidence, dwelt within the bosoms of the various contestants for the honor implied in such recognition.

The convention was called to order by State Chairman Parks M. Martin. The report of the Committee on Permanent Organization designated Senator David Turpie as president and S. M. Briscoe of Blackford county as secretary. Report of committee unanimously adopted, followed by a characteristically incisive speech by the chosen presiding officer. Frequent applause punctuated Senator Turpie's able and eloquent address.

In recognition of the great service rendered the party from beginning to close of the '96 campaign, Samuel M. Ralston was re-nominated for Secretary of State by acclamation.

A spirited fight was put up for the nomination to the office of Auditor of State. Indianapolis presented two candidates, both strong, popular men: John W. Minor and Joseph T. Fanning. Three other aspirants contested for the nomination: Winfield Scott Johnson of Owen county, Jerome Herff of Peru and William H. Ernst of Bluffton.

On the fifth ballot the contest had narrowed down to Minor and Fanning. When the final ballot showed Minor to have received 807 votes to 721 for Fanning, the latter moved the nomination be made unanimous, which was done with a hearty good will.

Five candidates for State Treasurer sought the convention's favor. They were: Henry Stockfleth from the First district, Adam Heimberger from the Second, William C. Wulber from the Fourth, John A. M. Adair from the Seventh, and Hugh Dougherty from the Eighth.

Mr. Dougherty having received 821 votes on the second ballot, a motion was offered by Mr. Adair, seconded by all the other aspirants, that the nomination be declared the unanimous action of the convention. It was so ordered.

On motion of ex-Congressman Courtland C. Matson a unanimous renomination for Attorney-General was accorded John G. McNutt of Terre Haute.

When nominations for Supreme Judges were announced to be in order it became apparent that the extreme free silverites who objected to the renomination of Judge Hackney because he was unable to accept 16 to 1 as a tenet of Democracy could not be reconciled to his renomination without first putting up a stiff fight. They brought out that widely known and justly popular wheelhorse of Democracy in Eastern Indiana, Hugh D. McMullen of Aurora, and backed him with all their might. But a large majority of the delegates reasoned that it would be bad party policy to discriminate against Judge Hackney for being unable to view the financial question from the same standpoint Mr. Bryan and others viewed it. So the convention voted by 1,269 to 297 that he merited a renomination and thus accorded the same by overwhelming majority. The bitterest fight waged against the renomination of Judge Hackney was by the free coinage advocates in his own county, Shelby. Circulars were printed and scattered broadcast in which Judge Hackney was accused of and denounced for having said some very ugly things about champions of the 16 to 1 idea. Thus the contest became one of intense bitterness, largely personal and freely interspersed with vindictiveness. Animositities thus engendered do not usually pass out of memory quickly. They linger. Such must have been the case in this particular instance. Whatever may have led to that step, Judge Hackney decided not to stay on the ticket for re-election. A short time after his triumphant renomination he tendered his resignation to the State Central Committee, which filled the vacancy by substituting the name of Mechert Z. Stannard of Jeffersonville for that of Judge Hackney.

To save time and expedite proceedings, former U. S. District Attorney Frank B. Burke moved that the rules governing the convention be suspended and that Judges James McCabe and Timothy E. Howard be renominated by acclamation. The motion prevailed unanimously.

FOR JUDGES OF THE APPELLATE COURT.

Edwin A. Taylor, First District.
C. J. Kollmeyer, Second District.
Edgar A. Brown, Third District.
William S. Diven, Fourth District.
Johannes Kopelke, Fifth District.

RINGING PLATFORM ADOPTED.

As customary, the platform committee immediately upon its selection by the several districts, met the night before the convention to perform the task assigned to it. Samuel E. Morss, editor of the Indianapolis Sentinel, was made chairman, and Daniel McDonald, editor of the Plym- outh Democrat, secretary. The platform as formulated and adopted subsequently by the convention with spirited unanimity declared that the cause for which the United States is engaged in war with Spain is righteous, will demand the most vigorous prosecution of the war, the prompt recognition by our government of the independence of the Cuban republic, and the relinquishment by Spain of all her possessions in this hemisphere. A permanent strengthening of the navy and the improvement of our coast defenses is demanded and a liberal pension policy as regards both the victims of the Civil war and the present war favored.

The platform also contains a resolution in favor of the construction and control by the government of the Nicaraguan canal, and a declaration that all questions growing out of the present war may be left to be settled by the good sense and patriotism of the people as they may arise. The platform declared for the election of United States Senators by the people.

On the financial question there is prescribed a flat-footed, free and independent silver coinage—16 to 1—resolution; also a declaration against the gold standard and the announced policy of the Secretary of the Treasury. The inheritance tax is endorsed and Congress asked to give the Supreme Court another opportunity to pass upon an income tax.

The remainder of the platform is devoted mainly to State issues. The records of the Democratic and Republican legislatures are compared and contrasted. Considerable attention is devoted to the Democratic tax law, passed over Republican opposition, which has made possible the current reduction of the State debt. There are resolutions in favor of township and county government reform, primary election reform and amendment of the truancy law. Much attention is devoted to labor questions. Various measures demanded by the labor organizations are commended. There is also a personal liberty resolution, a strong endorsement of Senator Turpie's course in the Senate and a richly-merited tribute to the memory of the late Senator Voorhees.

THE CAMPAIGN.

Samuel M. Ralston easily maintained his reputation as an energetic, aggressive and effective campaigner that he had proved himself to be during the preceding contest. Undismayed by defeat in 1896, he buckled on the armor and put up such a fight as had never before been made by a candidate for Secretary of State. He not only spent his time in stumping the State, but drew heavily on his professional earnings, so much so that several years of his legal practice had afterward to be applied to making good what he had sacrificed during his arduous campaigning as nominee for Secretary of State.

And what did the counting of the votes at the 1898 election reveal? That little, very little, change had taken place in public sentiment. The plurality of the Republican candidate for Secretary of State in 1898 varied but little from the McKinley plurality in 1896. Let the figures here-with presented tell their own story:

VOTE FOR SECRETARY OF STATE.

|-----------------------------------|---------|
| Union B. Hunt, Republican..... | 286,643 |
| Samuel M. Ralston, Democrat..... | 269,125 |
| Aaron Worth, Prohibitionist | 9,961 |
| Henry H. Morrison, Populist..... | 5,867 |
| William Yochum, Socialist..... | 1,795 |

It will be observed that Hunt's plurality is 17,518. He lacked 105 votes of having a majority of all the votes cast at this election. Both Hunt and Ralston received several thousand votes more than their associates lower down on their respective tickets. This is due to the fact that when the Australian ballot system was first introduced in Indiana voters were educated to mark "the head" of the ticket if they wanted to cast their ballot so as to make it count for all the candidates on the ticket except when the square in front of the name on some other ticket is marked with a cross, which would mean a vote for the candidate on that particular ticket. If no such mark appeared on any of the other tickets, the marking of a cross in the party emblem circle heading each ticket would carry with it all the other candidates. It was a most excellent provision to expedite or render easy the voting of a split ticket. The people had been thoroughly educated to voting in this manner— independently if so inclined, "straight" if a strict partisan. Despite all the educating done since the law was changed, the first name method of marking a ballot still governs from six to nine thousand voters at recurring elections. Politicians who believe in the old slogan, "For the ticket, the whole ticket, and nothing but the ticket," were dissatisfied with the facility for voting a "scratched ticket," or voting as the sovereign felt inclined, and induced the legislature to change the law so as to render independent voting more difficult. In obedience to this ultra partisan demand the legislature so amended the law that to vote a straight ticket a cross must be made in one of the party emblem circles heading the various party tickets. To vote a "scratched ticket" a mark must be made in front of the name of every candidate preferred or favored by the voter. To illustrate how persistent or thoughtless adherence to the original method of voting works it may be stated that while the total vote for Secretary of State at this election was 573,391, the vote for Auditor of State was 564,995, or 8,396 less than that for Secretary of State. In a close election such as we have repeatedly had in Indiana, such discrepancies might have quite a bearing on the interests and rights of the candidates lower down in the list of candidates. Usually the difference between the votes cast for the head of the ticket and the candidates lower down is greater in the Democratic than in the Republican vote. The difference in the Democratic vote for Secretary of State and Auditor of State is 4,653, while the difference in the Republican vote for these officers is only 3,078. Where voting is done by machine these differences do not appear, but where paper balloting is still in vogue, which is the case in a majority of the counties of the State, the propensity to mark the first name on the ticket seems ineradicable.

THE REPUBLICAN PLURALITIES.

Thus the delegation was composed of four Democrats and nine Republicans. The highest pluralities were those of Zenor, Crumpacker and Steele, all three exceeding 4,000 each. The lowest plurality was that of Faris in the Terre Haute district—252.

NO RAYS OF SUNSHINE VISIBLE

ON THE POLITICAL HORIZON IN 1900—REPUBLICANS CONTINUE TO HOLD THE FORT

IN 1896 William McKinley was extensively advertised as the "advance agent of prosperity." Through the columns of the press and from the stump the people were told that as soon as the triumphant election of McKinley and Hobart to the presidency and vice-presidency were announced there would be noticeable an immediate change for the better in the industrial and commercial affairs of this country. That much credence was given these assurances is evidenced by the result of the 1896 election. That there was much disappointment over the non-fulfillment of these promises and predictions is a matter of history. Panics and business stagnations are not easily overcome. With dogged tenacity they take their course. They are more than tenacious. They can't be driven or chased into precipitous flight. Confidence is much more easily destroyed than restored or revived. Too many wounds were struck during the rage of the '93 panic to bring their healing in a few years within the range of possibilities. Signs of recovery from the havoc of the 1893 panic became clearly visible only five or six years afterwards. While it is true that a slight easing up became noticeable in 1897, it is equally true that we were near to the close of the decade before general business activity fully dispelled the gloom that had saddened the hearts of millions of men, women and children in this land of plenty.

The Democratic State Convention for 1900 was held at Indianapolis, June 6. It was ably presided over by Samuel M. Ralston, who delivered the keynote speech of that memorable campaign. John Johnson, Jr., of Versailles, officiated as secretary. For vice-presidents the following named gentlemen were designated:

1. Sidney Hatfield, Warrick.
2. J. O. Giles, Lawrence.
3. John Benz, Crawford.
4. J. F. Cox, Bartholomew.

THE PLATFORM.

The main features of the platform constructed by this committee are embraced within the following paragraphs:

"We, the Democrats of Indiana, in convention assembled, reaffirm our allegiance to the principles of liberty and justice which the Democratic party has advocated from the time of Jefferson.

"We reaffirm and pledge our allegiance to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and acknowledge our debt of gratitude to Thomas Jefferson, the author of that charter of human rights.

"We reaffirm our allegiance to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and declare our veneration for the wise and far-sighted patriots who instituted its beneficent provisions, not only for themselves, but for the welfare of the people for all time.

"We reaffirm and pledge our allegiance to the principles of the Chicago platform of 1896, and commend its distinguished exponent, William Jennings Bryan, to the people of the United States as an able statesman, a sincere patriot and an honest man, who can safely be trusted to stand at all times for the people and against their foes at home and abroad.

"And we instruct the delegates selected by this convention to cast their votes for him at the Democratic national convention to be held at Kansas City.

"We call attention to the reform legislation which the Democratic party has given the people of this State, the school book law, the tax laws, the Australian ballot, the fee and salary reform and the many statutes for the protection of labor.

"The Republican party is now hypocritically claiming credit for the reduction in our State debt, made possible by the Democratic tax law, the enactment of which it opposed.

"It has mutilated the Australian ballot law and repealed the statute making the bribery of voters a penal offense. In four years of absolute control of State affairs it has failed to pass any effectual legislation against monopolies or trusts, but has uniformly defeated all effort to enact anti-trust laws.

"We call attention to the extraordinary concentration of wealth and the alarming growth of monopoly during the McKinley administration; the arbitrary regulation of markets; the increased cost of living; the loss of industrial independence; the despotic power of employment and discharge of American labor, now concentrating in a few hands; the activity of these monopolies in politics; their increasing influence in the enactment and enforcement of the laws, and the unconcern or real favors with these things are regarded by the Republican leaders. Relief can not be expected so long as the friends of trusts remain in office. The Democratic party, free from their influence, and not embarrassed by their favors, pledges its representatives in office to the positive enactment and enforcement of anti-trust legislation."

STATE TICKET NOMINATED.

Upon the completion of the preliminary proceedings the convention settled down to the nomination of a State ticket, with this result:

Governor—John W. Kern, Indianapolis.

Lieutenant-Governor—John C. Lawler, Salem.

Secretary of State—Adam Heimberger, New Albany.

Auditor of State—John W. Minor, Indianapolis.

Treasurer of State—Jerome Herff, Peru.

Attorney-General—Charles P. Drummond, Plymouth.

Reporter Supreme Court—Horace G. Yergin, Newcastle.

Supt. Public Instruction—Charles A. Great-house, Mount Vernon.

Chief Bureau of Statistics—Edward Horuff.

Judge Supreme Court—George L. Reinhard, Spencer.

Judge Supreme Court—Joseph W. Adair, Columbia City.

Most of the foregoing nominations were made by acclamation.

There was considerable confusion with reference to the nomination of candidates for Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. A goodly number of delegates favored the nomination of both Shively and Lawler, the nominees in 1896. A great deal of uncertainty prevailed as to whether Mr. Shively desired a renomination. The candidacy of John W. Kern was pushed with much aggressiveness. The situation was greatly relieved when announcement was finally made that Mr. Shively had definitely determined not to be a candidate.

John W. Kern was put in nomination for Governor by John H. Spencer of Daviess county. The Third district formally presented the name of Frank B. Burke of Jeffersonville, and the Tenth district offered Nelson J. Bozarth of Valparaiso as his choice.

The first and only ballot resulted: Kern, 819½; Burke, 369¼; Shively, 292¾; Bozarth, 41; Charles G. Conn, 2; Samuel M. Ralston, 1. The usual motion to make the nomination of Mr. Kern unanimous prevailed.

The contest for Lieutenant-Governor became quite animated. Four candidates were placed before the convention: Captain John C. Lawler, Salem; Major John R. Simpson, Paoli; Johannes Kopelke, Crown Point; Mason J. Niblack, Vincennes. On the first ballot Lawler had 540, Kopelke, 401; Simpson, 383; Niblack, 141. The second ballot gave Lawler 701½; Kopelke, 483½, Simpson, 248; Niblack, 71. Lawler had 1,024 on the final (third) ballot to 513 for Kopelke. The names of Simpson and Niblack were withdrawn after the second ballot. Upon the announcement of the third ballot Mr. Kopelke moved that the nomination of Captain Lawler be declared unanimous. This was done, accompanied with lively cheering.

The nominations of Adam Heimberger for Secretary of State, John W. Minor for Auditor, and Jerome Herff for Treasurer were made by acclamation as a compliment to the vigor of their campaign two years before.

For Attorney-General, Charles P. Drummond of Plymouth, Carl J. Kollmeyer of Columbus, and J. Frank Mann of Muncie were put in nomination. The first ballot gave Drummond 727, Kollmeyer, 549; Mann, 243. Drummond lacked 21 votes of being nominated on the first ballot. He had a surplus on the second ballot, which gave him 840; Kollmeyer, 501; Mann, 153. Drummond's nomination was then made unanimous.

There were no contests over the other places on the ticket, which was generally adjudged a strong one, entitled to the undivided support of the party, and deemed eminently worthy of the confidence and esteem of the electorate.

FREE-SILVER AND ANTI-IMPERIALISM THE MAIN ISSUES.

The activities of the free-silver element were so marked that two or three separate conventions of its advocates were held in different parts of the country with a view to determining whether to enter the campaign as distinct organizations or amalgamate with the Democrats in case that party reaffirmed its adherence to that cause. The extremists, Populists, unwilling to take chances, nominated a ticket of their own, composed of Wharton Barker of Pennsylvania for president, and Ignatius Donnelly of Minnesota for vice-president. The Fusion Populists also held a convention, attended by 1,000 delegates. They were willing to accept Bryan as the head of the ticket, but also quite insistent that the Democrats name Charles A. Towne of Minnesota for the Vice-Presidency. This caused the Democrats a good deal of trouble at their convention, held at Kansas City, July 4. The Fusionists, mostly Free-Silver Republicans, met at the same place and time. The outcome of the contest, so far as the Democrats were concerned, was the nomination of former Vice-President Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois, as Bryan's running mate. Colonel McClure tells the story in this compact form:

"Two conventions were called to meet at Kansas City July 4, 1900, viz.: the Democratic and the Free-Silver Republican. The conventions were called to meet at the same place and time because it was well understood that they would harmonize at least on the candidate for President and probably upon the entire national ticket. As the Silver Republicans are a mere appendage of the Bryan party, their convention took no important action until the Democrats had finished their work. The Democratic convention was very largely attended, every State and Territory being represented, including Hawaii, and it was little more than an enthusiastic mass meeting to make William Jennings Bryan President. Governor Thomas of Colorado was made temporary chairman, and Representative J. D. Richardson of Tennessee was permanent president. Mr. Bryan was at his home in Lincoln, Neb., but was in constant communication with his Democratic leaders at Kansas City, and was visited by a number of individuals and delegations who desired to impress upon him the necessity of some particular action relating to the Vice-Presidency or to the platform.

"There were two vital points of dispute between the Democratic leaders. The most important related to the distinct reiteration of the free-silver policy to be maintained at the ratio of sixteen to one, and the other involved the question of accepting Ex-Representative Towne as the candidate for Vice-President, who had already been nominated by the Fusion Populists at Sioux Falls, and who was specially desired as the candidate by the Free-Silver Republicans. The discussion on the question of simply approving the Chicago platform in a general and perfunctory way and making trusts and imperialism the great issues of the contest, was very earnest and developed a considerable degree of bitterness. The Democratic leaders of the Eastern States were nearly or quite unanimous in favor of relegating the Free-Silver issue to the rear by the simple affirmation of the Chicago platform, and elaborating the issues of trusts and imperialism in the new platform. It was evident that a majority of the delegates believed that to be the wiser policy for the party, but Mr. Bryan, who was freely consulted on the subject, was very emphatic in demanding that there should be a distinct reiteration of the Free-Silver plank of the Chicago platform.

"Notwithstanding the earnest expressions of Mr. Bryan there was a very animated contest in the platform committee, and the free-silver plank was admitted by a vote of twenty-six to twenty-four, and five of the twenty-six votes cast in favor of the free-silver plank were given by the Territories of Arizona, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Hawaii and Indian Territory. After the committee had decided in favor of Mr. Bryan's views as to the plank on the silver question, the friends of the more conservative policy decided not to make a battle in open convention, and the platform was adopted practically without opposition. The following table gives the votes by States in the platform committee by which the distinct free-silver plank was embodied in the platform:

Mr. Towne was formally nominated for Vice-President by the Silver Republicans, but later on yielded to pressure by withdrawing and agreeing to support Mr. Stevenson as Bryan's running mate.

THE INDIANA CAMPAIGN.

With John W. Kern at the head of the Indiana State ticket, a vigorous campaign was conducted in this commonwealth. Mr. Bryan devoted considerable attention to Indiana, delivering an unusually large number of speeches within its borders. In most of his speeches he presented anti-imperialism as the paramount issue, without, however, evading or ignoring free-silver as a live question. The result of the election in November was about what had been generally foreseen by shrewd observers. Both McKinley and Bryan polled a larger vote than they had received in 1896. The total vote of Indiana in 1900 was 664,- 094. Of this, McKinley had 336,063; Bryan, 309,584; John G. Wooley (Prohibitionist), 13,718; Debs (Socialist), 2,374; Barker (Populist), 1,438; Mahoney (Labor Socialist), 663; Ellis (Union Reform), 254.

In 1896 Indiana's total vote was 637,305. Of this McKinley had 323,754; Bryan, 305,753. Four other candidates received, respectively, 3,056, 2,268, 329, 2,145, the latter being John M. Palmer's Democratic gold standard vote.

In the electoral college in 1896, McKinley had 271 votes to Bryan's 176. In 1900 McKinley's electoral vote was increased to 292, while Bryan's was reduced to 155. How this came about is thus told by Col. McClure:

"Bryan knew that it would cost him many votes thus to force the distinct affirmation of the silver policy, but he naturally assumed that his chief loss would be in States which were hopeless under any circumstances, and that he would gain largely by the Free-Silver Republican vote in the Western States, which had formerly been Republican, but were apparently devoted to free silver. The result proves that this was an error on the part of Bryan, as it saved none of the Western States which he would not have carried under any circumstances, and lost him some of the strong Republican States which he had carried in 1896. He underestimated the general revulsion against the cheap money (16 to 1) policy, but he hoped by his active campaign to hold the Western debatable States. In this he calculated erroneously. He saved Colorado by less than 30,000 that he had carried by 135,000 four years before; he lost Kansas by over 23,000 that he had formerly carried by over 12,000; he lost Nebraska, his own State, by nearly 8,000, that he had formerly carried by 13,500; he lost South Dakota by 15,000 that he had carried before by 183; he lost Washington by nearly 13,000 that he had formerly carried by about the same majority; he lost Wyoming by 4,200 which he had formerly carried by 600, and he lost Utah by over 2,000 that he had carried by over 50,000 in his first battle. The only State he gained in his second battle was Kentucky, that gave an average majority of 280 for the Republican electors in 1896, with the single exception of one Democratic elector, who was chosen and voted for Bryan, and gave 8,000 for Bryan in the last contest."

JUDGE DANIEL P. BALDWIN'S CRITIQUE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA

(From the Indiana Law Journal, Volume III, No. 3.)

It is never fair to measure a single judge or a court composed of several judges by their occasional lapses. The Supreme Court of the United States has made some unpardonable mistakes—for example, the Dred Scott decision, the Legal Tender cases and the Income tax case; still he would be a very unjust critic who would on this account ignore its century of splendid work in and by which it has proven itself our greatest constitutional and social bulwark.

Chief Justice Taney was a very great judge, notwithstanding the Dred Scott decision. There never has been a time when that great tribunal has been without a great judge, beginning a century ago with John Marshall, and ending today with Mr. Justice Harlan. And it is so in a less degree with our Indiana Supreme Court. While it occasionally, as I have pointed out, makes a line of erroneous decisions, still upon the whole it has produced some eminent judges, and its work for the last thirty-five years has been an honor both to it and to the State. If it has had no great judges we must remember it takes a vast deal more to make a great judge now than it did seventy-five years ago.

The history of our Supreme Court embraces two periods; one under the Constitution of 1816, and the other under that of 1851. During the first period, when Indiana was in its formative state, it did excellent work, and was graced by such jurists as Blackford, Sullivan, Dewey and Stevens. Its last years were its poorest, and when it closed its work in 1851 the name of Blackford alone redeemed it from obscurity. When it was reconstructed in 1852 its first bench elected that year were fair average men; unfortunately its work deteriorated; so much so that in 1860 it became almost a disgrace to our State. It is doubtful if in the whole Union there are ten more trashy volumes of reports than from the tenth to the twentieth Indiana, each inclusive. Some of the opinions are not even grammatically expressed. The Court's principal aim seems to have been to dodge as many questions as possible. The word "slipshod" is none too severe to apply to its work from 1857 to 1862. And yet, even in those days when it was at its lowest judicial ebb, it had one very superior judge—James L. Worden—who held this position for over eighteen years, and who often wrote, when the spirit moved him, a very able opinion. In 1864 the long-wished-for change came. Under the leadership of James S. Frazer our Supreme Court abandoned its former disreputable practice of dodging, and met difficult questions fairly and squarely. Any one who will compare the reports from the twenty-first to the thirty-first with those from the tenth to the twentieth will fully bear me out in this statement.

James S. Frazer was in many respects a great judge. It is currently reported that he came very near being appointed under Grant the successor of Chief Justice Chase at Washington. Had this occurred he would have proven himself as conspicuous and able a man as Chief Justice Waite. The bench of 1864 was succeeded in 1870 by four Democrats, who kept up the standard set by their immediate Republican predecessors. Later on a fifth judge was appointed—Andrew L. Osborn—a very competent man, who only served about eighteen months, not long enough to bring before the public his great ability. In 1876, owing to a scandal that arose, three of the four judges elected in 1870 were compelled to retire, and two new men came in and served for twelve years thereafter who added great credit to the bench. These were Justices George V. Howk and William E. Niblack, both of them very sound lawyers and eminent judges. In 1880 they were reinforced by two other men of equal ability—William A. Woods and Byron K. Elliott. The Court reached its highest point in 1881, when these four gentlemen, with James L. Worden, constituted the bench. It was then that its best record was made, and it is entirely safe to say that no State court in the Union presented better opinions to the profession than then did the Supreme Court of Indiana. Each judge was a host in himself. Unfortunately, about this time a side court was organized, called the "Commissioners," whose work, owing to the frequent changes in their personnel, whose appointment was influenced more or less by political considerations, was somewhat inferior and detracted from the reputation of the Supreme Court proper, which had to assume the burden of some very weak decisions. In 1884 Joseph A. S. Mitchell was elected, who proved a very superior judge. His lamented death cut short a growing reputation. From 1882 the changes were painfully frequent, but the Court was never without one or more especially strong men, of whom Silas D. Coffey and Timothy E. Howard are examples. The State has never had better judges than these two last-named gentlemen, and it is very unfortunate that the exigencies of party politics defeated their re-election.

Let me pause a moment here and recall the names of the eminent members of the Supreme Court for the last forty years: James L. Worden, James S. Frazer, George V. Howk, William E. Niblack, William A. Woods, Byron K. Elliott, Joseph A. S. Mitchell, Silas D. Coffey and Timothy E. Howard. If they had had a wider sphere they would have all made national reputations. I say "wider sphere," for we must remember that we have five and forty States, each with a highly organized court of last resort; each with local jurisprudence upon which the best energies of their respective judges must be exhausted, so that it is seldom, indeed, that such judges acquire reputations beyond State lines.

The court which has just been broken up, and which served from 1893 to 1899, fully maintained the high standard of its predecessors. Leonard J. Hackney and James McCabe were both very hard working, conscientious, able men, and, barring an occasional mistake, deserve the highest commendation. And so with the two present hold-over judges—Leander I. Monks and James H. Jordan, and while the three new men elected last fall have yet their spurs to win, their high reputations as lawyers make it a certainty that in the very near future they will win them.

In 1891 the Appellate Court was organized. Unfortunately, the terms were too short and the election too uncertain to give its members a fair chance. In less than eight years sixteen different men have been appointed or elected, and only one of them—George L. Reinhard—held his office six years. But he made a reputation upon the Appellate Bench which places him in the front rank of Indiana judges.

Concerning the reports and revisions, in 1860 we had twenty volumes—eight of Blackford and twelve of Indiana—with a wretched slipshod digest and a work on practice quite as bad. Now we have one hundred and seventy-eight volumes of reports, with digests, indexes and well-written text-books by Indiana authors, of whom we have just reason to be proud. The revision of our statutes in 1881 by Frazer, Stotsenburg and Turpie was a masterpiece, and had the merit of being condensed into a single, easily handled, inexpensive volume, instead of the four bulky, high-priced books, largely built for revenue, commonly called "Burns's Revision."

Since 1860 our reports have appeared at the rate of four volumes every year, but the price is so low that no one complains. It is seldom that a volume issues which does not contain a dozen or more opinions of very great research and ability, but which, so great is the pressure of legal business upon the ordinary practicing lawyer, and so high is the standard of judicial opinions, attract no special attention; whereas, had these same opinions appeared sixty years ago they would have made the judges who wrote them famous all through the United States.

One must needs learn to read between the lines of our reports to see and enjoy the kaleidoscopic views of life of which they are the outcome. Almost every case is a tragedy, at least for the losing party. Here are mingled the record of crimes of the blackest dye, temptations yielded to by inexperience, marriage hopes blasted, rosy speculations nipped in the bud, frauds uncovered, labor's grievances, the poor man's sorrows and the proud rich man's triumphs—each representing a life and death personal struggle. It is amazing if we only stop to reflect what enormous power these five quiet, unpretending gentlemen wield, and comforting to know how conscientious and considerate they are of the rights of three million people which constitute their bailiwick. Every precaution is taken to get on the right side of a case, and it is the verdict of even the defeated lawyers, of whom there must be one or more in every decision, after the disappointment and smart is over, that upon the whole a large majority of all the cases submitted are correctly decided. So long as judges are men and the personal equation exists, it is impossible but that there should be mistakes made in our courts of last resort.

"Justice freely administered and without purchase; completely and without denial; speedily and without delay," is a constitutional ideal, a "glittering generality" only approximately true; while justice ultimately and expensively attained and often defeated through senseless technicalities is the reality.

HARMONY PREVAILED IN 1902

MOST OF THE NOMINATIONS WERE MADE BY ACCLAMATION

THE State convention of 1902, which met in Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, June 4, was pre-eminently harmonious from opening to close. There were few contests for any of the places on the ticket, and the best of feeling prevailed over the selections made.

John W. Kern of Indianapolis presided over the convention and Dr. John W. Nusbbaum of Auburn served as principal secretary.

THE TICKET NOMINATED.

Evidently the convention was actuated by a desire to proceed expeditiously in naming candidates for the various offices to be filled at the following election. The Twelfth district presented the name of Otis L. Ballou of Lagrange for Secretary of State. This was quickly followed by Senator Stephen B. Fleming of Fort Wayne proposing the name of Albert Schoonover of Attica. The latter was nominated by a vote of 828 to 719 for Ballou. On motion of the latter Schoonover's nomination was made unanimous.

After Mr. Schoonover had delivered his speech of acceptance, Benjamin F. Shively made formal announcement that the committee on resolutions had a supplemental report. This report recommended and urged the appointment of the Hon. Thomas Taggart as chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Unanimous and enthusiastic approval of the recommendation was the convention's response.

Thereupon the following nominations were made by acclamation:

For Auditor of State—James R. Riggs of Sullivan.

For State Treasurer—Jerome Herff of Peru.

For Attorney-General—Senator Wm. E. Stillwell of Sullivan.

For Clerk of the Supreme Court—Adam Heimerberger of New Albany.

For Superintendent of Public Instruction Samuel L. Scott of Jeffersonville and James L. Glasscock of Lafayette were placed in nomination. The vote stood: Scott, 829; Glasscock, 718. On motion of the latter Scott's nomination was made unanimous.

For Judge of the Supreme Court, Fifth district, Timothy E. Howard of South Bend was nominated by acclamation.

For Appellate Judges, John R. East, Wm. H. Bracken and John D. Megee were nominated by acclamation for the Southern division. For the Northern division four candidates were entered. The three nominated and the vote received by each were: Richard H. Hartford, 1,493 votes; James T. Saunderson, 1,312; Henry G. Zimmerman, 1,404. N. G. Bozarth of Valparaiso, received 424 votes.

TAGGART'S ADVENT INTO NATIONAL POLITICS.

The action of the State convention of 1902, proposing and urging the selection of Thomas Taggart as Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, renders fitting and appropriate the reproduction of the following sketch of his life. It is from the pen of the widely known publicist, Jacob P. Dunn, of Indianapolis.

"It has fallen to the lot of very few, if any, men to exercise as much influence over Indianapolis as Thomas Taggart has exercised, though he is not of one of the old families of the place. He was born in County Monaghan, Ireland, November 17, 1856, a son of Thomas and Martha (Kingsbury) Taggart. The family came to America and located at Xenia, Ohio, in 1861. Here young Thomas received his common school education, and, as a boy, began his business career as clerk in a railway hotel and restaurant. His affable manners and good sense made him valuable to his employers, and he was sent to Garrett, Indiana, in 1874, and to Indianapolis in 1877. Here he had charge of the Union Depot eating room, and after a few years bought his employers (the Ohmers) out and conducted it himself. It became famous among railroad and traveling men. Dozens of Indianapolis people went there for Sunday dinners, and nobody went habitually who did not become a personal friend of Mr. Taggart.

"Thomas Taggart's popularity brought him the Democratic nomination for county auditor in 1886, with little effort on his part, but in the campaign he showed himself a phenomenon as a political organizer and worker. His administration of the office was satisfactory to everybody, and although the custom was to give only one term in a four-year office, no one came out for it in 1890, and he was nominated without opposition and elected. He had been made Democratic chairman in 1888 and was made State chairman in 1892 and again in 1894. In 1895 he was elected mayor, and re-elected in 1897 and 1899. During all this time he continued his private business, and in the meantime left the depot eating room to conduct the Grand Hotel. He later took on the management of the New Denison and the extensive

French Lick establishment. His business capacity is extraordinary, with a remarkably accurate judgment of men, and a faculty for dispatching work rapidly, he undoubtedly has disposed of more work, public, private and political, in the last thirty years than any other man in Indianapolis.

"And he did his work well. Mistakes were made, of course, but not from lack of attention. Mr. Taggart never pretended to be a 'statesman,' but he always heard what the 'statesman' had to say, and made his judgment on the case presented with the addition of such practical information as he saw advisable to secure; and his judgment was usually good. Such has been the opinion of his associates, and there have been plenty of them who were competent judges. He was made a member of the Democratic National Committee in 1900, and chairman of that body in 1904 for a term of four years. He has been continued as committeeman from Indiana to the present.

"Like all men of such political prominence, Mr. Taggart has his own warm admirers and bitter enemies, with all shades of opinion between them, and the truth well at the center. He has been the object of numerous assaults from newspapers, notably the Hearst papers after his opposition to Hearst's nomination for the presidency. He is charged with being a 'machine politician,' which is true enough—there are few of any other kind—but his adherents have always called him 'the easy boss.' He has always stuck to his friends, even at times when it would have been more judicious to crucify some of them; and probably more of the hostility to him is on account of his friends than on account of himself. Friends and foes alike concede his amiability. He has a good disposition. He does not treasure malice, and there is nothing mean recorded against him. Political emergencies have at times required him to spear some aspiring countryman, but he always used an anesthetic when possible; and he has always carved the tragedy on his conscience and made reparation afterwards when in his power.

"Mr. Taggart was married on June 16, 1877, to Miss Eva D. Bryant. He is now understood to be quite wealthy, and it may be noted that his money was not made from politics. In addition to a profitable hotel business, he was one of a number of Indianapolis men who secured control of a bonanza copper mine in Mexico which brought them all handsome fortunes.”

TWO STATE CONVENTIONS IN 1904

FIRST DEALT WITH PRESIDENTIAL CHOICE, SECOND NAMED STATE TICKET

OWING to uncertainties and complications that threateningly stared party managers in the face in 1904 it was wisely decreed that two conventions be held—one to secure proper representation in the National Convention, which had been called to be held in St. Louis, July 9, 1904. The second convention of the Indiana Democracy was fixed for August 2, 1904. Upon it devolved the duty and responsibility of selecting a State ticket.

The first convention, held at Indianapolis, 1904, was called to order by State Chairman Wm. H. O'Brien. Divine blessing was invoked by the Rev. G. McIntosh of the Fourth Presbyterian church, who prayed that nothing might be done of which the people of Indiana should ever have cause to feel ashamed. In conformity with the recommendation of the committee on permanent organization, Alonzo Green Smith presided over the convention. Lew G. Ellingham of the Decatur Democrat was made principal secretary, and Elliot R. Hooton officiated as sergeant-at-arms.

A somewhat protracted and at times decidedly animated debate took place between some of those who favored the nomination of Alton B. Parker to the presidency and the supporters of William Randolph Hearst. The sentiment of the convention ran overwhelmingly in opposition to the latter. This was emphasized in the selection of William H. O'Brien, G. V. Menzies, Benjamin F. Shively and John W. Kern as delegates at large to the National Convention, with Ora F. Creigmile, Willis Hickman, A. E. Melching and Benjamin F. Deahl as alternates.

The State ticket was nominated with practical unanimity. There was a contest over the Lieutenant-Governorship between Warder W. Stevens of Salem and Frank E. Hering of South Bend. Mr. Hering was placed in nomination by the First district. The ballot gave Hering 522½ votes, Stevens 1,024½. Before the result was announced Mr. Hering gracefully moved the nomination of Mr. Stevens to be recorded as having been made unanimous. This was done heartily and enthusiastically. The ticket as nominated consisted of the following named gentlemen.

- For Governor—John W. Kern.
For Lieutenant-Governor—Warder W. Stevens.
For Secretary of State—Edward J. Fogarty.
For Auditor—James R. Riggs.

THE INDIANA STATE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM FOR 1904

Approves and indorses the wise and conservative declaration of principles by the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis, and the selection of Alton B. Parker and Henry G. Davis as candidates for President and Vice-President.

Condemns apportionment laws of 1903, and instead favors a fair and just apportionment law based upon the Constitution, guaranteeing to every voter in the State the equal right with every other in the selection of those who make our laws.

Condemns the administration of Governor Winfield T. Durbin.

Condemns the placing of the State benevolent and penal institutions on a partisan basis, and disapproves of the iniquitous Ripper Bill.

Opposes the creation of a Prison Reform Board.

Denounces as false in statement and implication the declaration of the State Republican Platform that 'During the last ten years of Republican control of State affairs the State debt has been reduced from $7,520,615.12 to $2,162,215.12, and the State tax levy has been reduced from 32 cents to 30¾ cents on each $100 of taxable property.

Commends the Democratic members of the last Legislature for their courageous, open and manly stand for the rights of the people on all questions that came before them.

Opposes all efforts to debauch the suffrage; all efforts to merge the ownership of the railroads of the State in foreign corporations; all efforts to make political spoils of the State benevolent and penal institutions; all efforts to needlessly multiply offices and increase the burden of the taxpayers.

Pledges protective legislation to the shippers of the State; labor legislation recognizing the just rights of both employer and employe; protective legislation to depositors in banking institutions and also to banks; legislation which will prevent unnecessary public expenditures and reduce the burdens of taxation now oppressing the people of Indiana.

Favors the repeal of the Metropolitan Police law and recommends restoring local self-government.

The outcome of the 1904 campaign, State and national, proved a woeful disappointment to Democrats who had built strong hopes upon favorable results. Judge Parker's nomination did not develop the strength that had been fondly hoped for, neither East nor West. Never before in the history of Indiana was there experienced such a slump as occurred at the polls in November. A plurality close up toward one hundred thousand was something, up to that time, unheard of in this State. But let the returns do their own talking.

Prohibition, Peoples, Social and Social-Labor congressional tickets were also in the field. Only two of the thirteen Democratic nominees were successful.

The General Assembly for 1905 had in the Senate thirty-six Republicans and fourteen Democrats; in the House, seventy-nine Republicans and twenty-one Democrats.

In company with quite a number of Democratic newspaper men from all parts of the country I attended, during the early part of September, a banquet at the Waldorf-Astoria in the city of New York and greatly enjoyed a pilgrimage to the delightful country residence of Judge Alton B. Parker, popularly known as "Esopus," located on the banks of the beautiful Hudson. The presidential nominee delivered a well-considered address to the visiting delegation. It was a thoughtful talk by a thoughtful man, but it failed to make a deep impression or to awaken any degree of enthusiasm. We returned to New York by boat. It was a delightful trip. At the Waldorf-Astoria it was my good fortune to meet John R. McLean, owner of the Cincinnati Enquirer, and later on our own James Murdock of Lafayette. In going over the situation, and taking cognizance of the authentic and verified expressions by the business element of New York, all three of us soon became convinced that Judge Parker, admirable man that he was, had no chance of an election and was doomed to inevitable defeat.

ENTHUSIASM FOR WM. J. BRYAN

WAS THE DISTINGUISHING FEATURE OF THE 1906 CONVENTION

REMARKABLE and extraordinary was the 1906 convention of the Indiana Democracy in this, that every nomination was made by acclamation and without contest, and that a resolution extending greetings to William Jennings Bryan and pledging the State to him in 1908, elicited such an outburst of applause and spontaneous enthusiasm as has rarely been heard at any gathering of America freemen. The demonstration that punctuated the reading of the resolution by Samuel M. Ralston was simply wonderful.

The convention was held on the 7th day of June, and was called to order by State Chairman Wm. H. O'Brien. Benjamin F. Shively of South Bend was made permanent chairman, and M. A. Sweeney of Jasper, principal secretary. By reason of an engagement elsewhere that compelled him to leave the city, Mr. Shively turned the convention over to Charles A. Cole of Peru.

The ticket nominated with unprecedented unanimity was composed of these staunch Democrats:

- Secretary of State—James F. Cox of Columbus.
- Auditor of State—Marion Bailey of Lizton, Hendricks county.
- Treasurer of State—John Isenbarger of North Manchester.
- Attorney-General—Walter J. Lotz of Muncie.
- Supt. of Public Instruction—Prof. Robert J. Aley of State University at Bloomington.
- Clerk of Supreme Court—Bert New of North Vernon.
- Judges of Supreme Court—Richard E. Erwin and Eugene A. Eby.
- Judges of the Appellate Court—Milton B. Hotel, Edward W. Felt, Richard H. Hartford, Henry G. Zimmerman, Henry A. Steis.
- Chief of Bureau of Statistics—David N. Curry.
- State Geologist—Edward Barrett.

COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

- John W. Boehne, Evansville.
- Royal E. Purcell, Vincennes.
- Charles L. Jewett, New Albany.
- Joseph M. Cravens, Madison.
- J. S. McFaddin, Rockville.
- B. B. Johnson, Richmond.
- Theodore P. Davis, Indianapolis.
- Abe Simmons, Bluffton.
- Samuel M. Ralston, Lebanon.
- James McCabe, Williamsport.
- Benjamin F. Louthain, Logansport.
- Stephen B. Fleming, Fort Wayne.
- Henry A. Barnhart, Rochester.

ADVERSITY STILL REIGNED.

Notwithstanding the excellence of the ticket presented to the electorate by the Democracy of Indiana, and in the face of the unanimity that marked its nomination, the outcome of the 1906 election was approximately as unfavorable and adverse as were the six preceding ones. It is true, the stupendous figures of 1894 and of 1904 were not reached, but majorities or pluralities veering around the 30,000 mark must be considered abnormal in a State that for more than a half century rarely recorded a victory in excess of five or six thousand. For the seventh time in unimpeded succession Democracy went down in defeat.

That such should have been the fate of the party at a time when unexampled unanimity characterized its convention proceedings serves as a verification of an old-timer's observation that there may be such a thing as too much harmony in framing a ticket, and that nominations made in a good stiff fight are usually more productive of success than unsought and uncontested nominations. Ben Butler, while yet steeped in orthodox Democracy, before having become contaminated by Jacobinism and Greenbackism, used to gloat over the fiercest of fights in Democratic conventions. With cock-eyed twinkle, he said uproars in a Democratic convention invariably reminded him of the effect of the famous Kilkenny cat fight—the fiercer the fight, the greater the multiplicity of cats! In the chapter to follow this may be found a verification of gruff old Ben's quaint philosophy.

It was Colonel Wm. R. Morrison, of blessed memory, who was wont to remark after a disappointing ending of an especially brilliant campaign, during which enthusiasm reigned supreme, that he had become thoroughly convinced that the tossing up of a hat into the air did not always mean a vote. Colonel Morrison had an active participation in numerous campaigns in his own dear Illinois.

STORY OF THE BATTLE OF THE BALLOT IN 1906.

Here it is in words and figures—the tabulated official vote for Secretary of State, followed by the cabalistic figures of decisive pluralities that gave prestige and emolument to numerous ambitious, and presumably deserving, Hoosiers of the Republican faith:

Thus the Indiana delegation was made to stand nine Republicans to four Democrats.

The Prohibitionists and Socialists also had congressional candidates.

The Republicans maintained their lead in the General Assembly of 1907. There were in the Senate 37 Republicans to 13 Democrats. In the House 54 Republicans to 45 Democrats.

GOVERNOR HANLY PAVED THE WAY FOR A DEMOCRATIC JUBILEE IN INDIANA IN 1908

POLITICAL favors at times are extended strangely and under peculiar circumstances. Occasionally they come from sources least expected or suspected. Such an experience was had by the Democracy in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight. And the favor came from a man who has yet to utter a single sentence favorable to or kindly of the Democratic party. For years and years he took infinite delight in hurling fiery anathemas at the party in which he absolutely could see no good and which he affected to regard as wholly and hopelessly bad. By forcing his party to take a step it did not want to take at that unpropitious time, and by making most vicious attacks upon public officials chosen by the same ballots that made him Governor of this commonwealth, he so completely demoralized, disorganized and disrupted the Republican party of Indiana that the most important part of its State ticket was defeated outright and the remainder thereof saved by a scratch.

The Democratic State convention for 1908 was held at Indianapolis, March 26, 1908. It was called to order by Chairman U. S. Jackson. Former Congressman Robert W. Miers of Bloomington, presided and A. D. Moffat of Hartford City, officiated as secretary.

Auditor—Marion Bailey, Lizton, Hendricks county.

Treasurer—John Isenbarger, North Manchester.

The only contests were over the Governorship and Lieutenant-Governorship. Both were sharply and vigorously conducted. For the Governorship there were five entries: L. Ert Slack, proposed by Congressman Lincoln Dixon; Rev. Thomas H. Kuhn, presented by the Sixth district; Carroll K. McCullough, by the Eighth; Samuel M. Ralston, presented by the Ninth; Thomas R. Marshall, presented by the Twelfth, and Colonel Charles Girard Conn, presented by the Thirteenth district.

A newspaper report stated that between the second and third ballot Mr. McCullough released his delegates and it was believed that they would declare for Ralston, "the Taggart man." However, Marshall and Slack began to get many of them. After the third, Kuhn withdrew. Slack's friends tried to get Kuhn's votes, and at the opening of the fourth it looked as though they would succeed. The fourth ballot stood: Slack, 580; Ralston, 453; Marshall, 312³; Conn, 24³. The Slack delegation went wild, and then something happened to jar them. Ralston was on his feet, gesturing for silence. The applause stopped suddenly. Ralston was as white as a sheet of paper, and his hands trembled visibly as he said: "There seems to be considerable doubt as to the desirability of my nomination. In that case I have something to say to you. I do not wish the nomination if all do not think it would help the party, and therefore I ask that I be allowed to withdraw." Marshall was nominated on the fifth ballot.

The Indianapolis News thus noted this stirring episode in political strategy and maneuvering:

"Ralston followed Taggart's bidding and withdrew. The delegates controlled by Taggart were switched to Marshall. Slack made gains, but not enough to overcome the Taggart support thrown to his opponent. Marshall was nominated. The convention went wild. Never before had Taggart men and anti-Taggart men so joined in a jollification. Both sides were claiming Marshall for their own. A compromise candidate had been found without either side looking for him. A man on whom all Democrats might unite had suddenly advanced to the front. None doubted his ability, all knew his strength of character and mind. 'Tom' Marshall—lawyer, one of the best thinkers, best talkers, best campaigners in the Democratic party; one of the ablest and best attorneys in Indiana; a man whose reputation is regarded as unquestioned; a Democrat who had never taken part in factional quarrels, and a man who represented no interest and had no string tied to him—had been nominated by the Democrats for Governor."

THE BALLOTING.

| | 1st Ballot. | 2nd Ballot. | 3rd Ballot. | 4th Ballot. | 5th Ballot. |
|------------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|
| Slack | 278 | 342 | 483½ | 580½ | 630½ |

| Marshall | 210 | 239 | 325.85 | 312½ | 719½ |

| McCullough | 208 | 150 | | | |
| Conn | 133 | 85 | 59½ | 24½ | 21½ |

Total number of delegates, 1,371; necessary to a choice, 686.

For Lieutenant-Governor were proposed Frank J. Hall of Rushville, Frank E. Hering of South Bend, and William P. O'Neill of Mishawaka. Hering led at the start, but he was opposed by his home delegation—St. Joseph—and at the start he rose to tell why they were against him. The convention would not hear him, and what might have won him the nomination had they listened cost him the prize. On the third ballot Hall had the majority, and the nomination was made unanimous before the roll call on the fourth ballot had begun.

THE CAMPAIGN.

The campaign in Indiana was a hotly-contested one from beginning to end. Popular enthusiasm for Bryan showed no signs of abatement. If anything, it had grown stronger. John W. Kern, having been made his running mate, intensified both interest in and popular sentiment for the ticket. Then, Thomas R. Marshall had gained an enviable reputation as a high-minded citizen, an effective campaigner, and pre-eminently a man of the people. There were no faction troubles to disturb the Democratic camp; so everything was propitious and prospects for victory in Indiana had become quite assuring. Conditions on the Republican side of the fence were the very opposite. Distrust, division and discontent were in evidence all over the State. Hanly's performances were such as to create grave apprehension of disaster in the minds of thoughtful party managers in inner and outer circles. These shrewd, sagacious managers knew that the head of the State ticket, James Eli Watson, was in bad odor with formidable elements of the party. Weeks before the verdict of the ballot had been actually rendered these keen, observing individuals understood full well what was in store for the party that for fourteen years had been singularly free from trials and tribulations. While there was felt the utmost confidence in the triumph of the national ticket, discerning Republican leaders were quite prepared for the defeat of Watson and some of the other candidates on the State ticket, the loss of the legislature and with it the loss of a United States Senator. While William Howard Taft carried the State by 10,809 over Bryan, Tom Marshall defeated James Eli Watson for Governor by 14,809; Frank J. Hall defeated his Republican competitor for the lieutenant-governorship by 1,672, and the learned educator, Robert J. Aley, was chosen to the important office of Superintendent of Public Instruction over Lawrence McTurnan, Republican. Eleven Democratic congressmen were chosen, as against two Republicans. The legislature was made Democratic on joint ballot, insuring the election of a Democratic United States Senator to succeed James A. Hemenway.

The full significance of the verdict of the ballot is made apparent by the subjoined tabular statement:

The General Assembly for 1909 consisted of 27 Republicans and 23 Democrats in the Senate, and 60 Democrats and 40 Republicans in the House.

BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY CHOSEN UNITED STATES SENATOR.

As soon as the fact had become known that the Democrats had gained control of the Legislature, a sharp canvass for the United States Senatorship began. Benjamin F. Shively had previously been twice honored with the Democratic legislative caucus nominations when successors were to be chosen to Senators Fairbanks and Beveridge. While these caucus expressions were purely complimentary, they were effectively interpreted as reflecting Democratic sentiment and preference. In addition to this, it was argued that Mr. Shively had been at the service of the party for a quarter of a century, had represented his district in Congress with marked ability for three terms and a fraction of Major Calkins' term, made a notable though unsuccessful race for the Governorship in 1896, and that his thorough understanding of the tariff issue rendered it especially desirable that he be made a member of the upper branch of the national legislative body. In behalf of the other contestants for this exalted position varying pleas were made. It was freely conceded that all of the aspirants had claims to merit entitling them to favorable consideration. Yet only one could be chosen at this time, and the final conclusion of the memorable legislative caucus of 1909 was that the coveted honor be conferred upon Mr. Shively. Twenty ballots were required to effect a nomination. How these ballots stood is revealed by the appended tabular statement.

The gentlemen whose names were presented for caucus consideration were: G. V. Menzies, of Mount Vernon; Edward G. Hoffman, of Fort Wayne; John E. Lamb, of Terre Haute; L. Ert Slack, of Franklin; Benjamin F. Shively, of South Bend; John W. Kern, of Indianapolis; Mason J. Niblack, of Vincennes; Robert W. Miers, of Bloomington; Albert Zearing, of Indianapolis.

On the first and second ballots Mason J. Niblack received three votes and Robert W. Miers one. On the third ballot Miers received one vote. On the fourteenth ballot Niblack received one and a half votes and Albert Zearing one vote.

Mr. Shively's formal election by the General Assembly, in joint session, followed the action of the caucus.

NOMINATION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS

BY STATE CONVENTION MADE MAIN ISSUE AT DEMOCRATIC GATHERING IN 1910

FOR years Democratic State platforms contained planks demanding that constitutional provision be made for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, instead of by action of the various State Legislatures. The original proposition to amend the federal constitution to that end in view is in history credited to Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, who, during the early fifties, presented a strong argument in support of that proposition. A partial beginning in that direction was made in Illinois, in 1858, when by action of the Democratic and Republican conventions Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln were made opposing candidates for the United States Senate. In conformity with such procedure a series of joint discussions were arranged for by the distinguished contestants. These discussions, or joint debates, as they were popularly named, attracted widespread attention, not so much on account of the novelty of the new departure as by reason of the extraordinary character of the arguments adduced by the rival candidates.

Douglas was champion of what was then popularly known as and perhaps derisively termed Squatter Sovereignty. Senator Douglas himself designated it Popular Sovereignty. The idea embodied in it was that the people of a territory should have the right before admission into the Union to determine to their own satisfaction whether or not slavery should legally exist within its borders. In one of his masterly speeches Douglas unguardedly made the declaration that so far as he was concerned it mattered not whether slavery was voted up or down—that was a matter the disposition of which rested wholly with the people of such territory. Lincoln had planted himself upon higher ground. While by no means a fanatic on the slavery question, he had fully persuaded himself to look upon slavery as an evil—tolerated in States where it had legal existence, but not to be wantonly extended into free territory. With terrific effect he arraigned Douglas for being instrumental in bringing about the repeal of the Missouri compromise, under which slavery was specifically excluded from territory then seeking admission into the Union.

Lincoln startled some of his conservative supporters by boldly exclaiming in one of his earnest pleas for humanity and justice that as the Bible set forth the indisputable truth that a house divided against itself cannot stand, it was equally true that this country could not always be one-half free and one-half slave.

All in all it was a wonderful debate. If senators could at that time have been chosen by popular vote it is difficult, even now, to make a good guess as to which one of these gladiators would have been the popular choice. Under the then existing apportionment Douglas secured a majority of the members of the General Assembly, and was by it triumphantly re-elected; but it has all along been claimed and not denied that the aggregate vote for those members of the legislature who voted for Lincoln was about 4,000 in excess of the vote cast for members who voted for Douglas. However that may be, both Douglas and Lincoln were nominated for the presidency in 1860.

The Democratic party being split in two on the slavery question, the election of Lincoln to the presidency was a foregone conclusion. What followed is a matter of history, known to all. There is no doubt about the great debate having proved an inestimable benefit to both Douglas and Lincoln. It had a broadening effect on both, and in course of time brought them into close fellowship. Chiefly with a view to letting the South know that Lincoln could count on being supported and upheld by Douglas and his followers, the "Little Giant" hastened to the side of Lincoln on the occasion of his inauguration as President of the Republic and held his hat while with uplifted hand was registered a solemn oath to protect and defend the constitution of the United States under any and all circumstances.

There is something about the Douglas-Lincoln debate that renders it to many a very attractive political episode. Narratives thereof, popularly and fascinatingly presented, doubtless had much to do with popularizing senatorial election by direct vote of the people. The ablest argument ever adduced in advocacy of its adoption was that of Judge Jeremiah S. Black of Pennsylvania in a letter written to the author of this book and formally promulgated by the newly organized Democratic State Editorial Association at its first meeting on the 8th of January, 1881. And by far the ablest argument against the direct election scheme was that formulated by Senator Hoar of Massachusetts. His objections were never brushed aside by any one who ventured to discuss the merits or demerits of the proposition. Generally they were regarded as unanswerable, hence they remain unanswered to this very day. Whether for or against the change, since fully consummated, it may be stated with utmost posi-tiveness that no conspicuous or even notable improvement is anywhere visible in changing from legislative to popular election of United States Senators. Where there is an alert electorate, good men are chosen. Where sluggishness and indifference prevail, senators of that type are invariably the product.

So many pronouncements in favor of more direct methods of choosing United States Senators having been put forth in conventions and other assemblies, and echoed by the press, Governor Marshall reached the conclusion that some step in that direction ought to be taken by Indiana. Accordingly, one day, he fulminated a proposition that at the next Democratic State convention a candidate for United States Senator be put in nomination, such action to be considered binding on the General Assembly. The suggestion stirred up quite a feeling throughout the State and elicited much spirited comment, favorable and unfavorable. At Indianapolis the evident purpose of at least one conspicuous newspaper was to create sentiment of irreconcilable hostility. The Governor was unctuously patted on the back, while Thomas Taggart was mercilessly lambasted as the chief opponent of the Marshall proposition. Some friction caused by the legislative caucus of 1909 in coming to a conclusion as to who deserved to be chosen Senator was vividly brought to mind. An interview by John W. Kern, animadverting with some asperity on the "perfidy" of Marion county legislators who underhandedly contributed to Mr. Kern's defeat, was industriously utilized to discredit the old caucus system and to popularize the proposed new departure. Had the discussion been confined to the merits of the issue itself there would have been absolutely no cause for acrimonious discussion or engendering a spirit of bitterness. It was assumed that because Thomas Taggart opposed the new method he was intent on capturing the next senatorship by the active operation of his machine, the remnants of which, according to his subsequent pronouncement in the convention, had been unceremoniously dumped upon the scrap heap. Disagreements and animosities thus created are the direct result of the pernicious personality so often maliciously injected into political activities. Mr. Taggart had as clear a right to oppose the innovation as Governor Marshall had to champion it. Both may justly be credited with having simply followed their convictions without being governed by selfish or unworthy motives.

A hue and cry was raised over the action of the State Central Committee in arranging that this vexatious question be disposed of before the convention proceeded to the performance of the functions for which it had been convened. Instead of having been an unscrupulous device of a "desperate political boss," it turned out to be a wise procedure and resulted in beneficially simplifying matters.

So much by way of preface to the recording of the doings of one of the most interesting State conventions ever held in Indiana. The convention was held in Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, April 28, 1910. What occurred then and there was thus reported in the Indianapolis News of that date:

"After a dramatic debate and intense excitement, the Democratic State convention adopted this morning the Governor's plan for the nomination of a United States Senator. The fight was close and uncertain to the last, the final vote standing 888½ to 858½, a majority of thirty votes.

"The Senatorship fight was so intense that little attention was paid to the reading of the platform, which was adopted without debate, and the business moved quickly to the nomination of Senator.

"Governor Marshall called the convention to order at 9:35. After the invocation, Charles L. Jewett of New Albany was asked to preside. It was nearly 10 o'clock before the chairman announced that the question was, 'Shall the convention nominate a United States Senator?'

The chairman announced that they would have forty-five minutes, and then only a roll call would be in order and that no delegate would be recognized. James E. McCullough spoke in the affirmative. He referred to the fact that Bryan had endorsed the plan. Samuel M. Ralston of Lebanon took the stand to oppose the plan, claiming that the nomination of Senator by the convention was a usurpation of authority, and he was against it. Also said that the Constitution of the United States provided a method by which United States Senators should be elected. He declared that only a few Democrats vote for convention delegates, while practically all voted for the members of the Legislature.

"Senator Shively spoke next: 'Let no mistakes be made at this time. The Democratic party has for years declared for the election of United States Senators by direct vote, but up to this hour there is no official call for the nomination of a United States Senator by this convention. There is no authority for issuing such a call. Let the candidates go before the people of this State, let them assist in the battle.'

"Mr. John E. Lamb next took the stand: 'There is no dissension among the rank and file of the Democratic party. There will be none when this convention has done its duty. There is no personal feeling in the great issue which has been raised by the "Little Giant of Indiana" (pointing to the Governor), but I am opposed everlastingly to Taggartism in Indiana.' His further reference to Tom Taggart and Crawford Fairbanks met with a pandemonium of hisses from the Taggart men and a jumble of cries for Taggart. The chairman rapped for order, but his request was unavailing. The hissing lasted four and one-half minutes. Mr. Lamb finally proceeded, and referred to any hold-over senators who would not abide by the decision of the party as Judases of the party. Mr. Lamb said that whatever the result he would fight in the ranks, but no one could take from him the pride of following the Governor.

"The roll was then called, and the result showed a majority of thirty for the Governor's plan. Governor Marshall then was introduced, and he in turn introduced Senator Shively as permanent chairman."

The secretary of the convention was chosen without a dissenting vote.

JOHN W. KERN NAMED FOR UNITED STATES SENATOR.

John W. Kern was nominated for United States Senator despite the fact that he insisted he was not a candidate. The nomination followed the withdrawal of Lamb, Slack and other candidates. The First district presented the name of G. V. Menzies, of Mt. Vernon; the Second district, former Congressman Robert W. Miers; the Third district, Joseph H. Shea, of Seymour; the Fourth district, L. Ert Slack; the Fifth district, John E. Lamb. When Thomas Taggart and John W. Kern were nominated by the Seventh district there was an outburst for Kern. The Ninth district seconded the nomination of Kern. The Tenth district proposed Lawrence Becker of Hammond, also D. W. Sims of Lafayette. The Twelfth district named E. G. Hoffman of Fort Wayne.

It was evident, as the roll call proceeded, that Kern would develop considerable strength all over the State. There were cheers from the audience as one after another of the counties cast part of its vote for him. Howard, his old home county, cast its entire vote for Kern. Taggart got few votes on the roll call. When half-way through it looked as though Kern and Slack would lead and Lamb would take third place. On the first ballot Marion county cast 6 votes for Kern and 177 for Taggart. About this time the word went out that on the next ballot the county would switch to Kern. As the ballot was being completed, John W. Kern, who was a delegate, mounted a chair. "I have just now entered this hall," he said. "My name was presented against my orders and my will. No man has authority to present my name, and I am in no sense a candidate." They continued to yell for him, however, and also to vote.

First ballot: Menzies, 154; Miers, 57; Shea, 138; Slack, 174; Lamb, 226; Taggart, 228; Kern, 303; Becker, 51; Sims, 100; Hoffman, 166; Adair, 133; Ralston, 9. These were given Mr. Ralston upon the call of his county, Boone, though he had not been a candidate.

On the second ballot Kern made steady gains. When Marion county was reached the convention became quiet for the first time during the session. Thomas Taggart mounted a chair and said, "Marion county casts 183 votes for the Hon. John W. Kern." Kern did not have enough votes to nominate him on the second ballot, but it was evident that he would win on the third. Kern then rose to his feet and said he positively was not a candidate and would not accept the nomination. He said it was charged that he was masquerading and that at the proper time he would come in and stampede the nomination. The convention refused to accept Kern's declination. Taggart then mounted a chair and said, "I believe it is the will of the Democracy of Indiana that John W. Kern be the next United States Senator from Indiana, and I believe he should acquiesce." This was loudly cheered, and it was plain that the delegates would not permit Kern to decline the nomination.

The third ballot resulted: Kern, 772½; Adair, 147; Menzies, 144; Miers, 561½; Shea, 90½; Slack, 210; Taggart, 1; Becker, 4; Sims, 93; Hoffman, 5.

Lamb made a brief speech, withdrawing, and asked permission to cast the sixty Vigo county votes for Kern. Shea, Slack, Hoffman and Adair followed in the withdrawing rush, and amidst tumultuous cheering John W. Kern was declared to be the convention's unanimous choice for Senator, with the implied understanding that he be formally elected by the General Assembly.

DEMOCRACY'S COMPLETE TRIUMPH

No uncertainty as to the outcome of the election the following November was felt. Victory was in sight when the ticket was nominated, and was held in sight until the returns attested it beyond cavil. The vote for the various candidates for Secretary of State is given in full; for the rest of the ticket the pluralities will suffice:

For the first time in years a nearly solid Democratic delegation was sent to Congress by pluralities that compared favorably with those by which a solid Republican delegation was produced by the landslide of 1894.

The General Assembly for 1911 became Democratic in both Houses. The Senate had 30 Democrats to 20 Republicans; the House 60 Democrats to 40 Republicans. This insured the election of John W. Kern to the United States Senate at the time fixed by law. By a strict party vote he was elected over Albert J. Beveridge. The nomination that he spurned in April afforded him the greatest victory he ever won during the many years of his political battling.

PATIENCE SPLENDIDLY REWARDED IN 1912

BY THE UNANIMOUS NOMINATION OF SAMUEL M. RALSTON
FOR GOVERNOR

SPIRITED fight was made in the convention of 1908 to secure the nomination of Samuel M. Ralston of Lebanon for Governor. He had strong support, a devoted following, and excellent leadership. For one reason or another there was manifested on the part of a half dozen Democrats of prominence an irresistible longing to head the ticket, in the hope and expectation that the fortunes of political war might place the choice of the convention in the chair in years gone by graced by some of Indiana's most illustrious sons. There were not just then clearly visible to the naked eye signs of irreparable Republican disruption, yet there was prevalent a feeling in some quarters that something was liable to happen that would put an end to the domination that dated from the year 1894 and proved impregnable up to that time—the Hanly episode in 1908. Samuel M. Ralston was among these aspirants. His chief competitor was L. Ert Slack, who had gained an enviable reputation as a useful, progressive legislator and a resolute champion of certain much-needed reforms. On these propositions Ralston and Slack had much in common. Both were and still are pronounced opponents of intemperance and kindred evils and vices. Both are firm believers in and advocates of public and private morality, and both insist upon law observance and obedience. Yet, in 1908, they were in battle array, both in hot pursuit of the coveted prize, and both seemingly determined that the “other fellow” should not be the winner. Conditions of this character arise once in a while and are difficult to modify or control. To this very day some of Ralston's zealous supporters contend that had he “stuck” and not withdrawn he would in the end have captured the nomination. But those who were in charge of his campaign were of different opinion. They believed the only way to prevent the nomination of Slack was by withdrawing Ralston and throwing his support to Marshall. This was done, and Marshall not only won the nomination, but also the election in November. Though sorely disappointed, Ralston in due course of time became reconciled, sensibly turned his back upon the dead past and hopefully looked to the future. He had learned that there is truth and philosophy in the old saying, “All things come to those who have patience to wait.” He abided his time, and when in 1912 his party met in convention to name a successor to Governor Marshall, the field had been cleared for him, and he had the proud distinction of being nominated by acclamation and to be elected in November by the largest plurality accorded to any gubernatorial candidate in the history of Indiana.

The Democratic State convention for 1912 assembled at Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, March 21. The committee on permanent organization, through its chairman, George E. Downey, announced that it had chosen Governor Thomas R. Marshall for temporary chairman and Senator John W. Kern for permanent chairman of the convention. These selections were ratified by the delegates. J. H. Heller of the Decatur Democrat was named as principal secretary.

Mr. Ralston, in his speech of acceptance, said: "I want no man to support me in my candidacy under the impression that when I am Governor I will stand for loose morals or non-enforcement of the law. When I become Governor I will take an oath to support and enforce the laws, and that obligation I shall keep." This courageous utterance was enthusiastically applauded. And the promise then and there made has been nobly kept. Lawlessness has ever been held in abhorrence by Samuel M. Ralston, both as citizen and as Governor. Samuel M. Ralston was presented for Governor by Benjamin Bosse of Evansville, who until recently had been actively enlisted in the support of ex-Congressman John W. Boehne, the so-called anti-machine favorite for Governor, who withdrew a few days before the convention. Mr. Ralston's nomination was made by acclamation, there being but one other candidate presented, Lieutenant-Governor Frank J. Hall of Rushville, who withdrew before the voting began.

The candidates for Lieutenant-Governor who were placed in nomination were: Dr. T. D. Scales of Boonville, James W. Fortune of Jeffersonville, Leonard B. Clore of Franklin, Jacob F. Denny of Portland, Clay W. Metsker of Plymouth, and William P. O'Neill of Mishawaka. The fourth was the deciding ballot, and the vote stood as follows: Scales, 144½; Fortune, 234½; Clore, 257; O'Neill, 1,111. The latter was declared duly nominated and his nomination made unanimous.

Secretary of State, Auditor, Treasurer, Attorney-General, Superintendent of Public Instruction, and Statistician were all renominated by acclamation.

As candidates for Reporter of the Supreme Court were presented: Philip Zoercher of Tell City, Harry G. Strickland of Greenfield, E. E. Cox of Hartford City, and C. J. McCullough of Brazil. On the third ballot McCullough withdrew, and most of his support went to Zoercher, giving this result on the third ballot: Cox, 545; Strickland, 179; Zoercher, 1,001.

Candidates for First District of the Supreme Court Judgeship were: John W. Spencer, Evansville; John C. McNutt, Martinsville; O. B. Harris, Terre Haute; Edwin Corr, Bloomington. Before the entire first ballot was finished Harris withdrew. Spencer was nominated on the third with the vote as here recorded: Spencer, 910; McNutt, 585; Corr, 239. For Judge of the Fourth District only two candidates were presented—Richard K. Erwin of Fort Wayne and Fred S. Caldwell of Winchester. J. W. McClellan of Matthews, who had been a candidate a few days before, was not formally put in nomination. Erwin was nominated on the only ballot taken, and thereupon Caldwell, seeing that he had been beaten, moved that the nomination be made unanimous. Vote was: Erwin, 1,151; Caldwell, 599.

The nomination of Joseph H. Shea of Seymour for Judge of Appellate Court, First District, was accomplished with a single ballot. The only other candidate was Albert F. Wray of Shelbyville. The vote stood: Shea, 1,291½; Wray, 467½.

DISRUPTION OF REPUBLICAN PARTY

MADE DEMOCRATIC VICTORY IN 1912 EASY AND OVERWHELMING

THE split in the Republican party, the nomination of separate tickets and the bitterness engendered by the fiery contests in State and national conventions, rendered it absolutely certain that the results of the November election would record overwhelming Democratic victories. The real fight was not between Democrats and Republicans, but between the standpat and the progressive factions of the Republican party. The only duty that devolved upon the Democrats was to steadfastly keep their forces together and to gather in the usufruct. This they did to perfection, and likewise to their infinite delight.

Democratic majority in the House of Representatives was so large over both Republicans and Progressives that Democratic leaders felt disinclined to jubilate over their numerical preponderance. Wise, sagacious party leaders have never regarded with favor an abnormal preponderance in a legislative assembly. A working majority of say twenty-five in the House is deemed vastly preferable to an excess of 125.

| Chafin, Prohibition | 208,923 | 1.39 |
| Reimer, Socialist-Labor | 29,079 | .20 |

In the electoral college Wilson had 435, Roosevelt 88, Taft 8. Taft carried only two States—Vermont and Utah. Roosevelt got California (in part), Michigan, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Washington. Two of the thirteen California electors went to Wilson. The combined popular vote for Roosevelt and Taft exceeded that of Wilson by 1,323,728. In the electoral college Wilson had 339 more votes than Roosevelt and Taft put together.

Not only did the Republicans lose the Presidency and most of the State governments, but they also lost control of the United States Senate, in which they were in the ascendancy for so long a time. The

It will be observed upon scanning the foregoing tabular statement that Albert J. Beveridge polled several thousand more votes than were cast for Roosevelt or any of the other candidates on the Progressive ticket. Seemingly he drew some votes from both Democrats and Republicans. The first name on the electoral tickets always, since the introduction of the Australian ballot system, has been credited with more votes than the other fourteen electoral nominees. This for the reason that between eight and ten thousand voters for years persisted in marking only the first name, laboring under the delusion that a mark in the first square counted a vote for the entire ticket. They were educated that way when the Australian ballot first came in vogue, and they have not been re-educated in spite of all efforts in that direction.

The combined vote of Roosevelt and Taft in Indiana was 313,274, as against 281,890 for Wilson—a difference of 31,384. The combined vote of Beveridge and Durbin was 308,974, as against 275,357 for Ralston—a difference of 33,617. Studying these illuminating figures it is not surprising that the average Republican, both standpat and progressive, is clamorous for the elements getting together. At several elections between 1896 and 1904 the Republican plurality was in that neighborhood. A restoration of that mark of ascendancy is, as a matter of course, a cherished thought of those having a hankering after political power and (incidentally) the loaves and fishes.

THE LEGISLATURE ALMOST SOLIDLY DEMOCRATIC.

With holdovers the Republican strength was reduced to eight in the Senate. Two Progressives had gained seats in that body. In the House there were only four Republicans to ninety-five Democrats and one Progressive. For all practical purposes the General Assembly of 1913 might as well have been a political unit. No approach to such a shake-up ever before occurred in Indiana since its admission into the Union.

The campaign conducted by the nominee for Governor, Samuel M. Ralston, was characterized by earnestness, fairness and intelligence. In his speeches he told the people frankly and candidly what he stood for and what he would do if chosen to the high office to which he aspired. And he has kept the faith. Governor Marshall contributed his full share to the enlightenment of the electorate. Every man on the ticket put his shoulder to the wheel and helped to bring about the result that stands singly and alone in the annals of Hoosier politics.

NOMINATIONS WERE EAGERLY SOUGHT IN 1914

BY AMBITIOUS DEMOCRATS WHO VIEWED THE LANDSCAPE
O'ER WITH UTMOST COMPLACENCY

THE political situation in Indiana continued to be looked upon as being favorable to a prolongation of Democratic ascendancy when the delegates to the Democratic State convention assembled at Indianapolis on the 19th day of March, 1914. The chasm that in 1912 separated the nearly equally divided factions of the Republican party was far from being closed, although signs of a steady drifting away from Rooseveltian allegiance were clearly visible to discerning observers. Studied efforts had been made in certain quarters to create the impression that internal dissensions threatened to play havoc with Democratic solidarity and that an explosion of destructive force was by no means improbable. Hackneyed phrases about political machine and bossism were dished up with such lavishness, persistence and mendacity as to make it appear that there really had been created in Indiana a longing for periodical exhibitions of hobgoblins whose antics afforded pleasure, amusement and diversion for innocents from the remote counties, biennially attracted to the State capital to witness and perhaps participate in whatever might have been conceived and contrived by that wonderful magician, Tom Taggart. For this special occasion there was forecasted an exciting side-show performance by Senator Kern, who was imaginarily dispatched from the national capital to exhibit some novelties that would be sure to be gazed upon with irrepressible joy. To reach such vapory foreshadowings in a newspaper feeble in veracity but strong in circulation and afterward to compare them with the actual proceedings of the convention, demonstrates how accurately the late P. T. Barnum understood human frailty when he felicitously expatiated upon popular fondness for being artistically or clumsily humbugged.

In face of the fact that for days and weeks publicity had been given to statements that a long-to-be-remembered snub would be administered to Senator Kern, that gentleman was by unanimous action made permanent chairman of the convention. John H. Heller of Decatur was elected as principal secretary.

United States Senator Benjamin F. Shively was honored with an unopposed nomination for re-election to the high office to which he was chosen by the General Assembly of 1909.

For Secretary of State, Samuel G. Wells of Scottsburg, James F. Cox of Columbus and Homer L. Cook of Indianapolis were proposed. The latter was nominated on the first ballot, the vote being: Cook, 976½; Cox, 647½; Wells, 212. Cook's nomination was made unanimous.

Senator Kern having an engagement elsewhere, turned the chair over to Congressman W. E. Cox, who presided during the greater part of the session, and gave excellent satisfaction.

Three widely known and deserving gentlemen were placed in nomination for the office of Auditor of State. They were: Dale J. Crittenger of Anderson, Myron D. King of Indianapolis and William B. Gray of Crawfordsville. But one ballot was needed to settle the nomination in favor of Crittenger, who had to his credit 1,262½ votes, to 311 for Gray and 262½ for King. Gray and King joined in a motion to make the winner's selection unanimous.

The contest for the State treasurership was a lively one. Seven entries were made: Fred W. Lauenstein, publisher of the Evansville Demokrat; George Macomber of Danville, Thomas W. O'Connor of Monticello, George A. Bittler of Fort Wayne, John Isenbarger of North Manchester, W. A. Morris of Frankfort and Lon W. Bernetha of North Judson. Several ballots were required before a nomination was effected. One after another of the aspirants withdrew as their chances waned. The race eventually narrowed down to Bittler and O'Connor, the final count showing Bittler to be the winner by a small but adequate margin. The greater part of the Lauenstein vote was thrown to Bittler after the Evansville newspaper man had abandoned the race.

In addition to Senator Shively, Superintendent of Public Instruction Charles A. Greathouse and Appellate Judges Hottel, Ibach, Caldwell and Felt were honored with renominations by acclamation. Frank M. Powers of Angola was nominated for Judge of Appellate Court after one ballot, his opponent being James F. Moran. Powers had 966½; Moran 869 votes. Judge Moses B. Lairy of the Appellate Court was nominated for Judge of the Supreme Court. Arrayed against him were James F. Gallaher of Michigan City and Charles P. Drummond of South Bend. Lairy had 948; Drummond, 470; Gallaher, 416.

The Attorney-Generalship was awarded to Richard M. Milburn of Jasper by a vote of 1,022 to 423 for Edwin M. Corr of Bloomington, and 389 for George William Curtis of Mount Vernon.

J. Fred France's only opponent for Clerk of the Supreme Court was Senator Harry Grube of Plymouth. The vote stood: France, 942½; Grube, 871½.

FROM COUNTRY LAW OFFICE TO GOVERNORSHIP

THENCE TO VICE-PRESIDENCY OF THE UNITED STATES

THOMAS RILEY MARSHALL was born in North Manchester, Wabash County, Indiana, March 14, 1854, the son of Dr. Daniel M. and Martha A. (Patterson) Marshall; was graduated from Wabash College in 1873, which college, as well as Notre Dame University, the University of Pennsylvania, the University of North Carolina, and the University of Maine, has conferred upon him the degree of LL.D.; began the practice of law in Columbia City, Indiana, on his twenty-first birthday and continued without interruption the practice of law there until 1908, when he was elected Governor of the State of Indiana; was married November 2, 1895, to Miss Lois I. Kimsey of Angola, Ind.; was elected Vice-President of the United States in 1912. He is a Presbyterian, a Scottish Rite Mason, a Phi Beta Kappa and a Trustee of Wabash College.

Though repeatedly urged to seek or accept nomination to public office, Mr. Marshall resolutely set himself against all such overtures and entreaties, with the single exception of doing service for some years on the school board of Columbia City. Repeatedly he was urged to become an aspirant to congressional honors, but he was too strongly wedded to his profession to entertain such propositions or requests. During the administration of Governor Claude Matthews, in the nineties, a vacancy occurred on the Supreme Bench. For appointment to this exalted position several eminent northern Indiana lawyers were by partial friends urged upon the Governor. Among these were Judge Robert Lowry of Fort Wayne, Mr.

Marshall, and Joseph S. Dailey of Bluffton. The selection of the latter was the final outcome of a somewhat protracted and vigorous contest. A little later on Mr. Marshall served as member of the Democratic State Committee.

Mr. Marshall's nomination and election to the office of Governor not only marked a distinctive era in Indiana politics, but developed into a realization of highest hope or expectation as to himself. His campaign attracted to him a formidable support outside of his own party, and upon his formal induction into office and throughout his administration he enjoyed the respect and confidence of the people of Indiana without reference to party. It was the feeling thus engendered and the sentiment then created that made him the formally proclaimed choice of the Indiana Democracy for the highest office in the gift of the nation, and upon the selection thereto of Woodrow Wilson brought about the nomination of Governor Marshall to the Vice-Presidency of the United States.

To promote human welfare and to increase human happiness were the chief objects of Thomas R. Marshall during his term as Governor of his native State. These objects are revealed in practically all the legislative enactments of his administration. He was not merely sympathetic, but enthusiastic, in his support of the work of the Health, Charities and Educational Departments. A glance at the legislative record of his administration will suffice. Measures were enacted:

- To curtail child labor;
- To establish playgrounds;
- To provide a weekly wage;

To regulate the sale of cold storage products;

To require hygienic school houses and to permit medical examination of school children;

To prevent blindness at birth;

To regulate the sale of cocaine and other drugs;

To provide treatment for hydrophobia through the State Health Board;

To strengthen the pure food laws;

To protect against loan sharks;

To provide police court matrons;

To prevent traffic in white slaves;

To establish night schools in cities;

To establish free employment agencies;

To prevent corrupt practices at elections;

To create a "Bureau of Inspection for Factories, Workshops, Mines and Boilers;"

To require full train crews;

To require block systems on railroads and electric railways;

To require safety devices on switch engines;

To require medical supplies as part of a train equipment;

To require efficient headlights on locomotives;

To require standard cabooses and to require full switching crews.

Prominent among the laws enacted upon the recommendation of Governor Marshall was the one known as the "Public Accounting Law," the general purpose of which was to secure a uniformity of accounting and reporting in all public offices and institutions of the State; the correction and prevention of errors in public accounts, their examination and inspection, and avoidance of the dissipation of public revenues by means of supervision of expenditures and inventories of public property; and to give the public periodic statements of the fiscal condition of all public offices.

DEATH ENDS EVENTFUL CAREER

OF UNITED STATES SENATOR BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY

CLOOM was cast over the fire-sides of thousands of his constituents by the announcement that on the afternoon of March 14, 1916, the Grim Reaper had made inexorable demand upon Indiana's senior United States Senator, Benjamin F. Shively. For weeks disquieting reports from Providence Hospital at Washington had caused fear and apprehension in the minds of friends and admirers who eagerly grasped at even the faintest hope that the hour of dissolution might yet be far in the distance. Those who had known him from early manhood could hardly persuade themselves to believe that the insidious foe, diabetic cancer of the throat, had made such inroads upon his vitality as to lay low so fine a type of physical and intellectual development. The heralding of Death caused countless hearts to be cast down with deep-felt sorrow and poignant grief.

Benjamin Franklin Shively was the son of sturdy Amish parents. He was a native-born Indianian, having seen the light of day first in St. Joseph county, March 20, 1857. He entered the country schools of St. Joseph county when he reached the schoolboy age, and when he had sufficiently mastered the elements of an education he became a student of the Northern Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso. He engaged in school teaching in the winter time and followed the furrows and did the work of the farm during the years from 1874 to 1880. From 1880 to 1883, a strenuous three years or more, he was engaged in the publication of a weekly newspaper at South Bend, called The New Era. In this periodical he expounded the views he had formulated as an anti-monopolist with the vim of a youthful enthusiast. He identified himself with the Anti-Monopoly movement of that period and became secretary of the national organization having that object in view. He gained quite a reputation as an effective stump speaker while making a campaign in 1882 for Congress in the Thirteenth district as the nominee of the Greenback party. He polled several thousand votes that looked very attractive to both Democratic and Republican politicians. When Major William H. Calkins, after his nomination by the Republicans for the office of Governor decided to resign his seat in Congress, overtures were made by both Democrats and Republicans to nominate Mr. Shively for the remainder of the Calkins term. Being more in accord with Democrats than Republicans, Mr. Shively accepted a place on the Democratic ticket and was triumphantly elected. George Ford was at the same time elected for the full two-year term. After serving three months in Congress Mr. Shively entered the law school of Michigan University at Ann Arbor, graduating therefrom in 1886. Mr. Ford being indifferent about continuing congressional service made it possible for Mr. Shively to secure the Democratic nomination that year. His Republican competitor was former Congressman Jasper Packard. A joint discussion and a vigorous campaign resulted in Mr. Shively's election by a decisive plurality. In two subsequent campaigns Mr. Shively again came out of the final contest with flying colors. The political situation in 1892 was not to his liking, and he announced his determination not to stand for re-election. At the conclusion of his third full term in Congress he took up the practice of law at South Bend. This was doubtless in deference to the wishes of his father-in-law, the Hon. George A. Jenks of Pennsylvania, to whose daughter, Laura Emma, Mr. Shively was married June 19, 1889.

When the silver question became a "paramount issue" Mr. Shively could not resist the temptation to resume active participation in political affairs. The silver element made him the Democratic nominee for Governor in 1896. He conducted a brilliant campaign, but went down in defeat. The same year he was appointed a trustee of Indiana University and continued in that capacity to the time of his death. He took a lively interest in that justly famed institution of learning. For several years he served as city attorney of South Bend, under Mayor Fogarty, and later on as attorney for the school board. During the first decade of the new century he was induced to make the race for Congress against Abraham L. Brick, and came within 300 votes of being elected. In 1903 and 1905, in the Indiana Legislature, he received the complimentary vote of his party for United States Senator. He was elected by the Indiana Legislature to the office of United States Senator in 1909 and took his seat in March of that year. He was re-elected by the popular vote of the State in 1914 for a term of six years. His death is recorded March 14, 1916.

Under the stress of illness and a heroic struggle to resist its encroachment upon his vital forces he aged perceptibly, and rapidly. Much of his senatorial work was done amidst adverse circumstances and under conditions that only those can fully comprehend who know what it is to attempt to ward off the approach of the Grim Reaper.

Senator Shively was an omniverous reader. His capacious and receptive mind absorbed information with an avidity that made it a veritable storehouse of varied knowledge. The theory of government was to him an ever-pleasing study. In his later years he broadened wonderfully. His philosophy underwent steady expansion.

Richly merited are the tributes bestowed upon the departed Senator by the President of the United States and the Governor of Indiana, hereunto appended.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S MESSAGE TO MRS. SHIVELY.

On the night of March 14 President Wilson sent this letter of condolence to Mrs. Shively:

"My Dear Mrs. Shively—I have just learned with the deepest sorrow of the death of your husband. Your own loss is tragical, and my heart goes out to you in deep and sincere sympathy; the loss of the country is very great, for he was moved as a public servant by high motives of duty to his State and the Nation, and I join with his colleagues in deploring his death as creating a vacancy in the highest councils of the country which cannot easily be filled. May God sustain you in this moment of your supreme sorrow.

"With great respect, your friend,
"WOODROW WILSON."

TRIBUTE BY GOVERNOR RALSTON.

"I very much regret the death of Senator Shively. I became intimately acquainted with him in 1896, when he was the Democratic candidate for Governor of Indiana and I was on the ticket with him as a candidate for Secretary of State. We opened our campaign together on the night of the 17th of July at Anderson. That was the first time we had ever spoken together, and I shall never forget the fine impression he made upon me. From that time on he and I were very warm friends. "Senator Shively was beyond doubt one of the very ablest statesmen Indiana has produced. He was exceptionally well versed on the subject of taxation and his discussions on the tariff question, and in fact any phase of taxation, never fell short of being masterful. His fine mental poise and comprehensive grasp, coupled with his strong oratorical and physical powers, made him almost invincible on any of the great questions of free government. His attitude was that of the statesman rather than that of the politician when he came to the consideration of public questions.

"Since he went to the Senate the people of Indiana have watched with keen interest his course on legislative matters. His whole State rejoiced over the prominence to which he attained on the Foreign Relations Committee, which position gave him the opportunity to serve as one of the closest counselors of the President. It is generally understood that President Wilson rarely hesitated to rely upon his judgment upon any question which he had investigated. This is an honor that comes to but few men. It is an exceptional honor, when it is considered that President Wilson himself is a man of unusual attainments, and as a rule does not act until he has investigated a question himself.

"Senator Shively was recognized by the country as one of the strongest men of this State, as he had been for years by the people of Indiana. It is a fact that he never asked his party to confer upon him an honor that it didn't attempt to gratify his desire. He has made losing campaigns, of course, but he was always in the lead of those with whom he was associated on the ticket when he lost.

"He brought conspicuous honor to the people of the State which had honored him with the position of United States Senator. His wise counsel will be missed by the President; and his forceful and eloquent leadership will be greatly missed by his party in the State.

"He was a devoted husband and father, a loyal friend, and a tireless worker for the public welfare. Indiana mourns his loss, and the sympathies of her people go out in generous measure to the wife and dear ones who remain."

THOMAS TAGGART'S TRIBUTE.

"The State of Indiana has lost one of the greatest men and statesmen she has ever produced. Benjamin F. Shively was a great man and a leader among the greatest men of the nation. The Wilson administration has lost one of its strongest supporters and wisest counselors. While he represented Indiana in the United States Senate as the choice of the Democratic party, he was loved by the people of all parties and honored by all of us for his true greatness.

"Those who knew him best loved and appreciated him most, which is the highest praise that can be given any man. He was true and loyal to his friends. He believed in the principles of Democracy and in fair or stormy weather was ready to serve the party in any capacity."

BURIED AT SOUTH BEND.

The remains of the departed Senator, under congressional escort requiring three coaches, were conveyed to his South Bend home and interred in Riverview Cemetery Saturday afternoon, March 18, 1916. The utmost simplicity marked the obsequies, by special request of Mrs. Shively. Thousands thronged the streets of South Bend to witness the consignment to eternal rest of Indiana's distinguished and honored Senator. Their heartfelt sympathy went out silently and unostentatiously to the sorely bereaved widow and her two sons, George J. and John J., and daughter Mary.

Senator Shively had been gradually failing for more than two years. His condition became acute a little more than a year before his death. He was unable to attend the close of the Sixty-third Congress on March 4, 1915, and from that time dated the final and fatal stage of an illness that already had taken hold of him before he was sworn in as a United States Senator seven years before. The immediate cause of death was diabetic cancer of the throat. The cancer was a manifestation of the diabetes from which he had long been a silent, patient, and ever-hopeful sufferer.

DEATH OF EX-SENATOR JOHN WORTH KERN

"HAVING SERVED HIS GENERATION, BY THE WILL OF GOD HE FELL ON SLEEP"

THE middle of March, 1916, United States Senator John W. Kern attended the funeral of his distinguished colleague, Benjamin Franklin Shively, at South Bend. Seventeen months later he himself passed into glory and the tomb. In such manner is made apparent that life at best is but as a vapor that passeth away. "The glories of our birth and state are shadows, not substantial things."

The mournful tidings of the passing of John W. Kern were flashed over the wires August 18, 1917. His death occurred at Asheville, N. C., from an attack of uræmic poisoning. His devoted wife was at his bedside when dissolution ensued. He went to Asheville about a week before his death, in the hope and expectation of recuperating. Failing health impelled him to notify his friends to cease efforts in his behalf for an important appointment by President Wilson. He understood fully the precariousness of his physical condition.

Up to the time of his retirement from the U. S. Senate, on the 4th day of March, 1917, Mr. Kern was majority floor leader and Chairman of the Democratic conference committee. He was one of Indiana's favorite Democratic sons for many years. As a typical Hoosier attorney and orator he was known probably more widely throughout the State than any other man of his time. For many years he participated in nearly every political campaign.

His remains were interred at Hollins, Va., the summer home of the Kern family.

John W. Kern was born at Alto, near Kokomo, December 20, 1849. While he was still young his parents moved to Warren county, Iowa, where they lived on a farm. He started to attend school in Iowa and lived there until he was fourteen years old, when the Kern family moved back to Alto. When he was fifteen years old he began teaching school in his home town.

Entering the University of Michigan in 1867, he studied law and graduated in 1869. He began practicing in Kokomo when he was but twenty years old. His reputation grew until he was known as one of the ablest criminal lawyers in Indiana. At one time he was city attorney of Kokomo and ran for several other local offices on the Democratic ticket. He was married twice. His first wife was Annie Hazard, who died in 1884. One of his two children by his first marriage survives him. His second wife, who survives him, was Araminta Cooper, Kokomo.

Mr. Kern was admitted to the bar at Kokomo in 1869, where he practiced law for some time. However, Mr. Kern entered politics almost as soon as he was of age. He became a candidate for member of the Legislature in 1870. He was city attorney at Kokomo for five terms before moving to Indianapolis in 1885.

He was elected Reporter of the Supreme Court in 1882, serving four years. He was elected to the State Senate in 1892, serving four years.

He became a member of Thomas Taggart's Indianapolis political organization soon after it was formed, and for many years was closely associated with Mr. Taggart, who availed himself of every opportunity to advance his friend's personal, professional and political interests. Mr.

Kern was City Attorney of Indianapolis during the administration of Thomas Taggart as Mayor.

He ran for the office of Governor on the Democratic ticket in 1900 and 1904, being defeated each time. He was running mate of William Jennings Bryan for Vice-President of the United States in 1908, being defeated again. Opposing the late Senator Benjamin F. Shively, he was a candidate for United States Senator before the legislative caucus in 1909. In 1910 the Democratic State convention indicated against his wishes that he was its choice for United States Senator and the Legislature of 1911, which was Democratic, elected him to that position. He ran for re-election in the first popular election in November, 1916, and was defeated by Senator Harry S. New.

On entering the Senate Mr. Kern immediately sprang into the limelight because of his friendship with William Jennings Bryan and after the Democrats gained control of the Senate he was made majority leader. He was very close to the Wilson administration.

During the week following the burial of Senator Kern a largely attended meeting was held in the State House to pay tribute to the memory of the departed statesman. The meeting was arranged by the Indiana Democratic Club and was presided over by Secretary of State Ed. Jackson, a Republican, who presented former Governor Samuel M. Ralston as the first speaker of the evening.

"I am glad to join in paying a word of tribute to the memory of John Worth Kern," said Mr. Ralston, "for it was my good fortune to know him most intimately for more than thirty years. Personally, we were the warmest friends. Politically we were of the same faith and as a rule we stood side by side on the issues of the day.

"While I do not desire to dwell upon him as a partisan, it is perfectly proper for me to say that he was a most loyal party man and an honest antagonist. He fought his battles in the open and never condescended to strike a blow below the belt. The result was that when he took his departure he counted among his friends men whom he had often opposed most strenuously in the political arena.

"As a lawyer he displayed very unusual ability. He hated shams and was at times unmerciful in his excoriation of those who perpetrated frauds. He had a strong sense of equity and he loved justice above everything else. These characteristics always held for him the affection of the people of this State and ultimately secured for him the confidence of the people of this nation."

Ex-Governor Ralston was followed by William Jennings Bryan who, in terms of rare eloquence, pronounced the late Senator Kern a friend, a sympathetic adviser and loyal companion who held men to him with a threefold tie. "He was easily approached," continued Mr. Bryan, "unaffected in his way and unsurrounded by any walls of false pride, a man about whom there was no atmosphere of condensation or in whom there was a particle of tinsel dignity.

"No man had deeper convictions than did John Worth Kern and if anyone tried to swerve him in them he soon found to his sorrow the depth of feeling this great Hoosier possessed. He had a sense of humor that put him in a class with Abraham Lincoln. He liked stories that made the point he wanted to carry home. He radiated sunshine and his heart was big enough to take in the woes of everyone. Kern was a partisan. He was a Democrat. He never concealed the fact that he always let everyone know that he was proud of it."

Judge W. W. Thornton of the Marion county Superior Court also extolled the life of the departed as that of a noble, companionable and lovable man whose loss is keenly felt wherever he was best and most intimately known.

UNDER CHANGED AUSPICES

STATE NOMINATIONS WERE MADE IN THE CENTENNIAL YEAR 1916

UNDER the operation of the primary election system established by the General Assembly of 1915, nominations for the two most important offices—United States Senator and Governor—were made by popular vote on the day fixed by law, in the month of March. The only thing that remained for the convention to do regarding these nominations was perfunctorily to endorse or approve the result of the primaries. The other nominations were made in the usual manner.

An important incident of the convention was its action with reference to the nomination of a candidate for United States Senator to fill the unexpired term of Benjamin F. Shively, whose death occurred after the primary election had been held in the month of March. Governor Ralston had appointed Thomas Taggart to fill the then existing vacancy. Mr. Taggart, both at the time of his appointment and several times subsequent thereto, declared in clear and unmistakable terms that he did not desire to hold the office longer than until a successor could be chosen at the November election. His earnest desire was that Governor Ralston be made the short-term senatorial nominee by the convention. But the sentiment in favor of Mr. Taggart being placed on the ticket was so marked, so pronounced, and so determined, that nothing remained for him as a loyal partisan to do but to acquiesce in the popular clamor and to take the place assigned to him on the ticket. There is no doubt, however, that he would greatly have preferred the nomination of Governor Ralston.

The convention met at Tomlinson Hall, Indianapolis, April 24, and was called to order by State Chairman Bernard Korbly. Governor Samuel M. Ralston was introduced as temporary chairman, in which capacity he delivered an incisive speech, reviewing at length the achievements of the Democracy since its intrustment with power. As a keynote for the campaign it ranks among the most forceful deliverances of the present century. Upon the completion of the Governor's address, which was liberally punctuated by enthusiastic applause, Congressman Lincoln Dixon of the Fourth district was made permanent chairman. He assumed the gavel and proved himself a capable presiding officer throughout the session.

PLATFORM ADOPTED COVERS MUCH GROUND.

The preamble of the platform declares the inauguration of President Wilson, in 1913, had ended a long period of Republican ascendancy, marked by the dominance of special privilege, panic and social unrest.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff act, written by its sordid beneficiaries and passed over the protest of an outraged people, and in which progressive Republican leaders joined, was replaced with a revenue law just and equitable. Under this law the country's balance of trade reached a higher mark than ever before attained in the world's history, by this or any other country.

The reserve banking act is credited with having contributed more to the prosperity and business stability of the country than all the laws passed by the Republican party put together. Under this act the United States has the greatest wealth of gold ever accumulated by any country at one time, and the last twelve months have witnessed an increase of money deposits in national banks surpassing the entire amount of like deposits existent twenty years ago. Agriculture, commerce and manufactures are declared as daily setting new high records in industrial achievement.

As justification for a continuance of Democratic rule the following reforms are enumerated: Popular election of United States Senators; most liberal pension legislation enacted in a quarter of a century; extension of the parcel post; perfection of the postal savings bank system; reduction of tariff taxation and repeal of the Payne-Aldrich law; the income tax; expose and driving out of Washington the lobby which had become firmly established under Republican administration; strengthening the Sherman anti-trust law in the interest of legitimate business; prompt action in meeting all just demands of labor; enactment of the federal trade commission law.

Unqualified endorsement of the pending legislative program in Congress and the measures recommended by President Wilson is given.

The loss of a great leader in Indiana Democracy by the death of Senator Benjamin F. Shively is lamented and deplored.

The leadership and service of John W. Kern and the fidelity of the Indiana Democratic Congressmen are highly commended.

The appointment by the Governor of Thomas Taggart to fill the senatorial vacancy is also heartily commended.

Approval is given the Democratic policy of liberal pensions for soldiers, soldiers' widows and their dependent children.

President Wilson is praised for his courageous conduct of affairs in the complications arising from the European war and the troubles of Mexico.

The record made by Thomas R. Marshall as Vice-President received recognition of a highly complimentary character.

The administration of Governor Samuel M. Ralston is pronounced as wise, patriotic and democratic. He is credited with securing the enactment of numerous reform measures. His administration of State institutions in the way of economy and honesty, and his fair and just relations to both capital and labor are set forth as evidence of his faithfulness and loyalty to the people.

The record of Governor Ralston and his associates in office in the management of the finances of the State are especially commended. Under their administration the State debt has been paid, and, for the first time in over three-quarters of a century, Indiana is without a single dollar of indebtedness, while having a cash balance in its treasury.

The forethought shown in making the tax levy for the benevolent, penal and educational institutions of the State is commended, while Democratic control of both branches of the Legislature since 1911 is declared to have been marked by more constructive, statesmanlike and progressive legislation than is traceable to any like period of Indiana's legislative history.

While congratulating the people of the State on the marked improvement of public highways, as made under Democratic administrations and laws, the party is placed on record as favoring legislation that will result in more permanently constructed highways which can be more economically and efficiently kept in repair.

Legislation is pledged in the direction of more equalizing the burden of taxation and lowering the rate. Abolishment of the State sinking fund levy is declared possible from having paid off the State debt.

Endorsement is given the present laws governing the liquor traffic in the State, with a declaration in favor of their strict enforcement. The Republicans are charged with cowardice in evading mention of the subject in their platform.

Additional labor legislation, wise and just, keeping in mind the interests of both employer and employes, is pledged. The last Legislature is commended for enacting the law providing for arbitration of labor disputes.

Legislation regulating the general demurrer to pleadings in legal proceedings, thereby preventing undue delays, is approved, with declaration for honest and economical government, home rule for municipalities, approval of the congressional record of John A. M. Adair, the party's nominee for Governor, and laws for the betterment of country life are other features of this exceedingly elaborate State platform.

MOST OF THE NOMINATIONS MADE BY ACCLAMATION.

The distinctive feature of the convention was the nomination of Thomas Taggart for United States Senator, to fill the unexpired term of Benjamin F. Shively. The demonstration in honor of Mr. Taggart admitted of no doubt as to the sentiment of the convention. There was no question about most of the nominations being made by acclamation, because many of the candidates were unopposed. The convention quickly ratified the nomination of Senator John W. Kern and of John A. M. Adair for Governor, both of which were made by popular vote at the March primaries. Then the convention as quickly renominated Homer L. Cook for Secretary of State, Dale J. Crittenberger for Auditor of State, George A. Bittler for State Treasurer, and Phil Zoercher for Reporter of the Supreme Court. They had no opposition. The convention, with like speed, nominated E. B. Stotsenburg for Attorney-General, Douglas Morris and Charles E. Cox for Judges of the Supreme Court, and James A. Moran for Judge of the Appellate Court, because there was no opposition.

A genuine contest ensued over the nomination of a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor. The Second district presented Mason J. Niblack, Vincennes; the Fourth district, John C. Branaman, Brownstown; the Sixth district, Will A. Yarling, Shelbyville, and when the Seventh district was called Charles B. Clarke, State Senator from Marion county, placed Fred Van Nuys of Indianapolis in nomination.

The ballot resulted as follows: Niblack, 461; Branaman, 217; Yarling, 288; Van Nuys, 397. There were 1,363 votes in the convention, making 682 necessary to a choice. No nomination resulting from the first ballot, the second was promptly ordered.

The second ballot for Lieutenant-Governor resulted as follows: Niblack, 522½; Van Nuys, 451½; Yarling, 253; Branaman, 136. There was no nomination and the third ballot was started. John B. Peterson of Crown Point served as chairman of the convention while the third ballot for Lieutenant-Governor was in progress.

The name of Leonard B. Clore was injected into the contest by Switzerland county, which cast seven votes for him. Tippecanoe county followed with one for Clore. Somebody raised the question that Clore could not be voted for, but the question was not pressed. Several other counties followed with votes for Clore and every time such an announcement was made there was a shout from Clore enthusiasts, who evidently sought to start a Clore band wagon rush.

Mr. Clore arose and made a speech. "When I made my race for the nomination for Governor at the primaries I said I would not run for Lieutenant-Governor. I am in the habit of doing what I say I will do. I believe the men who have made this race are entitled to your support. I appreciate your votes, but I want to support one of the other candidates." There was wild disorder when Clore finished his speech. It was noticed that he did not say he would refuse to accept the nomination. "Clore! Clore! Clore!" came from all over the hall with a prolonged roar.

The third ballot resulted as follows: Niblack, 558 19-20; Van Nuys, 444 19-20; Yarling, 201 19-20; Branaman, 98 19-20; Clore, 58 1/2. There was no nomination. Branaman announced his withdrawal from the race, and this started another Clore demonstration.

When the fourth ballot was started it looked as if the Clore band wagon might rush straight down the center aisle. Nearly all of the counties gave him some votes.

The fourth ballot resulted as follows: Niblack, 576 6-15; Van Nuys, 298 11-15; Yarling, 142 11-15; Clore, 331 6-15. There was no nomination. Yarling announced his withdrawal, and the fifth ballot started.

Niblack was nominated on the fifth ballot, the vote being as follows: Niblack, 894 1/2; Van Nuys, 160 1/2; Clore, 352.

Samuel L. Scott of Jeffersonville had no difficulty in winning the nomination for State Superintendent of Public Instruction. The other candidate was Daniel C. McIntosh of Worthington. The total vote was: Scott, 901 1/2; McIntosh, 461 1/2.

S. W. Kann was nominated on the third ballot for State Statistician. This race started with six candidates. They were: Kann, George D. Franklin, Lafayette; Thomas W. Brolley, the present statistician; Richard Beer, Osgood; William Black, Rushville, and Joseph P. Hemphill, Rising Sun. It was urged against Brolley that he had had enough. He was elected to the office of Statistician and then the Legislature of 1915 extended his term two years, thus giving him a six-year incumbency. Evidently this argument carried some weight. His name finally was withdrawn. Kann was a strong contender for the nomination from the start. He had the solid support of the Twelfth district, besides what he picked up elsewhere and what was given him by the Marion county delegation—106 votes.

EX-AUDITOR WILLIAM H. O'BRIEN.

For quite a while it seemed to have been taken for granted that former State Auditor William H. O'Brien would be the Democratic nominee for Governor in 1916. He had devoted and enthusiastic friends in all parts of the State who would have gladly given him earnest support. His record as State Auditor was without flaw and denoted sincerest devotion to conscientious performance of public duty. He is of historic Democratic stock, his honored father, Cornelius O'Brien, having for years been a leader of the Dearborn county Democracy. Was born at Lawrenceburg, August 22, 1855. William H. O'Brien served fourteen years as Mayor of Lawrenceburg, and gave such thorough satisfaction as to make re-election a certainty as long as he could be induced to serve in that capacity. He received his largest majority upon his fifth and last election. In a business way he was associated with his father-in-law, Dr. W. H. D. Hunter, in the publication of the Lawrenceburg Register and in the management of the Citizens' National Bank. Later on Mr. O'Brien consolidated the Citizens' National Bank and the People's National Bank, and is now President of the People's National Bank of Lawrenceburg. It was rare, indeed, that a Democratic country newspaper and a national bank were thus allied and conducted in the same building—the bank below and the print shop above.

For six years (1902 to 1908) he served ably and most acceptably as chairman of the Democratic State Committee. After Mr. O'Brien concluded that he had been in municipal service long enough he was made a member of the State Senate, in which capacity he represented his constituency and the people of the State in general in a way that amply attested his worth as an efficient, painstaking and conscientious legislator. In 1910 he was nominated and elected to the office of State Auditor, and triumphantly re-elected in 1912. During his four years of public service he gave the State the full benefit of his superior business qualifications and his keen financial judgment. Persons familiar with his administration freely accord to him the praise of having taken high rank among the most capable custodians of important State offices. He has ever regarded public office as a public trust, and acted accordingly. In view of the superb record to which he can point with pardonable pride it will hardly be wondered that a strong sentiment developed throughout the State to make him its chief executive, and that keen disappointment was felt when announcement came that, for private and business reasons, he could not persuade himself to become a candidate for that high office.

His family consists of a devoted wife, three daughters, and three sons. They are the joy of his life. The family manages to have frequent reunions. One son, Robert Emmett, graduated from the United States Military Academy at West Point, is now first lieutenant in the Fifth Infantry and is stationed at Panama Canal Zone. The youngest son (Wm. H., Jr.) graduated from the United States Navy at Annapolis and is now lieutenant in the navy. At this writing he is in command of the Alaskan Radio expedition, and master of a 5,000-ton ship.

Mr. O'Brien is very happily situated, carefree and contented. This he could hardly expect to be were he engaged in an exciting and exacting political campaign. His time amply occupied in the supervision of extensive business interests, there is no likelihood of his becoming rusty. With the experience he has had in public life it is easy for him to realize that political honors are fleeting; that they fade like the flowers, and that the beauty of each is soon forgotten. Real home life is comforting and enduring. Mr. O'Brien has every reason to congratulate himself on being situated as he is and on having decided to serve his party in the ranks instead of seeking leadership. His official service extends over a goodly number of years. It must be a source of unbounded satisfaction to him to be enabled to say truthfully that at no time was his record ever tarnished in the slightest degree.

CHARLES A. GREATHOUSE.

Another gentleman who gained an enviable reputation as a State official was quite generally discussed in Democratic circles as a suitable candidate for Governor. This is Charles A. Greathouse, Superintendent of Public Instruction for three terms. He had earnest supporters in various parts of the State, and would doubtless have had enthusiastic backing at the primaries had he not positively declared that under no circumstances would he consent to the use of his name in connection with the gubernatorial nomination. He felt that close application to the diligent discharge of his duties as Superintendent of the Public Schools, and the exactions incident thereto, entitled him to a respite from the cares and responsibilities of public office. Besides, he recognized the fact that increasing business interests demanded some attention that would not admit of being neglected or ignored about the time when he would be relieved of official duty.

Charles A. Greathouse was born July 17, 1869, on a farm in Posey county, and reared thereon. In the days of his youth he had practical experience with all kinds of farm work. He attended the district school in Posey county and later was graduated from both the common schools and the high school of Mt. Vernon. Attended the Central Normal College at Danville, Ind., from 1886 to 1888, and Indiana University from 1890 to 1893. Duly equipped for educational work, he taught one year in the district school in Posey county, in the farthest school house in the southwest part of Indiana, just two miles from where the Wabash river empties into the Ohio river. Subsequently he taught six months in Hendricks county in a log school house familiarly known as "Sixty Cents," and located in the northwest corner of Brown township. Was Superintendent of the Boys' School at Plainfield for two years, resigning this position to enter Indiana University. Taught in the elementary and high schools of Mt. Vernon from 1894 to 1895, resigning his position there to accept the county superintendency, to which office he was elected in 1895. Served as county superintendent of Posey county for ten years, resigning in 1905 to accept the presidency of the People's Bank and Trust Company. He moved to Indianapolis in 1908 and was appointed by Governor Thomas R. Marshall on the 10th of November, 1910, to fill out the unexpired term of Robert J. Aley, State Superintendent of Public Instruction. Was elected to office of State Superintendent of Public Instruction in the fall of 1910, re-elected in the fall of 1912, and for a third term re-elected in the fall of 1914. He made an unsuccessful race for this office in 1900, at a time when Democratic nominations were regarded as purely complimentary affairs.

Important legislative enactments secured during Mr. Greathouse's administration as State Superintendent of Public Instruction may be thus enumerated:

- (1) Provision for Uniform High School text books.
- (2) Provision for State High School Inspector.
- (3) Vocational Education Law, carrying with it an amendment to the Compulsory Education Law, raising the age limit from fourteen to sixteen years.

(4) Amendment to the Minimum Wage Law, whereby provision is made for higher wages for teachers with longer experience.

(5) Pension Law for teachers.

(6) Modification of License Law.

Mr. Greathouse was married in 1903 to Erma Stanhope Ribeyre of New Harmony. He is the father of two children, Charles and Harriet, aged respectively eleven and nine. Whether Mr. Greathouse shall devote the remainder of his life to business pursuits or, in deference to public demand, again take upon himself the performance of official duties, in truth it may be said an enviable record has been made by him in the promotion of educational interests to which he and those near and dear to him may ever point with pride. The interests of the school children of Indiana were jealously guarded during all the years of Mr. Greathouse's efficient administration.

JOHN A. M. ADAIR, NOMINEE FOR GOVERNOR.

Remarkable indeed is the political record of John Alfred McDowell Adair, whom the Democrats of Indiana at primary election designated by overwhelming majority as their choice for Governor, and which action the convention ratified by vociferous acclaim. He was born in Jay county, Indiana, December 22, 1863; removed to Portland in 1880; attended the high school there, engaged in business; was elected clerk of the city of Portland in 1888; promoted to clerk of Jay county in 1890; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1895; elected representative to the General Assembly of Indiana in 1902; engaged in the banking business and made a success thereof. In 1906 he was nominated for Congress by the Democracy of the Eighth district—up to that time one of the Republican strongholds in the State. Dissension in the Republican ranks helped to break the ice. Mr. Adair was triumphantly elected. His manner of campaigning was an eye-opener to the old stagers who, up to this day, cannot understand how Mr. Adair managed not only to be elected and four times re-elected in a Republican district, but that his majority became more decisive at each try-out. His marvelous achievements in this particular amply justified all the claims set up in his behalf by those who championed his nomination for the governorship. While not at all pretentious as to the possession of superior oratorical powers, it is but presenting simple truth when the statement is made that Mr. Adair takes rank among the most effective campaigners in the State. His simplicity of argumentation commends itself to thoughtful voters, and in a measure accounts for the remarkable successes that crowned his efforts in five consecutive congressional contests.

Upon being presented to the convention as Indiana Democracy's selection for the gubernatorial chair he was given an ovation that could not have been otherwise than gratifying. Thereupon he delivered a necessarily brief address, the character of which may be judged by the vigor of these introductory paragraphs:

"In accepting this honor I promise you now, that if God will give me the health and the strength, I will go into all parts of every county in this State, preaching the gospel of Democracy and presenting to the people the splendid work of both our State and national administrations, confidently believing that when the ides of November come, when the smoke of battle shall have cleared away and the ballots have been counted, Woodrow Wilson will continue to rule in the White House, John Kern and Tom Taggart will occupy seats in the United States Senate, our splendid State officials will continue in their present positions, and, if you want to see me, come to the Governor's office of Indiana.

"When inaugurated as your Governor, I shall give to that office the best there is in me. The highest ambition I will have will be to render a service that will merit for me the endorsement, the confidence and the respect of all the people of Indiana, regardless of party. The laws of the State shall be and will be enforced to the letter. I shall insist on the strictest economy in the administration of the affairs of the State, and will see to it that not a dollar of the people's money is wasted. I shall give the subject of taxation special study and consideration, to the end that taxes may be equalized and the burden of taxation reduced to the lowest possible limit.

"I shall see that our charitable, benevolent and correctional institutions are properly managed, and that the unfortunate inmates are cared for in a way that will be creditable to our State. Having in mind the welfare of those who earn their bread by daily toil, I shall urge legislation that will do justice to both capital and labor, to the end that the strong may not trample on the rights of the weak, but that every man may have a square deal and an equal opportunity under the law. I shall oppose special privilege in every form, and insist on such progressive legislation as the people will demand. I shall stand for clean government and the advancement of civic righteousness in all parts of the State. I will strive to make Indiana the model State of the Union, in which our boys and girls can be reared to manhood and womanhood and sent out in life to bless the world and mankind."

Mr. Adair's running mate is Mason J. Niblack of Vincennes. He has an extensive acquaintance throughout the State, most of which was gained during the years of his connection with the State Board of Agriculture. As a member of that body he rendered service that will long be appreciably remembered by persons interested in making State Fairs enjoyable, educational, and progressively instructive from an agricultural point of view. He served several terms in the General Assembly, and by reason of his superior knowledge of parliamentary law and his capacity for legislative work was made Speaker of the House several decades ago. Professionally he is a lawyer. He is a son of the late William E. Niblack, who was for years the close associate of Hendricks, McDonald, Turpie, Voorhees, Holman and Kerr in the leadership of the party and rounded out his eventful career by distinguished service on the Supreme Bench of the State.

The entire State ticket is made up of men of established reputation as to fitness, qualification and worthiness. As to what the popular response to the action of the party is likely to be was forecasted by Senator Thomas Taggart when he uttered these inspiring words to his enthusiastic co-workers:

"Our Republican friends have neither an issue nor a candidate to take before the people with any hope of winning in the coming campaign. On no imagined issue can they assail with success any act of the administration of Woodrow Wilson. On no issue can they successfully attack the wonderfully progressive and constructive work of the administration of Governor Samuel M. Ralston, which stands by itself in the splendid record of accomplishments among all the administrations in the first 100 years of the State's history. As Democrats we go before the people in 1916 proud of all we have done in Nation and State, and confident of victory with the greatest majority ever achieved in political contest or by any party."

RECORD TO WHICH PARTY POINTS WITH PRIDE.

As already stated, the keynote of the campaign for 1916 was sounded by Governor Samuel M. Ralston, whose record is such as to give unusual weight to anything he may say with reference to promises and the redemption thereof. Among the many reasons set forth in his incisive keynote speech why the Democracy of Indiana had a right to ask of the electorate a continuance of Democratic ascendancy, Governor Ralston instanced these:

"A few years ago the Republican party and the Progressive party sought to outdo each other in extreme platform declarations—which they both labeled Degradationism. They threw conservatism to the wind and entered upon a campaign of radical and doubtful declamation. Their thundering throughout the State shook the very foundations of free government, and the people stood aghast at the assaults these parties were making upon the faith of the fathers.

"But the Democratic party was true to the traditions of the Republic and the people supported us. My word for it, there was not a sane and conservative measure found in either of those platforms that has not since been enacted into law by the Democratic party, and in addition many other helpful laws have been passed by our party. Our party is conservatively progressive and progressively conservative. It knows enough about government to know that the American people are opposed to extremes and to emotionalism in governmental enactments and policies, and for this reason it opposes with equal earnestness the platform that seeks to overthrow the well-settled principles of our government and the platform that abounds in colorless platitudes.

"The Democratic party of this State has given the people wisely constructed legislation in a new highway law, a Statewide primary election law, a flood prevention law, a law regulating child labor, a tenement housing law, an arbitration law, an anti-lobby law, a teachers' pension law, a rural loan association law, an anti-loan shark law, a law regulating the sale of narcotics, a uniform negotiable instrument law, a law simplifying methods of legal procedure, a public service law, a workman's compensation law, a vocational education law, a law making provision for the proper maintenance of our educational, penal, reformatory and benevolent institutions, and many other statutory enactments as instrumentalities of good government for the people. And it is the highest praise of the administrative and statesmanlike ability of the Democratic party of Indiana that no political party or body of citizens condemns any of these wise and just laws."

GOV. RALSTON'S ADMINISTRATION

NOTED FOR ITS PROGRESSIVE SPIRIT AND HIGH REGARD FOR THE PUBLIC WELFARE

AN administration cannot be reviewed completely until its term shall have been ended. But after a public functionary has served more than three-fourths of his term, a fair estimate of his achievements and accomplishments may be ventured without apprehension of serious impairment by what is yet to follow.

It may be said with strict adherence to truth and justice that Governor Ralston has fully met the expectations of those who were instrumental in placing him at the head of the State government. As an honest, upright man, as a modest Christian gentleman, he has ever been mindful of his oath of office and untiring in his efforts to serve the State to the best of his understanding and ability. At the very outset of his administration his courage was put to severe test. A strike disturbed the peace of the capital city and threatened to paralyze its commerce. Ever a sincere friend of wage workers, Governor Ralston dealt with the difficult situation then presented in such manner as to admit of no doubt that, while eager to lend a helping hand in making the lot of the working people easier and more remunerative, he must first see to the maintenance of order and the observance of law. By the wisdom, discretion, and sincerity of his course, and the superb courage displayed by him at the critical moment, he succeeded magnificently in allaying passion, subduing violence, and eventually restoring normal conditions. A less discreet and less courageous chief executive might easily have involved the capital city in riot and bloodshed.

On all moral questions that presented themselves from time to time there has under no condition or circumstances been any question as to the Governor's attitude. Not content with the exercise of whatever official power might be applied to the furtherance of public morality, Governor Ralston has in a number of public addresses, in various parts of the State, appealed strongly for popular support of every measure or proposition that gave promise of betterment of society. In these particulars he has earned the lasting gratitude of all the good men and women who have consecrated themselves to the uplift of humanity and the advancement of true happiness.

Without the slightest intention of indulging in invidious distinction it may be said that Indiana never had a Governor who was so constantly "on the job" as has been Governor Ralston. Perhaps former administrations did not demand the serious attention that has been exacted by the affairs of this administration. The institutions of the State have been constantly increasing, so that at this time we have seventeen benevolent and correctional institutions maintained at public expense. Because of his sympathetic nature Governor Ralston has always manifested a keen personal interest in the welfare of the unfortunates of the State confined in these institutions. In his selection of trustees thereof he has exercised rare discretion in choosing men of recognized ability and character. It has been his aim to select men and women of business acumen and a kindly and sympathetic feeling for those with whom they have to deal. In addition to selecting capable governing bodies for the several institutions he has given his attention to the manner in which each of them has been conducted. He has been steadfastly devoted to the best interests of each and all. Indiana's benevolent and correctional institutions are now recognized throughout the Union as being exceptionally well managed and efficiently conducted, and are patterned after by a number of other States.

For ages the abolition of the jail system has been the dream of the social workers, but it remained for Indiana to lead out in the movement of establishing a penal farm. As in similar progressive and reformatory movements, the Governor was active in bringing about the passage of the law providing for the accomplishment of this laudable purpose.

One of the most creditable acts of the Ralston administration was the vigor with which a well-directed fight was made for the enactment of the much-needed, far-reaching anti-lobby bill. The effect of this wise and heroic onslaught on artful and corrupting agencies cannot well be over-estimated. A single quotation from his masterly argument in support of this measure will enable the reader to form an intelligent opinion of the weight of the Governor's argument:

"In a free republic a public official is not a master. He is not even his own master; he is a servant—a servant in the noblest sense of that term. As a legislator he is called by his countrymen from the private walks of life and endowed with their commission to do a public work for his State and country. Vested with this authority, he is exalted before the public eye until it is said of him, as it was said of the husband of the virtuous woman, he 'is known in the gates when he sitteth among the elders of the land.' Being thus distinguished, because in him centers the power of the people to do their work, he must be the soul of candor with the people."

Governor Ralston, during his administration, has also interested himself in the preservation of the natural resources and beauty spots of the State. Quite recently he appointed a commission, serving without pay, to look after the preservation of the natural beauty of Turkey Run, a beautiful tract of hills and valleys in the western part of the State. Those who are acquainted with this spot declare it to be one of the most beautiful in the Central West.

The Governor is a strong believer in the value of sentiment in connection with our daily life. In a message to the last Legislature he favored the creation of a non-political and non-salaried centennial commission of nine members. The purpose of this commission was to provide for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State into the Union. He also advised that a considerable portion of the appropriation made for that celebration be used in historical research and in collecting and compiling historical documents, which shall be a permanent contribution to the State's history. In connection with his advocacy of an appropriation for that purpose he said:

"I know that the people of Indiana love their State. They have every reason for being proud of her achievements along every line that causes a people to be recognized as great—great in material progress, and greater still in moral and intellectual development. I would feel that as Governor I was lacking in patriotism if I did not favor the celebration by our people of their State's hundredth anniversary. The fine spirit such an event would kindle and rekindle among the people would be worth many times more than it would cost.

"And, after all, the real character of the State, representing though it does equality and brotherhood, depends upon the ideals of the people and their equipment for life. No matter how strongly the ship at sea be constructed, sooner or later she will be dashed to pieces on the rocks in her voyage if her crew be not qualified for their duty and alert in guiding her course. Would not such a celebration move our citizenship to take a keener interest in our State's development and a deeper pride in her destiny?"

The Governor realized the important part good roads play in our civilization. In 1914 he appointed a non-partisan highway commission, composed of five distinguished citizens of the State. The purpose of this commission was to investigate and study the building and maintenance of public highways, with the view of devising some uniform scheme of construction and maintenance of roads and the development of a system of management thereof.

In the early spring of 1915 he called a meeting of the Governors of seven States to be held in Chattanooga, Tenn., for the purpose of considering the construction of a national highway from Chicago, Ill., to Jacksonville, Fla., to be known as the Dixie Highway. In April, 1915, a meeting was held at Chattanooga, pursuant to the call of Governor Ralston, and was attended by a number of the Governors and a great many citizens. That meeting has generally been regarded as the greatest highway meeting ever held, both in the point of attendance and in the importance of the scheme under consideration. From that meeting developed the Dixie Highway Commission, which is now at work upon the Dixie Highway project, and all signs indicate that the Dixie Highway will shortly become a reality. The beneficial effects of that movement are not confined to the actual construction of a proposed highway, but the scheme has been an inspiration to other communities through which the road does not pass, and there is a general awakening of interest in good roads.

While the Governor was reared upon a farm, he was never engaged in farming after he began the practice of law until shortly before he became Governor. At this time he owns a farm in Boone county and is greatly interested in farm life and farm subjects. His chief recreation is visiting his farm. All movements looking to the development of live stock and farming industries have received his active support. It is largely due to his action in pledging the credit of the State to the payment of the claims for stock killed by quarantine agents that Indiana so effectively stamped out the dreaded foot and mouth disease. Delay in dealing with this disease would have resulted in immense loss to the live stock owners of the State. The Governor is also interested in all phases of industrial and social life of the State.

A fair index to the general policy of the Ralston administration is furnished by himself in an address delivered at Swarthmore College, near Philadelphia, June 12, 1916. In this address he urged a greater centralization of authority in the hands of governors and mayors. Governor Ralston gave it as his opinion that lawlessness is on the increase, and declared that greater power in the hands of the executives will do much to assist in improving conditions. In support of these views Governor Ralston presented these points:

"Disguise the truth as we may, the lawless element is on the increase, and it tends to have a paralyzing influence on local officials. To deal with the law violating class effectively, greater power must be centralized in the mayors of cities or the form of city government changed. Impeachment statutes must be strengthened and more power be given to the Governor. Education will, of course, be depended on to support and insure permanent reforms.

"Federal laws are more strictly enforced than State and local laws. There is a reason for this. With the exception of the President all federal officials charged with law enforcement are appointive officers, and the power that appoints them can retire them to private life upon their failure strictly to enforce the law.

"If the law afforded a more effective method for the removal of officials who refuse to do their duty, the people would have less cause for complaint of law violations; and if the Governor had the power to supersede the prosecuting attorney who fails to prosecute the law violator with a lawyer who would prosecute him, it would be an important factor in law enforcement and would tend to prevent the commission of crimes.

"In marking out his duty the citizen must take account of many things. He cannot close his eyes to conditions confronting him. The commercialism that has had full sway in this country during the last quarter of a century challenges the best thought of our day. Commerce is most helpful in the development of a country where it is not permitted to sweep on without the curbing influence of civic sanity.

"Blind commercialism carries with it at least two evils that are very hurtful. It has resulted in centering too much luxury and power in the extremely wealthy and in fixing a false notion of life in the minds of those without riches, but who are ambitious to imitate the rich. These two evils must and will be ultimately eliminated from our national life."

During his occupancy of the gubernatorial chair Governor Ralston delivered quite a number of speeches on current topics in various parts of the State. In all of these addresses Governor Ralston unflinchingly and invariably sought to arouse in the minds and hearts of his hearers a sentiment in favor of civic righteousness, patriotic citizenship, individual and official integrity, exemplary conduct in all the walks of life, promotion of educational and religious interests, co-operation and generous helpfulness; in short, a living exemplification of the Golden Rule and the unqualified acceptance of the sublime teachings contained in the imperishable Sermon on the Mount. So genuinely excellent are the sentiments enunciated by Governor Ralston that a distinctively appreciable service would be rendered the people of Indiana if all of his addresses along these lines were collected and printed in book form. In sentiment they are conducive to the cultivation of those lofty ideals that enter into the best type of American citizenship. They express the feelings and emotions of as high-minded and conscientious a chief executive as ever filled Indiana's gubernatorial chair. Samuel M. Ralston is a firm believer in the teachings of the founders of the American Republic, and in early life consecrated himself to the advocacy and championship of doctrines and principles that in the experience of the world have been found essential to the enjoyment of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

UNITED STATES SENATORS

CHOSEN BY THE INDIANA LEGISLATURE FROM 1861 TO 1911

THE Senate of Indiana for 1861 was composed of 28 Republicans and 22 Democrats. In the House there were 62 Republicans and 38 Democrats. Henry S. Lane, Republican, was elected United States Senator, receiving the solid vote of the Republicans. The Democrats voted for former Governor Joseph A. Wright, who afterwards affiliated with the Republicans.

In 1863 the Senate was made up of 27 Democrats, 21 Republicans, and 2 Independents. In the House there were 62 Democrats and 38 Republicans. Thomas A. Hendricks was elected to the United States Senate for the six-year term, while David Turpie was given the short term, expiring March 3, 1863. The Republicans voted for Joseph A. Wright for the long term and Daniel D. Pratt for the short term. Wright at the time filled the office by appointment of Governor Morton.

In 1867 the Senate contained 30 Republicans and 20 Democrats. The House: 61 Republicans, 39 Democrats. Governor Oliver P. Morton was elected United States Senator by the solid vote of his party, to succeed Henry S. Lane, who proved a disappointment to his friends and had no support for re-election. The Democratic vote was cast for Daniel W. Voorhees.

In 1869 the Republicans had on joint ballot 86 votes; the Democrats 62. There were two vacancies. The Democrats voted solidly for the re-election of Thomas A. Hendricks, while the bulk of the Republican vote went to Daniel D. Pratt, of Logansport, who was finally elected after a red-hot Republican bolt on account of Will Cumback, who was the original caucus nominee. Godlove S. Orth and Cumback at the final balloting had complimentary votes, but not enough to prevent Pratt's election by a safe majority.

In 1873 Oliver P. Morton was re-elected to the Senate by the Republicans, who had a total vote of 80, as against 70 Democrats and Liberal Republicans.

In 1875 Joseph E. McDonald got the benefit of the Democratic vote—23 in the Senate and 60 in the House. There were 22 Republicans and 5 Independents in the Senate, and 32 Republicans and 8 Independents in the House. The opposition divided their votes between Daniel D. Pratt, Richard W. Thompson and James Buchanan—the latter an ardent Greenbacker residing at Indianapolis. McDonald was a pronounced hard-money Democrat.

In 1879 there were in the Senate 24 Democrats, 23 Republicans and 3 Greenbackers. In the House: 50 Democrats, 39 Republicans and 11 Greenbackers. Oliver P. Morton had died November 1, 1877. To fill the vacancy Governor James D. Williams appointed Daniel W. Voorhees, who took his seat November 12, 1877, and was elected to the full term by the Legislature of 1879. The Republican vote was cast for Godlove S. Orth, while James Buchanan got the votes of the more radical Greenbackers who did not join the Democrats in electing Voorhees.

In 1881 the Republicans had a representation of 24 in the Senate and 58 in the House. They voted for General Benjamin Harrison for Senator, and elected him to succeed Joseph E. McDonald. The latter was humiliated by the Democratic vote (24 in the Senate and 41 in the House) being cast for Governor Isaac P. Gray, who became acting Governor for a few months upon the death of Governor Williams. The Greenbackers voted for Rev. Dr. Gilbert De La Matyr.

In 1885 there were only 14 Republicans in the Senate and 36 in the House. They voted for Governor Albert G. Porter for Senator. The Democrats had 36 Senators and 63 Representatives, all of whom voted for the re-election of Daniel W. Voorhees. The election in 1884 produced great results for the Democrats. They got Grover Cleveland for President, Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, Isaac P. Gray for Governor, a Democratic Legislature, and the re-election of Voorhees to the United States Senate by an exceptionally large majority.

In the Legislature of 1887 there were 19 Republican Senators and 55 Representatives. Of Democrats there were 31 in the Senate and 42 in the House. The balance of power on joint ballot was lodged in 3 Greenbackers. The Republicans in the House unseated a Democrat from Vigo county, whereupon the Democrats in the Senate unseated a Republican. This sort of thing did not commend itself to thoughtful Democrats and Republicans, so a halt was commanded, after some very exciting episodes. The fracas ended in the election of David Turpie to the Senate over General Harrison; but the latter was more than compensated for this loss by being nominated and elected to the Presidency in 1888.

In 1891 the Legislature was overwhelmingly Democratic—35 in the Senate and 73 in the House. All of them voted for the re-election of Daniel W. Voorhees, the 42 Republicans casting their votes for Governor Alvin P. Hovey.

In 1893 there were 35 Democrats in the Senate and 63 in the House. Their vote was cast solidly for the re-election of David Turpie to the United States Senate. The Republican minority voted for Charles Warren Fairbanks.

The landslide of 1894 played havoc with Democratic ascendancy. In the Legislature of 1897 there were 33 Republicans in the Senate and 52 in the House. Their votes were cast for Charles W. Fairbanks, who succeeded Daniel W. Voorhees, whose term expired March 3, 1897. Of Democrats there were 14 in the Senate and 39 in the House. They voted for the re-election of Mr. Voorhees. There were 3 Populists in the Senate and 9 in the House. They cast their votes for Leroy Templeton.

The United States senatorial election of 1899 still found the Republican party in power. The Democrats had lost six additional Senate seats, having but 14 members, with 33 credited to the Republicans and 3 to the Populists. The House division was: 52 Republicans, 39 Democrats and 9 Populists. The younger element of the Republican party were in the saddle, and after a prolonged caucus struggle the nomination was given Albert J. Beveridge, an Indianapolis lawyer noted for his eloquence, and he was subsequently elected over the veteran Turpie and Alonzo G. Burkhart, who received the support of the Populists.

Charles W. Fairbanks was re-elected to the United States Senate in 1903, when the Indiana Senate was divided—35 Republicans and 15 Democrats; the House, 66 Republicans and 34 Democrats. Benjamin F. Shively was the Democratic and only opposing candidate.

With the Legislature of 1905 very nearly as one-sided as the Republicans had it ten years previous, being constituted—in the Senate 36 Republicans and 14 Democrats; in the House, 79 Republicans and 21 Democrats; and Beveridge as yet in high favor with his party, there was no question as to his re-election. Mr. Shively was again the unsuccessful Democratic candidate. The election of Senator Fairbanks as Vice-President with Theodore Roosevelt left, by reason of his resignation, a four-year vacancy, which was filled by the election of James A. Hemenway over John W. Kern.

In 1909 the Democrats had regained the Governorship, Lieutenant-Governorship, State Superintendency of Public Instruction, with joint control of the Legislature after fifteen years' wandering in the political wilderness. The Senate remained Republican by reason of their having 27 members to 23 Democrats. The Democrats controlled the House by 60 to 40 Republican members, and thus had the power of naming Benjamin F. Shively to succeed Mr. Hemenway after a memorable caucus fight had eliminated several aspirants for the toga.

Two years later the Legislature division being: Senate—Democrats 30, Republicans 20; House—Democrats 60, Republicans, 40, John W. Kern, who had failed to secure the Democratic caucus nomination in 1909, was chosen to succeed Beveridge, who had broken with his party and in the following national election was the Progressive nominee for Governor of Indiana. This election was noteworthy by being the last held in the State under the original constitutional provision—by the Legislature.

EYES CLOSED IN ETERNAL SLEEP

THE GRIM REAPER'S WORK MADE HEAVY INROADS ON DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP

In the democracy of the dead all men at last are equal. There is neither rank nor station nor prerogative in the republic of the grave. At this fatal threshold, the philosopher ceases to be wise, and the song of the poet is silent. Dives relinquishes his millions and Lazarus his rags. The poor man is as rich as the richest, and the rich man is as poor as the pauper. The creditor loses his usury, and the debtor is acquitted of his obligation. There the proud man surrenders his dignities, the politician his honors, the worldling his pleasures; the invalid needs no physician, and the laborer rests from unrequited toil.

Here, at last, is nature's final decree in equity. The wrongs of time are redressed. Injustice is expiated; the irony of fate is refuted; the unequal distribution of wealth, honor, capacity, pleasure and opportunity, which makes life such a cruel and inexplicable tragedy, ceases in the realm of death. The strongest there has no supremacy, and the weakest needs no defense. The mightiest captain succumbs to that invincible adversary, who disarms alike the victor and the vanquished.—From John J. Ingalls' Eulogy on Congressman Burnes.

NEW States in the Union had a stronger Democratic leadership from the year 1868 to the close of the nineteenth century than Indiana. For a quarter of a century there was no time when the State could not have supplied the nation with an acceptable and capable chief executive. All the while, however, Death enforced heavy exactions. One after another the falling of mighty oaks was noted through the columns of the public press. The passing of sturdy men conspicuous in public life followed in quick succession—so much so that expressions of grief and sorrow over the loss of this or that favorite son cast a gloom over many localities in this justly famed commonwealth.

In preceding chapters may be found recorded biographical sketches and merited tributes to a number of the State's distinguished sons who entered upon the journey to the spirit land before the close of the eighties. Among these may be mentioned the distinguished men upon whom devolved leadership in a new political era dating from 1860, and in which Thomas A. Hendricks was knighted as the undisputed chieftain of the Indiana Democracy. Of presidential stature was Michael C. Kerr, who died shortly after his election to the speakership of the National House of Representatives, in 1876. Mr. Hendricks himself passed away twenty-five years after he had been proclaimed the leader of his party in Indiana. He was preceded by Governor James D. Williams at a ripe age, and after having rendered the State valued service in various ways. Suitable and deserved tributes by the masterly pen and the eloquent voice of the matchless orator, Daniel W. Voorhees, will be found printed on preceding pages. What follows these explanatory lines relates to men who entered the Palace of Eternity at subsequent periods.

JOSEPH E. McDONALD was of presidential stature. He was a great lawyer. During his earlier years he served one term in Congress and before the civil war he was twice elected Attorney-General of Indiana. In the spirited contest for the Governorship in 1864 he was defeated by Governor Oliver P. Morton, but in 1875 he became Morton's colleague in the United States Senate. He was the choice of many influential Democrats throughout the country for the Presidency in 1880, but refused to consent to the use of his name unless Mr. Hendricks assented thereto. This could not be brought about, and the nomination went to the gallant General Winfield Scott Hancock. Four years later Indiana formally presented Mr. McDonald as Democracy's choice for the Presidency. Mr. Hendricks put him in nomination, but Grover Cleveland had the call that year, and McDonald's name was withdrawn after it had become apparent that he could not secure the nomination and that Mr. Hendricks might. As in 1876, the nomination for Vice-President was thrust upon Mr. Hendricks. He did not want it, but was compelled to subordinate his personal wishes to the behest of the party. Mr. McDonald, after these experiences, devoted himself more assiduously than ever before to the practice of law, which in time became quite lucrative. But for certain regrettable jealousies Mr. McDonald would have become President Cleveland's Attorney-General in 1885. McDonald was born in Butler county, Ohio, August 29, 1819, moved with his mother to Indiana in 1826, and died at Indianapolis June 21, 1891. He was twice married, and his second wife died twenty-five years later. One of the former Senator's sons is a leading stock farmer in the northwestern part of Indiana.

DANIEL WOLSEY VOORHEES was one of the most remarkable men in the State. Born September 26, 1827, in the same county in which his life-long friend,

Joseph E. McDonald, first espied the light of the world, the county of Butler, Ohio. Daniel's parents soon after moved upon a farm in Fountain county, Indiana, on which the gifted son was reared. Was graduated from the Indiana Asbury University in 1849; studied law, was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice in 1851; United States District Attorney for Indiana 1858-1861; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth Congresses (March 4, 1861-March 3, 1865); presented credentials as a member-elect to the Thirty-ninth Congress, and served from March 4, 1865, to February 23, 1866, when he was succeeded by Henry D. Washburn, who contested his election; re-elected to the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses (March 4, 1869, to March 3, 1873); defeated as a Democratic candidate for the Forty-fifth Congress; appointed, and subsequently elected, as a Democrat to the United States Senate to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Oliver P. Morton; re-elected in 1885 and 1891, and served from November 6, 1877, until March 3, 1897; died in Washington, D. C., April 9, 1897. A more generous-hearted man than Daniel Voorhees never breathed; a more eloquent orator never swayed juries or political gatherings. Politically he was frank, courageous, aggressive. Fidelity to his friends was with him both a duty and a pleasure, from which no exigencies ever caused him to swerve. Devotion characterized his following, the bond which held them being profound affection—a bond which rarely parted save in death. From his first nomination to Congress, in 1856, he never, in any of the many conventions in which his name was presented as a candidate for the House or Senate, had opposition in his own party. During the nineties he was freely talked of as a presidential possibility, but he promptly squelched all suggestions of that nature. "I have too many angles to become a presidential aspirant," he said to a small circle of devoted friends and admirers. He died poor in purse, but rich in the esteem, love and confidence of millions of his fellow-men.

DAVID TURPIE, who, like his colleague Voorhees, served a long time in the Senate of the United States, was born in Hamilton county, Ohio, July 8, 1829; was graduated from Kenyon College in 1848; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1849, and practiced in Logansport, Ind.; appointed by Governor Wright Judge of the Court of Common Pleas in 1854-1856; Judge of the Circuit Court in 1856; member of the Legislature of Indiana in 1852 and 1858; elected to the United States Senate in 1863 to fill the vacancy caused by the Senate expelling Jesse D. Bright, and served from January 14, 1863, to March 3, 1863; member of the State House of Representatives and served as Speaker 1874-1875; one of the three commissioners to revise the laws of Indiana in 1878-1881; appointed United States District Attorney for Indiana in August, 1886, and served until March 3, 1887; delegate-at-large to the Democratic national convention in 1888, and again in 1896; elected as a Democrat to the United States Senate February 2, 1887; re-elected in 1893 and served from March 4, 1887, until March 3, 1899; died in Indianapolis, April 21, 1909. He was one of the State's most scholarly men, a profound thinker and a forceful, logical speaker. By the practice of law he acquired an adequate competence.

WILLIAM E. NIBLACK was born in Dubois county, Indiana, May 19, 1822; attended Indiana University, but did not graduate; studied law and was admitted to the bar; practiced in Vincennes; elected to the State House of Representative, 1849 and 1853; member of the State Senate, 1850-1852; Circuit Judge from January, 1854, to October, 1857; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-fifth Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the death of James Lockhart; re-elected to the Thirty-sixth Congress and served from December 7, 1857, to March 3, 1861; delegate to the Democratic national conventions in 1864, 1868 and 1876; re-elected to the Thirty-ninth and to the four succeeding Congresses (March 4, 1865, to March 3, 1875); Judge of the Supreme Court of Indiana, 1877-1889; died in Indianapolis, May 7, 1893. Personally he was a lovable character. He would have been delighted to have rounded out his long and useful career as Governor of his native State, but the younger element set up claims to which Judge Niblack did not care to interpose objection. During his entire political career he sustained very close relations to Mr. Hendricks.

WILLIAM STEELE HOLMAN, who had the proud distinction of serving a longer time in Congress than any other Indianian, was born in Dearborn county, Indiana, September 6, 1822; attended the common schools, and Franklin College, Indiana, for two years; studied and practiced law; Judge of Probate Court, 1843-1846; prosecuting attorney, 1847-1849; member of the constitutional convention of Indiana in 1850; member of the Legislature in 1851-1852; Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, 1852-1856; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth Congresses (March 4, 1859, to March 3, 1865); re-elected to the Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses (March 4, 1867-March 3, 1877); re-elected to the Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses (March 4, 1881-March 3, 1895); again elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress and served from March 4, 1897, until his death in Washington, D. C., April 22, 1897. Judge Holman was for years the ever-vigilant and faithful "Watchdog of the Treasury." As such he was to the nation worth his weight in gold several times over. He was plain, unpretentious, able, diligent, vigilant, patriotic, level-headed, and scrupulously honest. Fads and frills never commended themselves to this faithful and incorruptible servant of the people.

ISAAC P. GRAY, for fifteen years a power in the Democratic party of Indiana, was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, October 18, 1828; removed to Montgomery county, Ohio, in 1839; in 1855 settled in Union City, Ind., and practiced law. Became Colonel of the Fourth Indiana Cavalry; recruited and organized the One Hundred and Forty-seventh Infantry. Was nominated in 1866 by the anti-Julian party of the Sixth District for Congress, but was defeated by George W. Julian. Was elected State Senator in 1868 as a Republican, and served four years. He was largely instrumental in securing the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution by the Indiana Legislature. In 1872 he Greeleyized, and from that time on until his death he affiliated with the Democracy. In 1876 he was nominated by the Democratic party for Lieutenant-Governor and elected. He became acting Governor on the death of James D. Williams, November 20, 1880, during the remainder of the term. In 1880 he sought the Democratic nomination for Governor, was defeated by Franklin Landers, but again nominated for Lieutenant-Governor. With the rest of the ticket he was defeated at that year's election. In 1881 he was made the caucus nominee of the Democratic members of the General Assembly for United States Senator, but in the election was defeated by General Benjamin Harrison. In 1884 he was easily nominated for Governor and triumphantly elected. In 1893 he was appointed by President Cleveland as Minister to Mexico, which position he held until his death, February 14, 1895. After Colonel Gray had become fairly fixed in the Democratic saddle he was a power in the party, notwithstanding his former obnoxious political affiliation and activity.

He was very much chagrined over his defeat for the gubernatorial nomination in 1880, when he was beaten by Franklin Landers by about a dozen votes. In 1884 there was still some hostility to him among prominent and influential Democrats, but he snapped his finger at them and told them to do their utmost. He secured the nomination without much effort, and was triumphantly elected. He had incurred the displeasure of the friends of Joseph E. McDonald by depriving the latter of the caucus nomination for United States Senator in 1881. Notwithstanding this friction, Governor Gray was made Indiana's choice for the Vice-Presidency in 1888, but the nomination went to Senator Allen G. Thurman of Ohio. In 1892 Gray was put forward for the presidential nomination, but the Cleveland sentiment in Indiana was made to appear to be so formidable that the State's entire vote was by some strange manipulation turned over to Grover Cleveland, with the understanding that Gray was to be nominated for Vice-President. There was a hitch in this, and the nomination went to Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois. Gray, though not a scholarly man, was a graceful, effective, logical speaker. He counted his ardent friends by the thousands. He had two promising sons, both of whom died in comparatively early manhood.

Governor CLAUDE MATTHEWS was a native of Kentucky. Both branches of the family were farmers. The maternal grandfather served as one of Kentucky's representatives in Congress. Claude was born in Bath county, December 14, 1845. He attended such schools as the county afforded until fifteen years of age, when his father purchased a farm near Maysville and located there. Young Matthews availed himself of the superior school facilities of that locality, graduated in due time, and in 1863 entered Center College, Danville, Ky., from which he graduated in June, 1867. On the first of January, 1868, he was united in marriage to Martha R. Whitcomb, only child of the late James Whitcomb, in his day Governor and later on United States Senator. The same year the young couple moved onto a big farm near Clinton, Vermilion county, Indiana, where they lived continuously except during the time that he served as Secretary of State and Governor at Indianapolis—a period of six years. Governor Matthews was extensively engaged in grain and stock farming. In 1876 he was persuaded to enter the race for the Legislature, and was elected by nearly 300 majority, notwithstanding the fact that the county had almost uniformly been largely Republican. After giving six years of his life to the public service he resumed farming operations in Vermilion county. Death suddenly terminated his useful career while away from home. After having concluded an address at an old settlers' meeting at Meharry's Grove, near Wingate, Montgomery county, August 25, 1898, he was stricken with paralysis and was taken to the home of Mr. Isaac Meharry, where the former State executive died at 6 o'clock the morning of the 28th of August. He was conscious, but never spoke after leaving the speaker's stand. Just as he had finished his address he said: "I feel so very queer," and would have fallen but for the fact that friends came to his assistance.

General JAMES R. SLACK was one of the most popular men in the State of Indiana. He was born in Bucks county, Pennsylvania, September 28, 1818, and died suddenly at Chicago, July 28, 1881. He received an academic education, and when nineteen years of age came to Indiana with his parents, who settled in Delaware county. He taught school and read law until he was of age, when he was admitted to the bar. Soon after this he chose Huntington county as his field of activity, locating in the town (now city) of Huntington, where he held citizenship the remainder of his life. He taught in the public schools in that city, served as deputy clerk, and was auditor of the county for eight years. In 1851 he was elected as a Democrat to the State Senate, in which body he served two terms. He had previously served with distinction in the Mexican war and for a time officiated as Military Governor of New Mexico. At the outbreak of the rebellion in 1861 he assisted in raising the Forty-seventh Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, he being selected as colonel of the regiment. Besides other important service, his regiment was engaged in the battle of Champion Hills and lost 143 in killed and wounded. It took part in the siege of Vicksburg which followed, and was almost constantly on the firing line. On December 31, 1864, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and in March, 1865, was brevetted major-general, and performed conspicuous service until the close of the civil war. After the collapse of the rebellion he resumed the practice of law in Huntington, and continued until appointed judge by Governor Hendricks, in 1873, for the judicial circuit composed of Huntington, Grant and Blackford counties. He was elected judge of that circuit at a special election held in October, 1873, and re-elected at the regular election in November, 1878. He served until his death in 1881. Meanwhile he had made an unsuccessful race for Congress. He was a brave officer, and an honest and upright judge. General Slack had the good will of every soldier under his command, and his comrades never tire of repeating his many kind acts to them and the sacrifices he made and dangers encountered for their comfort and safety. As a judge he made a lasting impression. He had an unusual quantity of practical common sense, which enabled him to brush aside the mass of legal technicalities with which a question is sometimes surrounded and reach a conclusion that was generally satisfactory to those concerned. He had great executive ability, and this enabled him to push the business with such dispatch that litigants were pleased. Wherever one may go in his circuit, even after the lapse of thirty-five years, there will still be heard the people and lawyers mentioning something that Judge Slack had said or done while holding court and trying cases in their counties. His mortal remains are interred in Mount Hope Cemetery, near the city of Huntington. One daughter, Mrs. Dr. B. H. B. Grayston, resides in Huntington, and a son, James R., and daughter, Mrs. Al-pough, reside in California.

WASHINGTON C. DEPAUW stood among the foremost men of Indiana. He was born at Salem, January 4, 1822. As a young man he saved his money and soon bought and operated flour mills and saw-mills. He established banks at Salem and New Albany. DePauw was the first manufacturer of plate glass in the United States and broke the monopoly enjoyed by France, England and Belgium. Everything he touched in a business way prospered. He was uncommonly liberal and helpful to his less fortunate and less successful fellowmen. Decidedly public-spirited, he developed numerous enterprises in various parts of the State. Before he had become of age he was made deputy clerk of Washington county. In 1872 many influential Democrats favored and urged his nomination to the office of Governor. Had Thomas A. Hendricks adhered to his resolution not to make a third race for the governorship, DePauw would in all probability have been nominated to that position. As it was, the convention by an overwhelming majority named him for the lieutenant-governorship, which, however, he declined. As a pronounced protectionist and temperance man, and much more inclined to the cause of education and religion than to practical politics, he respectfully but firmly declined the nomination tendered him by the convention. The vacancy was happily filled by the selection of John R. Cravens of Madison, a Liberal Republican and most estimable gentleman. The father of W. C. DePauw was a man of high repute. He was widely and favorably known as a leader in the Territory of Indiana. The son was one of the wealthiest men of the State. He endowed Asbury University at Greencastle with a gift of half a million, and the trustees changed the name of the university to DePauw University. He died in 1887 of apoplexy while away from home on a business trip to Chicago.

JAMES F. McDOWELL was for many years a Democratic leader in Grant county. He was born in Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, December 3, 1825; moved to Ohio in 1835; attended the public schools; worked in a printing office; studied law, was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice in 1846; elected district attorney of Darke county, Ohio, in 1848; established the Marion Journal in Indiana; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-eighth Congress (March 4, 1863-March 3, 1865); unsuccessful candidate for re-election to the Thirty-ninth Congress; resumed the practice of law; died in Marion April 18, 1887.

SIMEON K. WOLFE was quite a factor in Democratic politics of the old Second (New Albany) district. He was born in Floyd county, Indiana, February 14, 1824; attended Floyd county schools and was graduated from the law department of the University of Indiana, at Bloomington, in 1850, and practiced in New Albany, Ind.; presidential-electoral in 1856; State Senator, 1860-1864; delegate to the Democratic national convention in 1860; engaged in newspaper work; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-third Congress (March 4, 1873-March 3, 1875); circuit judge of the Floyd and Clark circuit, 1880; died in New Albany November 18, 1888.

WILLIAM FLEMING, one of the State's most sagacious and successful business men, wise counsellor, and trusted leader, though a native of the Emerald Isle, was in sentiment and action a typical American. Born near Dublin, Ireland, June 17, 1828, he was made the beneficiary of an excellent practical education. The Fleming family was blessed with ten children. When William had reached the age of eighteen the father decided to take his family to America, via Quebec. While detained in the harbor at that quaint old Canadian port town the father and four of the children died. This calamitous misfortune imposed upon William a task that tested as well as developed the mettle in his makeup. Heroically and determinedly he met every requirement incident to a struggle for existence. He soon gained a firm foothold in Fort Wayne. Steady progress crowned his efforts. His first occupation was that of a stone cutter for the late James Humphrey. His first political office was that of high constable, long ago abolished. Then he became a deputy under Sheriff McMullen, later serving two terms in that office as sheriff, then being elected to two terms as county clerk. During the seventies he owned and conducted the Fort Wayne Sentinel, giving that publication exceptional prestige, politically and commercially. In 1878 he was elected State Treasurer of Indiana, was renominated in 1880, but went down in defeat with the rest of the Democratic State ticket. In politics he was always a staunch Democrat and was one of the most influential leaders of the party in the State and to some extent in the nation. He was a man of prodigious abilities and amassed a snug fortune in business. For years he had suffered from asthma. Assuming an acute form, that disease caused his death on the 13th of January, 1890. He closed his eyes in eternal sleep at his ideal home on West Berry street, surrounded by his grief-stricken wife and children and a group of sorrowing friends. The funeral was one of the most largely attended in the annals of the Summit City. Sincerely beloved as he was by thousands, his passing occasioned deep-felt sorrow and grief, not only at Fort Wayne and in Allen county, but throughout the commonwealth.

GEORGE A. BICKNELL spent by far the greater part of his useful life in the public service. He was born in Philadelphia, Pa., February 6, 1815; was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1831; attended Yale law school one year; completed law studies and admitted to the bar in New York City in 1836; moved to Lexington, Scott county, Indiana, in 1846; elected county prosecutor in 1848, circuit prosecutor in 1850, and judge of the second judicial circuit in 1852, holding the last-named place twenty-four years; professor of law in the University of Indiana, 1861-1870; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses (March 4, 1877-March 3, 1881); in 1881 he was appointed commissioner of appeals in the Supreme Court of Indiana, which office he held until the completion of its work in 1885; judge of the Circuit Court of Indiana in 1889, and held that office until his death, in New Albany, April 11, 1891.

THOMAS R. COBB had for years a strong hold upon the Democracy of southwestern Indiana. He was born near Fayette, Lawrence county, Indiana, July 2, 1828; attended Bloomington University; studied and practiced law in Bedford, Ind., from 1853 until 1867, when he moved to Vincennes; elected to the State Senate from 1858 to 1866; Democratic candidate for elector in 1868; President of the Indiana State convention in 1876; delegate to the Democratic national convention at St. Louis, which nominated Tilden and Hendricks in 1876; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses (March 4, 1877-March 3, 1887); died in Vincennes June 23, 1892.

GENERAL JAMES A. CRAVENS had in several respects a marvelous career.

For nearly a half century he was in one way or another associated with public life. Born in Rockingham county, Virginia, November 4, 1818, he moved with his father to Indiana in 1820; attended the public schools; engaged in farming and stock raising; served in the war with Mexico as major of the Second Indiana Volunteers from June, 1846, to 1847; member of the State House of Representatives from 1848 to 1849, and of the State Senate from 1850 to 1853; commissioned brigadier-general of militia in 1854; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth Congresses (March 4, 1861-March 3, 1865); delegate to the Union national convention in Philadelphia in 1866, and to the Democratic national convention in New York in 1868; died in Hardinsburg, Ind., June 20, 1893.

JOSEPH K. EDGERTON was one of the most accomplished gentlemen that ever graced a seat in a legislative assembly. He was born in Vergennes, Vt., February 16, 1818; attended the public schools of Clinton county, New York; studied law in Plattsburg and was admitted to the bar in New York City in 1839; moved to Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1854; became president of the Fort Wayne & Chicago railroad; elected as a Democrat to the Thirty-eighth Congress (March 4, 1863-March 3, 1865); defeated for re-election; died in Boston, Mass., August 25, 1893.

ANDREW H. HAMILTON bore the name of a historic family highly esteemed throughout northeastern Indiana. He was born in Fort Wayne, Ind., June 7, 1834; attended the common schools and was graduated from Wabash College; studied law at the Harvard law school, was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Fort Wayne; elected to the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses (March 4, 1875-March 3, 1879); died in Fort Wayne, May 9, 1895.

GENERAL MAHLON D. MANSON was for a third of a century a conspicuous figure in the affairs of Indiana. He was born in Piqua, Ohio, February 20, 1820; attended the common schools; became a druggist in Crawfordsville, Ind.; member of the State House of Representatives, 1851-1852; served as captain of volunteers in the Mexican war, October 8, 1847-July 28, 1848; served in the civil war; commissioned captain of the Tenth Indiana infantry, April 17, 1861; major, April 25, 1861; colonel, May 10, 1861; honorably mustered out August 6, 1861; recommissioned colonel of the same regiment, September 18, 1861; brigadier-general of volunteers, March 24, 1862; resigned December 21, 1864; unsuccessful Democratic candidate for Lieutenant-Governor of Indiana in 1864; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-second Congress (March 4, 1871-March 3, 1873); unsuccessful candidate for re-election to the Forty-third Congress; nominated and elected Auditor of State in 1878; defeated for re-election in 1880; running mate of Governor Gray in 1884, triumphantly elected, but resigned the Lieutenant-Governorship to accept the office of Collector of Internal Revenue under Cleveland's first administration; died at Crawfordsville February 4, 1895.

WILLIAM F. PARRETT was for years a Democratic idol down in the "Pocket" of Indiana. He was born near Blairsville, Posey county, Indiana, August 10, 1825; attended public schools and Asbury (now DePauw) University, in Greencastle; studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced in Evansville until 1852; moved to Oregon, where he practiced law for two years and a half; returned to Evansville in 1854 and moved to Boonville in 1855; Democratic presidential-elect in 1856; member of the Legislature in 1858; appointed and subsequently elected judge of the fifteenth circuit and served from 1859-1865; returned to Evansville; re-elected circuit judge for a term of six years, in 1865; resigned and was appointed judge of the first circuit and three times elected, 1873-1884; resigned in December, 1888; elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses (March 4, 1889-March 3, 1893); died in Evansville June 30, 1895.

ALFRED P. EDGERTON was born at Plattsburg, N. Y., in 1813. After his graduation from Plattsburg academy he was connected with newspaper work for a brief period before removing to New York City to engage in commercial pursuits. In 1837 he located as an attorney at Hicksville, Ohio, to represent the landed interests of the American Land Company, and the Messrs. Hicks. Through his agency over 100,000 acres of land were sold. Mr. Edgerton became himself the owner of 40,000 acres of valuable land in northwestern Ohio. As a member of the Ohio Senate in 1845 he became the Democratic leader of that body, and in 1850 he was elected a representative to Congress; a reelection followed in 1852. In 1853 he was chosen by the Board of State Fund Commissioners of Ohio as financial agent to reside in New York. In 1857 Mr. Edgerton removed to Fort Wayne, and two years later, with Judge Samuel Hanna and Pliny Hoagland, he leased the Wabash and Erie canal, which he controlled as general manager until 1868. In the latter year he was a candidate for Lieutenant-Governor of Indiana, and four years later declined to become a candidate for Governor on the ticket of the O'Connor Democrats. President Cleveland appointed Mr. Edgerton a member of the National Civil Service Commission. In his later years Mr. Edgerton served in many important positions, including that of member of the Fort Wayne school board for an extended period. He died at Hicksville, Ohio, May 14, 1897.

JASON B. BROWN, an able lawyer and for years a political leader in southern Indiana, was born in Dillsboro, Ind., February 26, 1839; attended the common schools; studied law in Indianapolis in 1858-1859, and admitted to the bar in 1860; located in Jackson county, Indiana, in 1860; elected to the State House of Representatives in 1862 and 1864; elected to the State Senate in 1870; on recommendation of Senator Morton, appointed in 1873 to serve as secretary of Montana Territory; in 1880 again elected to the State Senate as a Democrat; elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-first, Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses (March 4, 1889-March 3, 1895); died in Seymour, Ind., March 10, 1898.

CHARLES A. O. McCLELLAN made a success of all his ventures—whether in law, banking or manufacture. He was born in Ashland, Ohio, May 25, 1835; moved to Auburn, Ind., in 1856; attended the public schools; studied law in Auburn; was admitted to the bar in 1860 and began practice in Auburn; was appointed postmaster of Waterloo in 1867; there engaged in the banking business in 1868; appointed judge of the fortieth circuit of Indiana by Governor Williams in 1879 and served for two years; elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses (March 4, 1889-March 3, 1893); died in Auburn January 31, 1898.

GEORGE W. COOPER was a fine type of Hoosier Democrat. He was born in Bartholomew county, Indiana, May 21, 1851; attended the public schools and was graduated from the Indiana State University, literary and law courses, in 1872; elected prosecuting attorney in 1872; mayor of the city of Columbus in 1877; city attorney of Columbus for four years; elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-first, Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses (March 4, 1889-March 3, 1895); resumed the practice of law in Columbus, Ind.; died in Chicago, Ill., November 27, 1899.

SAMUEL E. MORSS, a son of former Mayor Samuel S. Morss, was a native of Fort Wayne, born in 1852. Early in life he engaged in newspaper work as the city editor of the Fort Wayne Gazette, and in partnership with William R. Nelson, purchased the Fort Wayne Sentinel in 1879. The following year the paper was sold to E. A. K. Hackett, and Messrs. Morss and Nelson established the Kansas City (Mo.) Star. Failing health soon caused a change in the work of Mr. Morss and he spent some time abroad. Returning, he engaged in newspaper work in Chicago, and in 1888 he organized a company for the purchase of the Indianapolis Sentinel, the policies of which paper he controlled. Shortly after his second inauguration, President Cleveland appointed Mr. Morss to the important post of Consul-General at Paris, an honor which came unsolicited. The tragic death of Mr. Morss occurred at Indianapolis in 1899. He fell out of a third-story window of the Sentinel building on Illinois street and died almost instantly from the effects of the fall.

JAMES H. SMART, after serving nine years as superintendent of the Fort Wayne public schools, was at the age of thirty-four elected Indiana's Superintendent of Public Instruction. He was born in New Hampshire, June 30, 1841. Graduating from Dartmouth, he began teaching at the age of seventeen years. In 1863 he came West and was employed in the Toledo, Ohio, schools. While Superintendent of Public Instruction, which office he held for three successive terms, Professor Smart prepared an exhibit for the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia which attracted wide attention. Two years later at the Paris Exposition the exhibit sent by Professor Smart received the grand gold medal, the highest award. He was now a national figure in the educational world. In 1880 Smart was selected by the National Educational Association to outline an ideal State school system, which was the model for many years. In 1883 he became the President of Purdue University, located at Lafayette, Ind., and filled this position until removed by death, February 21, 1900.

FRANKLIN LANDERS was for many years prominent in business as well as in politics. During the seventies he became an exponent of the Greenback idea. On that issue he was elected to Congress in 1874. He sought the nomination for Governor in "Tilden year," 1876. In this aspiration he failed, but succeeded in preventing the nomination of the "Watchdog of the Treasury," William S. Holman. The nomination of "Blue Jeans" James D. Williams was the final outcome of this remarkable contest. Landers, however, secured the gubernatorial nomination in 1880, but was defeated at the election by Albert G. Porter. The subject of this sketch was born in Morgan county, Indiana, March 22, 1825; attended the common schools; engaged in farming and in 1850 entered the dry goods trade; moved to Indianapolis in 1865; entered the pork-packing business in 1873; member of the State Senate, 1860-1864; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-fourth Congress (March 4, 1875-March 3, 1877); died in Indianapolis September 12, 1901.

AUGUSTUS N. MARTIN had a remarkably successful political career. He was born near Whitestown, Butler county, Pennsylvania, March 23, 1847; attended the common schools and Witherspoon Institute, Butler, Pa., and was graduated from Eastman College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in February, 1867; enlisted July 3, 1863, in Company I, Fifty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteer Militia, which assisted in the capture of General John Morgan's command; enlisted again February 22, 1865, in Company E, Seventy-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and served until discharged for disability, August 30, 1865; taught school; read law in Bluffton in 1869; was admitted to the bar in 1870; member of the Indiana House of Representatives in 1875; elected Reporter of the Supreme Court of Indiana in 1876 and served four years; unsuccessful candidate for re-election in 1880; resided in Austin, Texas, 1881-1883; returned to Bluffton, Ind., in 1883; elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-first, Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses (March 4, 1889-March 3, 1895); resumed the practice of law in Bluffton until his death, in the Soldiers' Home Hospital, Marion, July 11, 1901.

BENONI S. FULLER was for many years a safe and discreet leader in southern Indiana. He was born in Warrick county, Indiana, November 13, 1825; attended the common schools and taught school; sheriff in 1856 and 1858; member of the State House of Representatives, 1866-1868; served in the State Senate, 1862, 1870 and 1872; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses (March 4, 1875-March 3, 1879). He died in Boonville, Ind., April 14, 1903.

ROBERT LOWRY, for more than a half century an influential, active, energetic and sagacious leader of Democratic forces in Indiana, was born in Killeigh, county Down, Ireland, in 1822; moved to Rochester, N. Y.; instructed in private schools and had partial academic course; librarian of Rochester atheneum and Young Men's association; studied law; moved to Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1843; city recorder; was admitted to the bar and commenced practice in Goshen, Ind., in 1846; appointed circuit judge in 1852; president of the Democratic State convention and delegate to the Democratic national convention of 1860; elected circuit judge for six years in 1864; re-elected in 1870; delegate to the Democratic national convention of 1872; resigned the circuit judgeship in January, 1875; judge of the superior court; elected the first president of the Indiana State Bar Association in July, 1879; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses (March 4, 1883-March 3, 1887); defeated for re-election in 1886; resumed the practice of law; died in Fort Wayne, January 27, 1904.

CAPT. WILLIAM R. MYERS was for years a conspicuous figure in Indiana politics. He attracted attention by his remarkable race for Congress in 1878, resulting in his triumphant election. By reason of his eloquence of speech he was repeatedly placed on the State ticket—once for Lieutenant-Governor and four times for Secretary of State. He experienced both the sweets of success and the bitter of defeat. All in all he had an exceptional career—one denoting unusual energy and perseverance. He was born in Clinton county, Ohio, June 12, 1836; moved with his parents to Madison county, Indiana, October, 1848; attended the common schools; learned the painter's trade; taught in the common schools; enlisted in Company G, Forty-seventh Indiana Volunteers as a private; was promoted to orderly sergeant, second lieutenant, first lieutenant, and captain; served four years and three months; elected county surveyor of Madison county in 1858; after returning from the army, taught school; studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1871; superintendent of the public schools of Anderson from 1868 to 1869; served as a member of the school board of Anderson; elected three times as Secretary of State—1882, 1884, 1892; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-sixth Congress (March 4, 1879-March 3, 1881); died at Anderson April 18, 1907.

JOHN H. O'NEALL had all the characteristics of a dyed-in-the-wool Hoosier Democrat—earnest, ardent, enthusiastic. He was born in Newberry, S. C., October 30, 1837; attended country schools and was graduated from the Indiana State University in 1862; read law and was admitted to the bar; was graduated from the law department of Michigan University in 1864; located in Washington, Ind., the same year; represented Daviess county in the State Legislature in 1866; appointed prosecuting attorney for the eleventh judicial circuit in 1873; elected to the office in 1874, but resigned before his term was completed; elected as a Democrat to the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses (March 4, 1887-March 3, 1891); resumed the practice of law in Washington, Ind.; died there July 15, 1907.

JAMES MURDOCK, unassuming and unpretentious, had in his make-up the elements of genuine greatness. He had brain power of extraordinary strength and vigor. His grasp of business affairs bordered on the marvelous. In an instant he was able to distinguish the feasible from the impracticable. It is these qualities, this rare gift, that made him a factor in the commonwealth of his adoption. Men of note and distinction, men high in State affairs, in trade and industry, in politics and in finance, sought not alone his advice, but engaged him to do that which they were not certain of being able to do themselves. It is this that gave him prestige; it was the reward of native talent and genius that lifted him into well-earned affluence. There was no such thing as ease or rest for him while a task was to be performed, a work to be done. The greater part of his life was spent at Lafayette. The people had confidence in him; the electorate of Tippecanoe county made him sheriff in spite of the fact that the majority was politically hostile to him. When business capacity entered first into consideration in providing for the filling of the office of warden of the Northern prison, James Murdock was intuitively chosen. He might have had other official positions, but he did not crave them. His steadily growing business interests required his attention, and they were given it. As a result he acquired land, built up financial institutions, constructed railways, supplied progressive towns and cities with gas and electricity, and in various ways contributed to the development, growth and prosperity of his beloved Indiana. Physically robust, the strain upon his energies made gradual but steady inroads on his vitality. His health gradually gave way. He died at his hospitable home in Lafayette, November 28, 1908. The announcement of his passing cast a gloom over innumerable households throughout the State. For fully a quarter of a century he wielded powerful influence in political, commercial, industrial and financial circles. The accumulation of wealth made him neither arrogant nor sordidly selfish. He found pleasure and satisfaction in being helpful to others. Starting life in America with little more than will-power and determination, he demonstrated that this is indeed a land of opportunity and that accident of birth has but little to do with the utilization thereof. It is the man's capability and energy that count and determine. The secret of James Murdock's success in life was that he understood the direction of forces.

THOMAS HAMMOND had much to do with the commercial and industrial development of northwestern Indiana. He was born February 27, 1843, in Fitchburg, Mass.; attended the common schools; a carpenter and contractor until twenty-one years of age; moved to Detroit, Mich., and engaged in the packing-house business; twelve years later moved to Hammond, Ind., and assisted in the establishment of the dressed-beef industry for which that city is noted; elected mayor of Hammond in the spring of 1888, and twice re-elected; elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-third Congress (March 4, 1893-March 3, 1895); died in Hammond September 21, 1909.

WALPOLE G. COLERICK was of a distinguished family, every male member of which had actively enlisted in political engagements and contests. Walpole was born in Fort Wayne, Ind., August 1, 1845; lawyer by profession; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses (March 4, 1879-March 3, 1883); resumed the practice of law in Fort Wayne until his death, January 11, 1911.

JONAS G. HOWARD had a successful career, politically and professionally. He was born in Floyd county, Indiana, May 22, 1825; attended Asbury College, Greencastle, Ind.; was graduated in law from the State University in Bloomington, Ind., in 1851; practiced in Clark county; elected to the State Legislature in 1862 and 1864; presidential-elect on the Seymour and Blair ticket in 1868; again elector in the Tilden and Hendricks campaign in 1876; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses (March 4, 1885-March 3, 1889); returned to Jeffersonville, Ind., where he resumed the practice of law; died at that place October 5, 1911.

JOHN JAY KLEINER, for a number of years was very much in evidence in southern Indiana. He was born in West Hanover, Pa., February 8, 1845; manufacturer and dealer in hardwood lumber; enlisted in Company G, Eighty-sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry from June 20, 1863, to February 10, 1864; resided in Woodworth, Ohio, 1864-1867; moved to Evansville, Ind., in 1867; member of the city council of Evansville in 1873; mayor 1874-1880; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses (March 4, 1883-March 3, 1887); died in Takoma Park, Md., April 8, 1911.

JAMES W. FRENCH, for several years publisher of the Lafayette Morning Journal, then Democratic, became the victim of a sad ending of a once bright career, in Archer City, Texas, in the month of March, 1915. Meager reports of the distressing event furnished this information: An aged man who gave his name as J. W. French applied at a ranch near Archer City a few weeks ago for work. He said he was in destitute circumstances and was willing to work for his board. He was given employment. He was thrown from a wagon March 17 and killed. From papers in his pocket it was learned that his former home was Mt. Vernon, Posey county, Indiana; that he had been prominent in politics in that State, having represented his district in the State Senate, and was for two years warden of the State penitentiary at Michigan City, and later warden of federal prison at Leavenworth, Kan. Among the papers were letters from Secretary of State Bryan, written many years ago, which showed that the two men were college classmates.

JOHN E. LAMB was professionally and politically a product of the law office of Daniel W. Voorhees, easily the kindest and most big-hearted politician of his day and generation. He was born in Terre Haute, December 26, 1852; attended the common schools and was graduated from the Terre Haute high school; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1873 and commenced practice in Terre Haute; prosecuting attorney of the fourteenth judicial circuit; candidate for presidential elector on the Democratic ticket; elected as a Democrat to the Forty-eighth Congress (March 4, 1883-March 3, 1885); delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1892, 1896, 1904 and 1908; a practicing attorney in Terre Haute; died there in 1915.

COL. COURTLAND C. MATSON, Democratic nominee for Governor of Indiana in 1888, former member of Congress from the Fifth Indiana District and later on State Tax Commissioner by appointment of Governor Marshall, died in Chicago September 4, 1915. Burial at his former home, Greencastle, Ind. Colonel Matson died at the home of his son, Rees Matson, with whom he had lived for one year. His right arm was amputated below the elbow in February because of tubercular infection, and his health had been failing from that time on. Besides the son, Rees, he is survived by a daughter, Mrs. Charles Walter Brown of Chicago, and another son, Smith C. Matson of Ardmore, Okla. Colonel Matson was born April 25, 1841, at Brookville, Ind. His study at Asbury College was interrupted by the civil war, when he enlisted with the Asbury Guards. When Lee surrendered Matson was lieutenant-colonel of the Seventy-first Regiment, Indiana Volunteers, and when the war ended he was a colonel. Many years ago Colonel Matson was a law partner of his father, John A. Matson, and Solomon Claypool, in Greencastle. In 1888 he was the Democratic nominee for Governor, but was defeated by Alvin P. Hovey. He was a representative in Congress for four consecutive terms and in 1909 was appointed to the State Tax Commission by Governor Marshall.

MAJOR GEORGE E. FINNEY, eighty-three years old, editor and owner of the Democrat, published at Martinsville, died at his home in that place on the night of April 13, 1916, following an illness of several weeks. In all he had been in the newspaper business for sixty-seven years. He was editor of the Martinsville Democrat for twenty-one years and directed the paper until he was stricken. Before locating in Martinsville, Major Finney lived at Columbus, Ind., where he published a newspaper and, under the Cleveland administration, was postmaster. He served four years in the civil war as a member of the Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers, being adjutant of the regiment. At the time of his passing he was survived by the widow and four children—Mrs. H. C. Piehl of Inkster, N. D., and Miss Dena, Frank and Fred Finney of Martinsville. Major Finney was a Democrat of the old school. Faddism had in him a vigorous, unrelenting, but always manly foe; genuine Democracy a steadfast, able and undaunted champion.

JUDGE TIMOTHY E. HOWARD, soldier, professor, legislator, jurist and author, was a native of Michigan. He served creditably in the Union army; located in South Bend after the war and resided there until the time of his death. He was elected clerk of St. Joseph county, served repeatedly as a member of the Common Council of South Bend, became that body's attorney, was elected to the State Senate in 1886, and in 1892 chosen a member of the Supreme Court of the State. All of these positions he filled ably and conscientiously. In recognition of his literary ability he was honored with a Laetare medal by Notre Dame University, of which he was one of the instructors for many years. He was a man of profound learning, a clear thinker, and an accomplished writer. Much exceedingly valuable literature emanated from his gifted pen. Politically he always was an ardent Democrat. A political revolution prevented his re-election to the supreme bench in 1898. In addition to political and judicial offices he was for many years connected with the Northern Indiana Historical Society and with Auten Post, No. 8, G. A. R. His death resulted from uræmic poisoning and occurred July 9, 1916. He was seventy-nine years of age January 27, and is survived by his widow, four daughters, two sons, and a brother.

JUDGE RICHARD K. ERWIN, Chief Justice of the Indiana Supreme Court, died early on the 5th day of October, 1917, at a hospital in the city of Fort Wayne, following an illness of several weeks. Judge Erwin was fifty-seven years of age. He was born in Adams county, Indiana, the son of David Erwin, one of the pioneers of the section, July 11, 1860. His first law partner was J. Fred France, later Clerk of the State Supreme Court. He served as a member of the State Legislature, as Prosecutor of Adams county, as Judge of the Circuit Court of Adams county and was elected to the State Supreme Court in 1910 and at the time of his death was Chief Justice, by virtue of the fact that he was the senior member of the court. While Prosecutor he lost two cases, which were carried to the State Supreme Court and while Circuit Judge only two of his decisions were reversed by the Appellate Court and none by the Supreme Court. Judge Erwin was married to Miss Luella A. Wass of Monroeville in 1883. He became a resident of Fort Wayne in 1908, where he resided at the time of his death.

In taking a retrospective view of the past half century the names of many Democrats, in their day prominent in the councils of the party, are brought to mind. All of these, as I understand the matter, are to have due attention in the county histories, supplementary to this volume. Having been personally acquainted with many of these, I wish it were possible for me to pay them deserved tribute. They richly deserve being thus remembered. Coming within this category I recall at the moment the names of such steadfast disciples of Jefferson, founder of American Democracy, as Judge Solomon Claypool, J. J. Bingham, John J. Cooper, J. M. Cropsey, Adolph Seidensticker, Elijah S. Alvord, John C. Shoemaker, James H. Rice, Colonel J. B. Maynard, Colonel B. C. Shaw and Albert Gall of Indianapolis; the knightly Major David F. Allen and Eli W. Brown of Frankfort; John R. Coffroth, John F. McHugh, John B. Ruger, John C. Dobelbower and Francis Johnson of Lafayette; Judge George V. Howk, Judge John H. Stotsenburg, James P. Applegate, John S. Davis, Josiah Gwin and Adam Heimberger of New Albany; General Levi Sparks and Dr. W. F. Sherrod of Jeffersonville; Patrick Shannon, William Mack, Samuel R. Hamil and John Beggs of Terre Haute; Bayless W. Hanna, J. M. Sellers and John Lee of Crawfordsville; Dr. T. Davenport, F. J. Zimmerman and John W. Nusbaum of Warsaw; Colonel Isaiah B. McDonald, S. P. Kaler and A. J. Douglas of Columbia City; Judge James L. Worden, Judge Allen Zollars, Colonel

Charles A. Zollinger, Martin V. B. Spencer, I. D. G. Nelson, P. S. O'Rourke, John D. Sarnighausen, Captain Chris Hettler, Oehmig Bird, Robert C. Bell, Charles A. Munson and Perry A. Randall of Fort Wayne; Mayor H. H. Walker and Harry Francis of Michigan City; Judge Daniel Noyes, H. E. Wadsworth, J. W. Broeffle, Judge Bradley, David Patton, John P. Early and Simon Wile of Laporte; Charles H. Reeve, Judge Horace Corbin, A. B. Capron, M. A. O. Packard and Daniel McDonald of Plymouth; David Hough, Eli B. Gerber and James E. McDonald of Ligonier; Valentine Zimmerman and Judge Isaiah Conner of Rochester; Thomas J. Wood of Crown Point; ex-Mayor David R. Leeper and Charles L. Goetz of South Bend, both of whom were of the salt of the earth; Colonel Charles Denby, Fred Lauenstein, John G. and George W. Shanklin, Dr. Muehlhausen and Colonel A. T. Whittlesey of Evansville; Henry S. Cauthorn, George E. Greene and F. W. Viehe of Vincennes; Murray T. Briggs and Ferdinand Bassler of Sullivan; Dr. A. S. Parker, Charles G. Aichele, Herman Krueger, N. B. Newnam and John Gappinger of Kendallville; Thomas C. Mays, William H. Dills and Major S. W. Sprott of Auburn; Miles Waterman, Freeman Kelley and General Lew J. Blair of Waterloo; Dr. George W. McConnell and Harman Freygang of Angola; Francis Henry and Andrew Ellison of Lagrange; Colonel M. B. Hascall, W. W. McVitty, W. A. Beane, the Gortners, John W. Egbert, Conrad Landgraver, Charles Fink and Joseph C. Beck of Goshen; O. H. Main, Colonel R. M. Johnson, Judge George T. Barney, O. D. Thompson, Captain William M. Barney and Harry Chester of Elkhart; Preston F. Miles of Milford; George W. Miles of Syracuse; Simon P. Sheerin, S. F. McFadden, D. D. Dykeman and Benjamin F. Louthain of Logansport; Harry Smith and Thomas S. Briscoe of Hartford City; Dr. W. D. H. Hunter of Lawrenceburg; Hugh

D. McMullen of Aurora; Judge D. S. Gooding, William Mitchell, Judge Charles G. Offut and Ephraim Marsh of Greenfield; Ernst H. Faut of New Palestine; Judge Alonzo Blair, Sr., Judge Glessner and W. Scott Ray of Shelbyville; Judge Wm. A. Bickle, Thomas J. Study and James Elder of Richmond; Samuel I. Anthony, Thomas J. Merrifield, DeFos Skinner, John Brodie, G. Bloch and Engelbert Zimmerman of Valparaiso. These sturdy Indiana Democrats constitute but a small fraction of the political forces with which it was my good fortune to be associated during the past fifty years. In thinking of these men and bringing to mind their sturdy qualities I aim to find comfort in the contemplation of the promise, hope and anticipation awakened by the outpouring of a brilliant American author's soul. "It cannot be," the brilliant George D. Prentice wrote in his palmiest days, "that earth is man's only abiding place. It cannot be that our life is a bubble cast by eternity to float a moment upon its waves and sink into nothingness. Else why is it that the high and glorious aspirations which leap like angels from the temple of our hearts are forever wandering unsatisfied? Why is it that the rainbow and cloud come over us with a beauty that is not of earth, and then pass off to leave us to muse on their loveliness? Why is it that the stars which hold their festival around the midnight throne are set above the grasp of our limited faculties, forever mocking us with their unapproachable glory? And finally, why is it that bright forms of human beauty are presented to our view and then taken from us, leaving the thousand streams of our affections to flow back in an Alpine torrent upon our hearts? There is a realm where the rainbow never fades; where the stars will be spread out before us like the islands that slumber on the ocean, and where the beautiful beings which pass before us like shadows will stay forever in our presence."

I have fought a good fight. I have often faltered, but I have kept up the race. I have been besieged all my life with doubts, but I have kept my faith. I look forward to the Great Adventure which cannot now be far off, with awe, but not with apprehension. I enjoy my work, my home, my friends, my life—I shall be sorry to part with them. But always I have stood in the bow looking forward with hopeful anticipation to the life before me. When the time comes for my embarkation and I put out to sea, I think I shall still be standing in the bow looking forward with eager curiosity and glad hopefulness to the new world to which the unknown voyage will bring me.—Dr. Lyman Abbott.

HISTORIC NAMES OF INDIANA COUNTIES

INDICATIVE OF APPRECIATION OF PATRIOTIC DEEDS OR EPOCH-MAKING EVENTS

(By Carl Schurz Lowden, in Indianapolis Star.)

SOLDIERS are early risers, not so much by their own nature as by the character of their trade or occupation; but the little army of William Henry Harrison all arose at 4 o'clock on the morning of the seventh day of November, 1811. Tecumseh and his Indian warriors, whose number is estimated at one thousand, descended upon the seven hundred pioneers, who were surprised by but not unready for the sudden and terrific onslaught.

William Henry Harrison was a wily commander, accustomed to the exigencies of Indian warfare. For a night attack the order of his encampment was the order of strategic defense. Each man slept immediately opposite to his post. Single file was adopted in the formation of the troops in order to get as great an extension of the lines as possible.

Though taken by surprise and having sustained a severe loss in the first onslaught of the enemy, Harrison rallied his soldiers and maintained a steady resistance until daylight came. At this time he ordered a charge, and his troops thereupon drove Tecumseh's warriors into the swamps and broke up the attack of the enemy. The battle was won, with a loss of thirty-seven killed on the field, twenty-five mortally wounded and 126 wounded. Forty of the tribesmen met death in the conflict, and the number of their wounded has never been determined.

The next day the troops finished their task of destroying all that remained of Prophet's Town. The Indian warriors returned to their own tribes, as they had lost faith in their prophet and leader, the valorous Tecumseh. During the battle he had stood on a small piece of elevated ground and urged his warriors with a favorite war song. He assured them the victory would be easy and that the bullets of the white men would be made harmless by the Great Spirit.

From the date of the historic battle on the Tippecanoe and thenceforth the power of the Indian resistance in this State was definitely broken. Harrison's triumph figured in his ascendancy to the presidency of the United States. The county of Harrison in this State was named after the doughty commander and the county of Gibson drew its name from the man who was acting Governor during Harrison's absence in his campaigns against the Indian enemy.

The battle of Tippecanoe was far-reaching. It was of an epochal nature with reference to the formation of this State, and when the question of a name was considered the influence of the Indian resistance to the occupation of his country by the white man was so vivid that they commemorated it in the name of the State, which was christened Indiana.

A large number of officers were killed in the battle. Seven of these are remembered in the names of seven of the counties: White, Randolph, Owens, Daviess, Spencer, Warrick and Floyd. The man who had charge of the guides and spies in the Tippecanoe campaign was Touissant Dubois, a Frenchman, and the county of Dubois honors him with its name.

Other Indian warfare is responsible for the christening of six counties. Captain William Wells was a victim of the Fort Dearborn massacre. Samuel and Moses Grant of Kentucky gave up their lives in resisting the tribesmen. Major Fountain of Kentucky succumbed in the battle of the Maumee in 1790. Daniel Sullivan, a messenger of Captain Clark, who captured Vincennes, was killed while serving his captain in that capacity. Captain William Crawford was captured and burned at the stake in Ohio in 1782. Clark county was named in honor of the Captain Clark previously mentioned, who was a famous fighter and explorer.

Four counties received their christening from four Indian words. Miami is the name of an Indian tribe, and Tippecanoe is an Indian word, which means "at the great clearing." Delaware was also a tribal name. Ohio is an Iroquois word, meaning "beautiful river." Rivers and lakes figure in the naming of five counties. Lake gets its title from Lake Michigan, and the following four from rivers: St. Joseph, Elkhart, Vermilion and Wabash. The latter is a term of the red man for "white water."

In the names of its counties the State of Indiana honors twenty soldiers. Practically the whole of these had fought at one time or another against the tribesmen and had also participated actively in the war of the revolution. The remembered heroes of the struggle for independence are: General John Starke, Sergeant John Newton, Sergeant William Jasper, killed in the Savannah siege; General Francis Warren, General Israel Putnam, General Francis Marion, General "Mad Anthony" Wayne, General Daniel Morgan, General Nathaniel Greene and General Henry Knox.

Daniel Boone, the famous Kentucky pioneer and Indian fighter, gave his name to Boone county. General Zebulon M. Pike, the great explorer who discovered Pike's Peak, gave his name to Pike county. Other soldiers who figured in the christening of Indiana's counties are: Colonel William Whitley, Colonel William Allen of Kentucky, General T. A. Howard of Indiana, General Richard Montgomery, killed in the assault upon Quebec; Colonel Francis Vigo, General Jacob Brown, commander-in-chief of the United States army from 1821 to 1828; General Eleazer Ripley and Colonel John P. Martin.

Naval commanders are commemorated as follows: Commodore David Porter, who served in the civil war; Commodore Stephen Decatur; Captain James Lawrence, who fought on Lake Erie in 1812, and Commodore Hazard Perry. The names of four judges are in the list of Indiana counties: John Marshall, chief justice of the United States; Isaac Blackford, judge of the Indiana Supreme Court; John Johnson, judge of the Indiana Supreme Court, and Henry Vanderburg, who was judge of the first State court. Three signers of the Declaration of Independence (not named elsewhere, but who figured in the christening of the counties) are Samuel Huntington of Connecticut, Charles Carroll of Maryland and John Hancock, whose signature was so bold that he said the King would have no need for spectacles in deciphering it.

Early Governor of Indiana and the Governors of States which were admitted to the Union before our own State contributed ten names to the Hoosier counties. These are as follows: Noah Noble (Indiana), General Lewis Cass (Michigan), DeWitt Clinton (New York), John Jay (New York), William Hendricks (Indiana), General Isaac Shelby (Kentucky), Jonathan Jennings (Indiana), John Gibson (acting Governor of Indiana Territory), General Charles Scott (Kentucky) and General Thomas Posey (Indiana).

The roll of Presidents whose names honor Indiana counties numbers seven: John Quincy Adams, James Madison, James Monroe, George Washington, Andrew Jackson, Thomas Jefferson and William Henry Harrison. Nine counties bear the names of senators and statesmen: Senator Thomas H. Benton (Missouri), Senator John Tipton (Indiana), Alexander Hamilton, and Benjamin Parke (Indiana), Patrick Henry (Virginia), Henry Clay (Kentucky), Senator Joseph Bartholomew (Indiana), Benjamin Franklin, and General Henry Dearborn, President Jefferson's Secretary of War.

Rush county honors Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, and Fulton county pays homage to the inventor of the steamboat, Robert Fulton. Switzerland county was named in honor of the old country, and Orange got its title from a North Carolina county which commemorated William IV, prince of Orange. Union county was so called because it was made by a combination of sections of Fayette and Wayne counties.

The influence of foreign notables, some of whom took a residence in this country and became American citizens, is shown by the fact that seven of the State districts obtained their names from this and similar sources. Lagrange was the home of the Marquis de Lafayette. Baron von Steuben fought in the war of the revolution and Baron De Kalb sacrificed his life for American liberty in the same conflict. Kosciusko was a Polish patriot—likewise Count Casimir Pulaski. Fayette county obtained its title from the name of the French marquis previously mentioned. Laporte is a combination of two French words, meaning "the door" and signifying a plain bounded by mountains or forests.

And so it is that the names of our counties embrace the many years of Indian warfare, the struggle of the colonies for independence, and the war of 1812 against Great Britain. The name of each county connotes certain events in which the citizens should have a just pride and which should become, either indirectly or directly, a part of the county's tradition and history.

AFTER EIGHT YEARS OF ADVERSITY

REPUBLICAN SUPREMACY IS RESTORED IN INDIANA

THE service rendered the Indiana Democracy by Governor Hanly, resulting in the election of three of the Democratic nominees on the State ticket of 1908, and the much larger service rendered by Theodore Roosevelt in splitting the Republican party in two in the year of our Lord 1912, ceased to be operative in 1916. By dint of persistent and well-directed effort on the part of sagacious leaders, the process of eliminating the Progressive party met with (to them) a pleasing reward in the State of Indiana. The chief credit from a party point of view for bringing about this state of affairs belongs to James P. Goodrich, William H. Hays and Charles W. Fairbanks. In good season these leaders exerted themselves to the utmost to conciliate the warring elements. And they kept at it as long as the task in hand required such application of conciliatory effort. Nowhere in the Union was there done more effective work in this particular than in the State of Indiana.

Both the Democratic and the Republican State tickets were headed by experienced political leaders and adroit mixers. Goodrich had the advantage of a wider experience in political activity than that enjoyed by his Democratic competitor, Congressman J. A. M. Adair. The latter had for more than a decade devoted his time and attention mainly to his own district, while Goodrich had opportunity of taking in the entire State by serving several terms as State chairman and later on as a member of the Republican national committee. Both candidates enjoyed excellent reputations as men of affairs, both being interested in banking and real estate. Goodrich, at the time of making the gubernatorial race, probably had a more extensive personal acquaintance throughout the State than any other prominent figure in Indiana politics. It is the consensus of opinion that no State in the Union had a better-working party machinery than that operated for more than four years by its resourceful, alert and sagacious chairman, W. H. Hays. Had he been at the head of the Republican national committee, instead of a provincial New Yorker, some very serious blunders would surely have been avoided.

The net outcome of the 1916 contest in Indiana was the election of fifteen Hughes and Fairbanks electors, the gain of two United States Senators, the election of nine of the thirteen members of Congress, the election of the entire State ticket, headed by James P. Goodrich, and securing a decisive majority in the lower house of the General Assembly, the Senate being made a tie. The figures in detail make this illuminating showing:

It will be observed that the vote for presidential electors is 12,221 larger than that for Governor, and 14,184 larger than that for Lieutenant-Governor. Much of this difference is due to the persistence with which some thousands of voters, educated under the original Australian ballot law, adhere to the practice of marking the head of the ticket, under the delusion that by so doing they are giving their vote to the entire ticket. In the figures indicating the vote for the several presidential nominees the votes cast for the respective heads of the tickets are invariably given. On all presidential tickets the electors below the one first named invariably polled fewer votes than the "head of the ticket." Of course, there are some voters who are content with voting for President only. Happily there are not many of these.

Though Hughes received 3,174 more votes than Goodrich, the Hughes plurality is only 6,942, while Goodrich's lead over Adair is 12,771. Adair ran 9,003 votes behind the first man on the Wilson and Marshall electoral ticket. There was quite a difference in the number of votes cast for the candidates on the various electoral tickets. If all voters understood the real purpose of the electoral system they would quit such foolishness and cast their ballots for the entire electoral ticket, regardless of the individuals named thereon. The voter who favored Wilson or Hughes at the 1916 election ought to have voted for all of the fifteen electors on the respective tickets. That would have been in full accord with the aim and purpose of the electoral system.

It will be observed that there is a difference of only eleven in the vote for the two Democratic nominees for United States Senator—John W. Kern and Thomas Taggart. The difference in the votes for New and Watson is 1,896 in favor of New.

CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION.

The effect of inducing the Republicans and the Progressives to get together is made strikingly apparent by the vastly changed make-up of the Indiana delegation in Congress. Instead of electing only two, as in 1914, they succeeded in electing nine of the thirteen. The Republicans chosen at this election are:

| District. | Plurality. |
|----------------------------------|------------|
| Second—Oscar E. Bland..... | 1,005 |
| Fifth—Everett Sanders..... | 692 |
| Sixth—Daniel W. Comstock..... | 978 |

| Eleventh—Milton Kraus..... | 428 |
| Twelfth—Louis Wm. Fairfield..... | 3,170 |
| Total pluralities..... | 26,467 |

On the vote for members of Congress in the thirteen districts the Republican net plurality is 20,774.

The four Democrats and their pluralities are:

| | |
|-----------------------------------|-------|
| First—George F. Denton..... | 323 |
| Third—William E. Cox..... | 2,907 |
| Fourth—Lincoln Dixon..... | 2,172 |
| Thirteenth—Henry A. Barnhart..... | 291 |

Total pluralities..... 5,693

The unsuccessful Democratic candidates were: William A. Cullop in the Second; Ralph W. Moss in the Fifth; Finley H. Gray in the Sixth; Chalmer Schlosser in the Seventh (Indianapolis); Jacob F. Denny in the Eighth; David F. Maish in the Ninth; George E. Hershman in the Tenth; George W. Rauch in the Eleventh; Cyrus Cline in the Twelfth. Of these nine Cullop, Moss, Gray, Rauch and Cline were candidates for re-election.

The Progressives had congressional nominees in all the thirteen districts. Their vote was 285 in the First; 304 in the Second; 134 in the Third; 677 in the Fourth; 1,536 in the Fifth; 344 in the Sixth; 229 in the Seventh; 332 in the Eighth; 1,425 in the Ninth; 471 in the Tenth; 2,350 in the Eleventh; 942 in the Twelfth; 1,476 in the Thirteenth. The Prohibitionists did not have candidates for Congress in all the districts.

The Socialists made a pretty fair showing in most of the congressional districts. In the Fifth (Terre Haute) district they gave Eugene V. Debs 8,866 votes. In the Second district their vote reached 2,800. Only in one other district their vote exceeded 2,000. In several districts they had an excess of 1,000.

In the General Assembly of 1917 there were, in the Senate, 25 Democrats and 25 Republicans; in the House, 36 Democrats to 64 Republicans.

Among those who "suffered defeat" at this election was one who surely lost no sleep and shed no tears over the result in so far as it affected him personally. He was averse to making the race. His appointment by Governor Ralston amply gratified his ambition. Down at French Lick he has an establishment, a recreation and health resort, that stands as a monument to his foresight, constructive ability, genius, perseverance and tact. No more clever, genial or versatile individual breathes the atmosphere of Indiana. His name is Thomas Taggart and his chief aim in life has been to be a benefactor of his fellow-men.

RE-ELECTION OF WOODROW WILSON IN 1916

REMARKABLE CAMPAIGN AND RESULT IN THE POLITICAL HISTORY OF THE COUNTRY

IN several respects the presidential campaign of 1916 was the most bewildering in the annals of American politics. With a view to creating the impression that the Republicans, notwithstanding the reverse of 1912, still considered themselves the leading party and therefore expected to take the lead in making nominations, they held their convention in the month of June in the city of Chicago. For reasons that do not require analysis or explanation the Democrats did not demur to this presumption, but graciously acquiesced in this bold assertion of their privilege to precede. So they fixed the time for holding their convention in the month of July, selecting St. Louis as their place for coming together and doing business. The Democrats knew weeks and months before the convention was held as to who their nominee would be. It was foreordained that in defiance of the one-term plank, caused by Mr. Bryan to be inserted in the platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912, the St. Louis ticket would consist of Woodrow Wilson and Thomas R. Marshall as certain as was the final decision at the wind-up four years prior. There was a possibility of some squabbling in committee over the wording of the platform, but that disturbed no one's equanimity. It was quite different with the Republicans. In their ranks it was all uncertainty, doubt and—fear. The shaping of the platform required considerable skill, but the task of nominating a presidential ticket that would command the support of both Republicans and Progressives was properly adjudged a task that would test to the utmost the highest skill lodged in the craniums of the party's shrewdest managers and leaders. To tame the wild horses prancing in the Roosevelt convention hall required all the ingenuity possessed by the resourceful George W. Perkins. To keep in subjection the unruly tongue of T. R. himself must have required no little precaution and alertness down East. So all in all the Republican situation was critical from start to finish. And the problem was far from being solved by the nomination of Charles Evans Hughes and Charles Warren Fairbanks. The best thinking caps to be had for love or money were needed all the time. How to prevent T. R. from kicking the bucket over remained a constant source of deep concern to the very last. Never before in the history of all political parties was there a situation so critical as that hovering over the heads of the Republican campaign managers of 1916.

Judge Hughes himself managed to wiggle through the campaign without making more than two or three mistakes that actually deprived him of any considerable number of votes. The most serious of these blunders was made in California, from which danger-ground he should have stayed away entirely. That he did not exert himself to the utmost to prevent a band of ambitious and overly zealous New York women to start out on their millionaire wild goose chase in an aristocratic palace car train disclosed a shortcoming that at the time caused in the minds of his real friends grave apprehension. This apprehension was more than confirmed as time passed and reports came to headquarters.

On the night of the election the country labored under the impression that Woodrow Wilson had been defeated and Charles E. Hughes triumphantly elected. The eastern strongholds, with their enormous strength in the electoral college, had so decreed. In "extras" issued after the counting of millions of ballots Democratic papers vied with their Republican contemporaries in proclaiming the triumphant election of Judge Hughes and editorially reciting the causes that brought about such a decision. Later returns from other parts of the Union upset this previousness and cast a doubt over the actual result. Not until the close vote of California was fully determined, two weeks after election, did it become certain as to who was really elected. That the victors were Woodrow Wilson and Thomas R. Marshall is incon- testably established by this tabular exhibit:

It will be observed that Wilson carried thirty and Hughes eighteen of the forty-eight States.

|-----------------------------|------------|
| Total vote in United States | 18,495,901 |
| Wilson and Marshall | 9,116,473 |
| Hughes and Fairbanks | 8,543,368 |
| Benson, Socialist | 576,974 |
| Hanly, Prohibitionist | 213,970 |
| Reimer, Social Laborite | 12,860 |

The Prohibitionists had counted on at least a million votes. Their ticket polled less than half as many votes as were cast for the Socialist ticket. In the election of members of Congress the Republicans gained largely. In the present Congress their strength in the House is 216 as against 210 Democrats and 9 Independents. Notwithstanding this, the Democrats were enabled at the opening of the special session to organize the House by re-electing Champ Clark to the speakership with the aid of Independents and some Republicans. In the preceding House the Democrats had 231 members, the Republicans 193, and the Independents 19. In the Senate there were 39 Republicans to 56 Democrats in 1915 to 1917. In the present Senate there are 42 Republicans and 53 Democrats.

Analysis of these tabular exhibits reveal some remarkable variations in the exercise of the elective franchise by the sovereigns of the realm. These variations unerringly lead to the conclusion that Judge Hughes was either an exceedingly poor vote-getter or that Woodrow Wilson's reelection was deemed a national necessity. Not a single State normally or dependably Democratic gave its electoral vote to Judge Hughes, although politically changeable commonwealths like Delaware, Indiana and New York placed themselves decisively in the Hughes column. New Jersey, in years gone by up to 1896, was reliably Democratic, but ceased to be such when free silver was made the "paramount issue." There isn't any question as to California, Idaho, Kansas, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Utah, Washington and Wyoming being normally Republican States, yet all of them, with their 74 electoral votes, declared themselves in favor of Wilson and Marshall. Subtracting these 74 from Wilson's 277 votes in the electoral college and adding them to the Hughes total would have made the electoral vote stand thus: Hughes and Fairbanks, 328; Wilson and Marshall, 203. As compared with the votes cast for heads of Republican State tickets the Hughes vote was, using round numbers only, 2,000 less in Connecticut, 6,000 less in Indiana, 39,000 less in Iowa, 5,000 less in Maine, 55,000 less in Michigan, 67,000 less in Minnesota, 17,000 less in New Jersey, 101,000 less in New York, 20,000 less in Oregon, 49,000 less in Pennsylvania, 18,000 less in South Dakota, 15,000 less in Vermont, 3,000 less in West Virginia, 88,000 less in Wisconsin. While Wilson led Hughes by 3,733 votes in California, the Republican plurality reached 296,816. Rhode Island elected a Democratic United States Senator by 7,837, mainly on account of the unpopularity of the Republican nominee with the labor element. While Colorado gave Wilson over 76,000, the Democratic State nominee averaged only 17,000. Wilson carried Maryland by over 21,000, yet the Republicans on State nominees had a lead of 3,922. A complete analysis of the voting in all the States reveals the astounding fact that while Wilson stands credited with a plurality of 573,105, the plurality of Republican State candidates is 573,391. To this the two States of California and Kansas alone contributed nearly a half million. No such difference, or discrepancy, can be found in the returns of any preceding presidential contest. It shows plainly and unmistakably that the independent voter in this country is very much in evidence and that party managers will do well to take notice of the importance and significance thereof.

Upon the outcome in California depended the final settlement as to whether Wilson or Hughes had carried the day. The suspense caused by the fluctuations in the returns, as slowly gathered and tabulated, caused no little apprehension in the minds of those who had some knowledge of the Tilden-Hayes controversy in 1876-7. That "celebrated case" furnished a subject for numerous historical reviews and varying comment upon the final unique decision. As Tilden himself was largely responsible for popular acquiescence in a most unrighteous and iniquitous decision by the electoral commission, that there might be no civil conflict so shortly after the final suppression of the rebellion in 1865, so thoughtful citizens of all parties earnestly hoped and prayed that there might be no menacing controversy over the exceedingly close vote in the States of New Hampshire, Minnesota and California. The country was in no condition to undergo such a strain. Hence the sincere general rejoicing when announcement of the undisputed settlement of the election of 1916 quieted the nerves of millions of order-loving American sovereigns.

So far as campaign management was concerned there is but little doubt that the Democrats in this respect had a decided advantage over the Republicans. At Republican headquarters there was more or less friction throughout the campaign. Any political organization subjectively dominated by New York influences is certain to be grievously hampered by narrowness, littleness, imbecility and insufferable arrogance. The main thought of the average New York "politician," irremediably inoculated with every form of sordidness, instinctively places a money consideration on pretty near everything connected with a political campaign. A striking illustration of this characteristic was furnished way back in the '60's, when the New York delegation to the Republican presidential convention sought to secure the nomination of William H. Seward to the highest office in the gift of the nation. The leader of this delegation was Thurlow Weed, an adroit but thoroughly unscrupulous political manipulator. Carl Schurz, a delegate-at-large from Wisconsin, was an ardent supporter of Seward on account of his pronounced views on the slavery question. In the course of a conference held in the interest of Seward, his spokesman, Thurlow Weed, gave especial emphasis to the alluring certainty of a huge campaign fund being raised in the East to conduct the campaign in case Seward were made the standard-bearer of the young party. Those who have ever been close to Carl Schurz can readily imagine what sort of impression this talk made upon the sensitive mind of that fervent champion of high political ideals and of human emancipation. Instead of exalting the glorious cause of freedom, Weed thought and talked wholly of a prospective huge corruption fund wherewith to influence the action of American freemen. Little wonder that Carl Schurz, burning with ardor to curb the slave power and to instill love of freedom into the minds and hearts of the electorate, left this conference with strange feelings as to the sentiments that guided leading spirits of the young party that four years prior had made its first entry in the political arena under the inspiring battle cry of Fremont and Freedom. Needless to say that, ardent Sewardite that he had been up to that time, the eloquent delegate from Wisconsin became easily reconciled to the nomination of that uncontaminated child of Nature, that lofty exemplification of unadulterated American simplicity and unalloyed patriotism, Abraham Lincoln.

About the first thing that engaged the attention of those who made their influence felt at Republican national headquarters was to raise a huge fund to determine the trend of the betting on Wall street—in other words, to "fix" the gambling on the prospective outcome of the contest for the election of the chief magistrate of the American republic. Stupendous sums were raised for this demoralizing and corrupting purpose. "Money talks," these assuming custodians of political wisdom and civic righteousness argued to themselves. It does, it does—unfortunately too volubly and too vociferously for the safeguarding of republican institutions. There is reason to believe that this flagrant and ostentatious flourishing of "filthy lucre" had much to do with creating the conviction in the minds of unpolluted voters in the Western States that if Wall street were so intent on the election of Hughes it would be the part of political wisdom and patriotism to vote for Woodrow Wilson. And, as the election figures show, this was done, very extensively at that. Western voters have a very poor opinion of Eastern moneybags, many of whom married off their vain daughters to sillipated, decrepit bearers of royal titles. These moneybags are mighty unsafe disseminators of cherished democratic ideas and still less dependable combatants of hated autocracy. Besides, the well-known fact that greedy, grasping cormorants were intent on plunging this country into the bloody war raging in Europe in order to make more secure their big loans to some of the belligerent powers served as a mighty incentive to Western freemen to vote for keeping in the White House for four years longer the man who up to that time had so successfully and so beneficently kept us out of war.

Chairman Vance C. McCormick displayed excellent judgment in the selection of campaign managers for the Western department, headquarters in Chicago. The men chosen to conduct the campaign in the Western States understood the aims and purposes of the inhabitants of those parts of the Union and governed themselves accordingly. There were no Burchards among the speakers sent out into those regions, hence no votes were made for the other side. To Colonel Bryan had very wisely been assigned nearly the entire debatable ground of the West. With his masterful oratory and the unbounded faith of the masses in the justice of the cause espoused by him—"Peace on earth, good will toward men"—a sentiment was aroused throughout the West that completely upset the plans and calculations of the plutocracy of the East. Colonel Bryan's appeals to the fathers and mothers in these Western States did not fall upon deaf ears, but sunk deep into the hearts of the good people, who in due course of time transformed the wild lands of the frontier into blooming gardens and prosperous farms. Colonel Bryan's speeches dove-tailed so nicely and so fittingly into the masterly convention speech of former Governor Martin H. Glynn of New York, that Democratic newspapers and speakers were at no time under the necessity of explaining anything away.

By far the ablest, soundest and most convincing speeches delivered on the Republican side of the House were those of former U. S. Senator Albert J. Beveridge. They were masterpieces of political oratory, well calculated to reach the understanding of voters who really were in quest of enlightenment as to the path of duty to be chosen in the final contest. Mr. Beveridge was enabled to present a strong case for the reason that he is splendidly equipped with a strong mind and a heart that beats tenderly for struggling humanity. Of all the speeches delivered by Theodore Roosevelt in favor of Hughes only the one made at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., seems to have proved effective as a vote maker. Every appearance of the ex-President on the rostrum caused the utmost nervousness at Republican headquarters.

THIS BLESSED LAND OF OURS

ITS GOVERNMENT WAS FOUNDED BY THE WISEST, NOBLEST, BRAVEST PATRIOTS KNOWN IN THE WORLD'S HIS-TORY—LET THEIR WORK BE PERPETUATED

THIS is a great country. Without indulging in bombast or braggadocio it may be asserted that, everything taken into account, it is the greatest country in the world. As to territory and population it is surpassed by Russia. In area it may be surpassed by Africa, Brazil and even Canada, but in point of extent, scope and adaptation to the subserving of human wants and requirements it stands unequalled and unsurpassed. Its natural resources are unbounded. Its climatic variations are unsurpassed. The fertility of its soil is prodigious. Its location affords in itself a mighty fortress for the protection of its millions of inhabitants. Its constitution is everywhere conceded to be a masterpiece of wise, far-seeing statesmanship. Its government has in every instance proved itself a safeguard against attacks from without or within. Its flag has come out of every onslaught unscathed and triumphant.

The manner in which the American republic was founded is comprehensively set forth in the opening chapter of this work. Therein may be found succinctly recited the many ups and downs of those engaged in the constructive work of the formative period and the innumerable obstacles encountered and overcome by the noble patriots who unselfishly consecrated themselves to the establishment in this part of the world of a government of, for and by the people.

Would that it might be said, truthfully, that all the people inhabiting the original colonies and later on the States of the newly-formed Union were honorable, upright, manly, patriotic. That, perhaps, would border closely on the seemingly impossible. Then, as now, there were sneaks, hypocrites and liars—vipers in human disguise—who did everything in their power to render more difficult the task of liberating the colonies from the British yoke of oppression. So bitter was life made for Washington, the father of his country, that he seriously contemplated resigning the chief magistracy of the young nation. The vile tongue of slander wagged so assiduously and viciously in denunciation of Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, that he often found his rich vocabulary inadequate for the expression of his contempt for the vile slanderers and maligners who vindictively pursued him throughout his useful, honorable and productive career.

But, nevertheless and notwithstanding, the young nation grew and prospered. Its growth was slow, but sound and steady. New territory was added and new States were formed and admitted into the Union from time to time. With this growth and development came wealth. And with the advent of this hitherto scarcely known element in American life came verification of the fears expressed by the Massachusetts statesman, sage and patriot, Samuel Adams, who, in 1789, said: "We have achieved a great liberty; we have wrought out a great constitution; but my only fear is that our people, who are now poor and simple and love liberty because they have made sacrifices for it, will after a while grow rich and will prefer their riches to their liberty." Corroborative of this are the words of Thomas Jefferson who, more than one hundred years ago, prophetically pictured large cities as being "pestilential to the morals, the health, and the liberties of men."

Wealth founded partly on landed estates and partly on the ownership of human flesh became arrogant and defiant. Like Oliver Twist, it constantly cried for more. Refusal to comply with these demands resulted in the country becoming involved in a gigantic war upon the election and inauguration as president of the United States of the kindest and most fair-minded American known in history—Abraham Lincoln. The struggle was a fierce one. It lasted more than four long, weary years. But it terminated in the triumph of the supremacy of the constitution and the vindication of the doctrine of an indissoluble Union of indestructible States.

That was a great, a glorious achievement. With the return to the avenues of industry and trade of the thousands upon thousands of sturdy veterans who had fought the battles of the war on both sides there was awakened a spirit of enterprise and thrift that was nowhere visible prior to and during the war. Industrial and commercial development made marvelous progress. Venturesomeness came alarmingly in sight. As a natural sequence a destructive panic broke forth in 1873. It smashed supposedly firm and sound institutions right and left. Indescribable distress prevailed throughout the land. Not until toward 1879-'80 did its destructive effects wholly disappear, but again manifesting themselves keenly in 1883. Ten years later the country's commercial, financial and industrial foundations were shaken even more violently and disastrously than in 1873, for the reason that there was then so much more to be swept away by the irresistible force of the most destructive panic known in American history. Recovery did not ensue until the latter part of the past century. Still another visitation of a similar character came upon the country in 1907, commonly known as the Bankers' Panic. Its ravages swept away ruthlessly and pitilessly an undeterminable number of private fortunes, leaving wholly out of consideration the misery caused in the humbler walks of life.

Within the period of a third of a century the American people underwent the trials and tribulations of four panics, each of them shaking the foundation of our industrial, financial and commercial system. Each of these could have been avoided had moderation in the pursuit of Mammon prevailed and had common sense and common prudence been permitted to command sway. As if experiences of this sort cut no figure whatsoever and made no impression upon the nation, there was introduced a feature of exploitation that in point of greed and avarice vastly eclipsed all the ingenuity that had previously brought about four paralyzing panics. This method for piling up colossal fortunes on the one hand and curtailing opportunity for legitimate accumulation on the other is known as the Trust system. Its immediate effect has been the creation of thousands of millionaires and the concentration of incalculable wealth in the hands of a very small per cent. of the aggregate population. What such a state of affairs begets does not call for particularization. Those in pursuit of knowledge and enlightenment with reference to such matters can enrich their minds with explicit information by studying the cause and effect of the rise and fall of ancient republics and empires and by familiarizing themselves with the horrors incident to the French Revolution.

Let these facts be brought under earnest contemplation and serious meditation. No country can long endure when the rich are constantly growing richer and the poor poorer and more numerous. Abnormally acquired riches invariably lead to profligacy, and profligacy leads to vice, and vice to crime. Experience has amply demonstrated that advances in wages are invariably followed by exaction from the earnings of wage workers that effectually neutralize whatever gain may have been made in dollars and cents. Higher rents, higher taxes, higher foodstuffs and higher commodities inexorably swallow up whatever advance in wages may have been granted or forced. This truism is strikingly illustrated at the national capital where, when members of Congress voted themselves an increase of 50 per cent. in their salaries, the hotels, restaurants, landlords, etc., immediately put up prices until the additional $2,500 were almost, if not entirely, absorbed.

Everybody understands nowadays that a spirit of discontent and unrest permeates every industrial center in the land, big or little. Strikes, somewhere, are of almost daily occurrence. Robberies have become so frequent as to have ceased to attract the attention of newspaper readers. Bankers and other custodians of deposited funds are in constant dread of being held up at the point of a revolver. Cold-blooded murders are of more frequent occurrence in the United States than in any other part of the civilized world. Our asylums for the insane, feeble-minded and other defectives are everywhere filled to overflowing. Imbecility is painfully in evidence even in localities where better conditions might reasonably be expected to prevail.

And yet the portrayal of these defects, deficiencies and evils ought not to wholly dishearten, discourage and unnerve those of stout heart and sound mind. Assuming such still to be in the ascendancy, taking the country in its entirety, the mere pointing out of these shortcomings and evils ought to arouse a spirit of determination and resoluteness to buckle on the armor and fight for betterment everywhere. Don't permit the fallacious notion to find lodgment in the public mind that salvation can be attained only under the leadership of some one of strong national character to whose bugle blast there is to be spontaneous response from every quarter in the republic. That sort of thing was tried on in 1912, when Theodore Roosevelt essayed to lead the nation from political demoralization and degeneracy into the realm of civic righteousness. A glorious opportunity was presented him to render the country an inestimable service. But he failed ignominiously to meet intelligent popular expectation. Instead of proving himself a trustworthy leader discreetly to guide the people out of the wilderness he by easy degrees degenerated into much more of a ranter than an effective champion of right and justice. His coarse, vindictive and brutal attacks upon men in public and private life, in various instances incomparably his superiors in point of rectitude of conduct and integrity of purpose, have lowered him immeasurably in the estimate of thousands upon thousands who unstintedly sounded his praise when and while engaged in commendable work for governmental and political reform and who would gladly have continued their support and unstinted praise had he deported himself in a manner worthy of being recognized as a fit leader of men and women who have a decent regard for the proprieties and civilities of orderly society.

What this country needs in order to place it in proper condition for effectively meeting every emergency is organized effort in every village and hamlet, town and city to create a spirit of civic righteousness and erect higher standards of political activity. In various particulars political campaigns have been abominations rather than means and methods of enlightenment of our voting element. Tirades of boorish abuse of "the other side" have in entirety too many instances been much more in vogue than calm discussion of pending issues to be decided by appeal to rational popular judgment. Reform of the public press is just now perhaps the most urgent necessity to which attention should be directed. We have in this country entirely too many publications controlled and conducted by individuals who have no sort of conception of the science of government, the needs of the people, equitable taxation, and civic righteousness. There are too many persons connected with the public press who look upon Truth, Fairness and Justice as wholly unnecessary, if not undesirable, elements in the conduct of a newspaper. No real reform in this particular need be looked for until the people in every locality where such publications exist muster up sufficient courage to insist on management that will insure the community that to which it is rightfully and beneficently entitled. What is commonly known as the metropolitan press in the main stands thoroughly discredited. With some honorable exceptions these papers have no regard whatever for truth, justice or honor. To create a sensation, to have their product made the subject of vehement comment or boisterous discussion, is apparently their chief aim and object. This prostitution of the press has to some extent been going on for years and years. During the earlier part of my newspaper career I was for a time local correspondent for some of these metropolitan papers. As a chronicler of current events I sent in reports of actual occurrences only. In the course of some correspondence with the management I was given to understand that rigid adherence to actual facts was not in conformity with the prevailing policy of these publications. "We want something that excites and causes talk," was the sly hint. In reply I stated that I had neither the time nor the inclination to pander to sensationalism, therefore asked to be relieved of further service as correspondent. Of the utter lack of integrity of some of these metropolitan oracles there is abundance of proof. A conspicuous case in point is this: A New York paper persistently insisted on having Judge Alton B. Parker made the Democratic presidential nominee in 1904. Its editorial columns fairly teemed with arguments and pleas for Parker's selection by the St. Louis convention. As soon as this nomination had been actually effected, imperative demand was made upon the national committee that all Democratic papers in the United States be supplied with a colored picture of the Parker family for each and every one of their readers. This picture, supplied by the million, was furnished by the very paper that for months and months had so persistently urged upon the party Judge Parker's nomination. How big a profit accrued to that mercenary publication I am not in position to state. That it was not inconsiderable may be inferred from the fact that when the head of this dictatorial sheet passed away his estate was appraised at $20,000,000. For years, by this or that cunning process, Democratic papers throughout the country were adroitly utilized to boost by gratuitous advertising the circulation of that unscrupulous political oracle.

Painstaking readers of metropolitan papers will have observed that about one-third of the alleged news printed in their columns is fiction, pure and simple. If these fabrications were confined to alleged ordinary occurrences not much harm might result from such professional lying, but in many instances impressions are created that even subsequent refutation cannot undo. The poison thus scattered from day to day cannot be neutralized or made harmless by subsequent retraction, refutation or denial.

Any well-directed effort to safeguard and perpetuate free American institutions must be preceded by placing control of the press in the hands of men of sense, honesty and integrity, known as such to the community in which the paper is published. It ought and can be made the determination of all localities having the right sort of people for its inhabitants to patronize, tolerate and maintain only a class of papers that deal fairly and honorably with their readers by being truthful, fair and just in recording the events of the day and commenting thereon. Dependence for editorial enlightenment can not safely be confided in the metropolitan press. John Bigelow, able journalist that he was, said at a memorable press banquet held in the city of New York years ago, that telling the truth through the columns of New York newspapers would not be tolerated by those in control; that if he, Bigelow, were to undertake to tell the plain, unvarnished truth in his editorial writing he would instantly lose his $150 a week job on the New York Sun. And the Sun was not then and is not now among the worst of the newspapers published in wicked Gotham.

Political reform, genuine and real in character, need not be expected without a thorough elimination of the objectionable features that have from time to time crept into our political system. So-called reforms, engendered by the Roosevelt splurge, have in the main proved delusions and shams. Primary elections have not only proved a sore disappointment to their advocates and champions, but they have contributed immensely to political demoralization and debauchery. Observation and experience teach that of all the systems for making nominations the delegate convention system has proved the best and most satisfactory of all methods yet conceived, devised, tried and tested. It is not without defect, but in a measure such defect can be cured by safeguarding the election of delegates by rigid legal regulation. The convention system deteriorated when it was perverted to mass meetings in lieu of deliberative delegate assemblies. Always bear in mind, however, that perfection in political methods is not attainable through legislation alone. Unless a community be blessed with the presence of an alert, conscientious and patriotic electorate, civic righteousness need not be looked for in that locality. The creation of a wholesome public sentiment should be made the aim and object of every right-minded and justice-loving citizen.

As a result of more than a decade's stimulated immigration we have had an injection annually of a million of aliens into the body politic. This stimulating was the cunning work of the soulless trusts that grew into maturity in defiance of both law and public sentiment. Where these aliens came from and what they were composed of made no difference to these selfish interests. If slavery were still tolerated in this country and legalized slave trade were yet carried on, as it was in the early days of the republic, the jungles of Africa would doubtless have been invaded in search of working material for the stupendous mills and factories operated in this country. As it is the attention of the disguised recruiting agents was mainly directed to southern Europe, where all sorts of human beings somehow eke out an existence. In former years the bulk of immigration consisted of a stock of people whose presence was justly regarded a direct gain and a positive benefit to any community thus favored. These immigrants in the early days came chiefly from Germany, Ireland, Holland and the Norwegian regions. They dug our canals, built our railways, tilled our soil, gave towns and cities the benefit of their mechanical skill, and in various ways contributed to the upbuilding of municipalities and States. A political blessing was conferred upon the republic when, after the failure of the 1848 revolution in Germany, thousands upon thousands of young, vigorous, bright, intelligent and stalwart Germans sought refuge in the land of the free and the home of the brave. Among them were such men as August Willich, Louis Blenker, Gustav Struve, Otto Reventlow, Carl Schurz, Franz Sigel, Friedrich Hecker, Gustav Koerner, Carl Heinzen, Emil Pretorius, Carl Daenzer, Dr. G. Kellner, Peter Meyer, Dr. Morwitz, Emil Rothe and others of similar high type of manhood. Their coming here and locating in various parts of the Union proved a gain of incalculable value to this country.

This gain was further augmented during the Civil war when vast numbers of young Germans came across the ocean to replenish the decimated ranks of the Union army and to put the finishing touches on organized rebellion. There was no difficulty about assimilating these elements. Natives and adopted citizens co-operated and worked together to do the things that needed to be done for the development of American industries. In Wisconsin Carl Schurz was nominated by admiring and appreciative natives for the office of Lieutenant-Governor before he had quite completed his fifth year of probationary residence in the United States. I know of a young German who at the age of ten came to this country with his widowed mother and who traveled 156 miles to be made a full-fledged American citizen by obtaining his naturalization papers as soon as he became twenty-one years of age. These and kindred instances of Americanization lend force and emphasis to the declaration occasionally adduced in discussing naturalization problems: The only real difference between an upright American citizen and an adopted one of the same type is that one came here naked and the other with clothes on.

In marked contrast with this longing for becoming clothed in the habiliments of American citizenship stands out the recent revelation in Chicago and elsewhere occasioned by the operation of the draft. Men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-one, for years engaged in commercial and industrial pursuits, complacently claimed exemption from military service on the plea of being aliens and never having thought of declaring intention to become naturalized citizens. During the memorable campaign of 1896 the discovery was made that there resided within the city of Chicago upward of 30,000 Canadians engaged in various branches of business but not naturalized. Party zeal and business interests led to an organized effort to make citizens of these British subjects. The outcome of this organized effort in the interest of "sound money" was an astounding increase in the "McKinley and Prosperity vote" and a protest against the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1.

Clearly and plainly the alien who enjoys the benefits of a prosperous free country ought to be made to understand by the force of law that if averse to becoming a citizen of the American republic he should be directed to return to the land from whence he came and remain there.

Twenty years were consumed before there was enacted an immigration restriction law. It was a case of locking the stable after the horse had been stolen. For a decade immigration, mainly from southern Europe, came in at the rate of a million a year. In the entire history of the world no nation besides our own ever experienced such an infusion of alien blood. Three presidents—Cleveland, Taft and Wilson—interposed four vetoes to the enactment of an immigration restriction law, allegedly on the ground that it contained an objectionable literacy clause. Judging from the weakness of each of these vetoes the inference is warranted that the veto was inspired not so much on account of injustice being done to illiterates knocking for admission as by reason of apprehension that the big mills and factories might fall short of the sort of unskilled labor they were in need of and seeking to obtain. Be that as it may, the mischief done by way of excessive and unassimilable raw material is an accomplished fact that calls for treatment from a common sense and not a lamentation point of view. This task of applying relief is by no means an easy one. Had there been made provision that these thousands and millions of aliens could gain admission within our gates only on condition that they locate permanently in the agricultural regions of the West and South, instead of squatting down in the slums of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Chicago, etc., already overcrowded with the same class of beings, the situation would be vastly different and very much better. Now that they are there, their utilization for political or voting purposes should be rendered nugatory, in so far as possible, by curtailing the power of large cities in legislative assemblies. The State of New York provided for something like this by incorporating into her constitution a provision rendering it impossible for the city of New York to gain numerical control of the General Assembly no matter how much larger its population over that of the remainder of the State might be. Connecticut and some other New England States steadfastly adhere to the originally adopted system of limiting or curtailing representation of the larger towns and cities in the legislative departments of their respective state governments. Indiana should avail herself of the earliest opportunity to safeguard herself in like manner. Governor Marshall had something of this sort in mind when he sought to reconstruct the State Constitution by a shorter process than that thitherto applied. His purpose was to assure to each county a representative in the lower house of the General Assembly and apportion to the more populous counties 25 representatives according to a prescribed ratio for excess population representation. That, or something of a similar character, would answer the purpose. No one who believes in the American plan of government could properly or rightfully object to such an arrangement—a modification of the plan of representation in the United States Senate. There is no good reason to believe or to conjecture that the welfare of the State would be jeopardized by judiciously limiting the power of populous cities like Indianapolis, Evansville, Gary, Fort Wayne, Terre Haute and South Bend in the General Assembly.

It goes without saying that the abomination of allowing an alien to vote upon a one year's residence in the United States and declaring his intention to become a citizen ought to be gotten rid of at the earliest possible moment. It is to be regretted that the step taken to provide for a revision of the constitution and the certain elimination of this senselessly premature enfranchisement was defeated by a remarkable decision of the State's Supreme Court. There is no denial of the inherent right of the people of the State to revise or remake their constitution whenever it suits their pleasure so to do. But four of the five supreme judges concur in the opinion that in the absence of specific declaration as to the manner in which a new constitution may or shall be framed, the General Assembly, acting for and in behalf of the people, has no right to make it possible for the people to exercise the right inherent in them by naming a time and place for giving force and effect to this prerogative. The court's conclusion is astounding and bewildering. The only comfort it affords is that neither of the two leading political parties can be held accountable for the amazing discovery how not to do it. Two of the judges are Democrats and two Republicans. It is very much to the credit of Judge Moses B. Lairy that he dissented from his colleagues' opinion that the people can't elect delegates to a constitutional convention without first having counted noses as to whether they want such an election and such a convention to be held. For a job of artistic hairsplitting this latest exhibition of refined skill in that line surpasses all previous efforts.

By crowding a century into a decade we have brought upon the country conditions that will tax the skill, ability and genius of the very ablest among us to solve the numerous problems calling for solution. It is not improbable that the war spirit which by almost superhuman effort has been aroused, at least in some localities, may result in a general realignment before and at the next election. Just in which direction the heaviest blows may fall cannot even be conjectured, much less foretold, at this time. So much may, however, be safely asserted at this writing: There will be a momentous rattling of dry bones after the ballots shall have been tabulated. Let us indulge in the earnest hope that henceforth every voter may put on his thinking cap and give himself over to patient, persistent study as to the part he should take in shaping the affairs of State and nation so as to insure to the inhabitants of this singularly blessed land all that is implied in the assurance of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Eternal vigilance being the price of liberty, there can be no excuse for any one being remiss in the faithful and conscientious performance of any duty resting upon an American citizen, native or adopted.

SOME OF THE VITAL QUESTIONS

Faith in American invincibility is thus tersely set forth in this paragraph, emanating from the pen of a well-poised Indiana editor: "With a country made up of people like this, no foreign enemy can conquer the United States. When America's power wanes it will be because of weakness within. Internal weakness can come only from a decadence of individuals—a loss of individual initiative, individual efficiency, individual integrity or individual courage. Our future depends upon the encouragement of enterprise, ability, honesty and fearlessness. Nothing in governmental activity should be permitted to discourage the development of any of these essentials of a high standard of citizenship."

* * *

A well-edited Nebraska paper sizes up the present situation in this pithy paragraph: "The grave problem before the American people today is that of completing the process of nation-building. It is the problem of setting our house in order. It is the problem of integrating America. It is the problem of subordinating every personal ambition, every class interest and policy, every race attachment, to the one dominant idea of an America free, just, powerful, forward-facing, that shall stand out in the history of nations as the name of a people who conceive their mission and their true greatness to live in service to mankind."

* * *

The National Morals Committee of the Federation of Catholic Societies of America, at the annual meeting held in Kansas City, gave expression to this deprecation of a deplorable lack of moral probity and stability: "It is the American boast today that we have progressed in all directions to a place of first and highest development. In spite of the claim right no longer rules; justice is fast declining, order is upset, the family is endangered, the home is disrupted; virtue, public and private, is decadent; materialism is in the ascendancy, vicious propaganda runs riot and religious indifference dominates. It may be a startling statement, yet it nevertheless is a fact that the rapid drift of this country is toward paganism. What can be its cause other than a system of education which has totally eliminated God?"

* * *

Dr. Frank Crane, an eminent publicist, has this to offer in connection with the laudation of patriotism: "The cause of patriotism has things to be said both for and against it. It has inspired many deeds of heroism, has had its martyrs and prophets. Scott pours his scorn upon the 'man who never to himself has said, "This is my own, my native land,"' and assures us that the 'wretch' shall die 'unwept, unhonored and unsung.' But the sentiment of love for one's country has its seamy side. If no other charge could be brought against it it would be serious enough to adduce the fact that most wars are due to race feeling, national or local pride. Fine as patriotism may be, there is never going to be a reign of 'peace on earth and good will toward men' until it is replaced by a finer ideal, the enthusiasm for humanity. Pride in country is but a survival of the old pride in family, clan and tribe. It is still tainted with immaturity. It is a bud.

'The bud may have a bitter taste,
But sweet will be the flower.'

And the bud is patriotism, the flower is world-citizenship."

In a book from the masterly pen and brain of Cardinal Gibbons, printed about the time the war clouds were gathering, utterance is given to these comforting thoughts: "I have lived a long time, and I have lived through a very critical time. Not only have I held office many years, but I have held office during a time of transition, when the old order was changed. There are few Americans living now who can remember the things which I can. I followed Mr. Lincoln's dead body in procession when it was brought to this city (Baltimore); I have seen every President since his death, and I have known most of them personally; I was a grown man and a priest during the civil war, when it seemed as if our country were to be permanently divided. Very few people now living have seen the country in such distress as I have seen it. But I have lived, thank God, to see it in wonderful prosperity and to behold it grown into one of the great powers of the earth. Younger men may tremble for the future of this country, but I can have nothing but hope when I think what we have already passed through, for I can see no troubles in the future which could equal, much less surpass, those which have afflicted us in bygone days. If only the American people will hold fast to that instrument which has been bequeathed to them as the palladium of their liberties—the Constitution of the United States—and fear and distrust the man who would touch that ark with profane hands, the permanence of our institutions is assured."

In the course of a heart-to-heart talk to New York business men ex-President William Howard Taft gave expression to these thoughts: "The business of legislation is an expert matter. It is something that requires a knowledge of the meaning of legal terms. It is just as absurd to propose to build a bridge without engineers, to build a house without an architect or a competent contractor as to propose detailed legislation by votes at a popular election. The pure democracy attempted in Athens proved to be a failure and the government in those days was so much simpler than in our cities and States that even a temporary success in such a community would not justify a resort to the same method now. If an executive officer is dishonest he can in effect be recalled by impeachment or by criminal trial and conviction and sentenced to the penitentiary. Under the new system of recall an honest official, before he has had time to work out and vindicate his policies, may be ousted by an ambitious rival through misrepresentation in the press and the hasty judgment of the minority of the electorate who go to the polls. Under such a system Lincoln would have been recalled. What is true with respect to the State is true with respect to the party. Parties are essential to popular government. In no other way practically can the will of all the electorate be interpreted and embodied in affirmative action, legislative and executive. Under the system of the general primary if the initial letter of the candidate's name comes early in the alphabet, and he is first in the list of candidates, he may receive thousands of votes more than the man whose name begins with W."

That classes disappear when men work together is the contention of John D. Rockefeller, Jr. He says: "The inactive army of Christian men will be drawn into service the more quickly when they have come to recognize the brotherhood of man as a necessary corollary to the fatherhood of God. An interesting and unique argument recently advanced for compulsory military service in this country is that the sons of the well-to-do might thereby be thrown into close contact with the sons of the working people, so that the great gap which too often exists might be bridged and as a result of daily association in common tasks these two classes of men brought to see that the difference between them is superficial rather than inherent. When men of widely separated stations are thrown together, come to know each other, when they are working side by side for the advancement of a common interest, then and then only do personal distrust, hatred and misunderstanding give way to a spirit of fair play, justice and a desire for the common good."

Discussing the subject of leading nations combining to prevent war by force, President A. Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University puts himself on record as saying: "It is almost inconceivable that any nation would attack another if convinced that to do so would involve war with all the leading powers of the world. If, therefore, such a league as is proposed were formed by a sufficient number of great countries it is in the highest degree improbable that the agreement to take up arms would ever need to be put into execution, for, although there may be issues on which a nation would rather perish than yield, there are none on which it would not prefer a public hearing before fighting its adversary to fighting a whole array of powerful states without such a hearing."

The State of Michigan feels justly proud of having within its borders a churchman who is in the habit of "speaking right out in meeting" just as he feels and thinks. In a sermon delivered at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in the city of New York, the Rt. Rev. Charles David Williams, Protestant Episcopal bishop of Michigan, declared that the spirit of German organization will triumph, no matter which side wins the war. Bishop Williams said he referred to the German system of co-operation as distinguished from individualism in the United States. He condemned German imperialism and militarism and her ruthlessness "which violates every principle of civilization, Christianity and humanity." Germany, Bishop Williams declared, has welded her people into solidarity through social legislation, while individualism reigns in the United States and American property is in a great measure lopsided, congesting wealth into the hands of a few. "Why should many of our toiling masses fight for our country?" the bishop added. "What has the country done for them? Are they not struggling against practically the same financial oppression as they struggled against in their own countries, a few holding the key to the entire situation? If the Government can draft the poor man, if the Government can take his body, leaving him with barely enough to support his family, even in poverty, why can not the Government commandeer the wealth of the rich man and leave him with just enough to keep his business going? The equation is lopsided."

In complete harmony with what the Michigan bishop thundered into the ears of his New York audience is the declaration of an eminent educator that "in the days that are coming the mere accumulator will get precious little praise. He will not be allowed to preach to graduating classes or to tell young men just starting in business by what methods they are to succeed. To be considered successful a man will have to be more of a giver than a taker. If he has taken a million dollars he will have to prove that he gave ten million dollars' worth of service in return for it. He won't be canonized, as men have been in America, simply because he beat other men into a foot race to sources of wealth which any person of normal intelligence could pick up."

At a meeting of state superintendents of instruction, college professors, school principals and business men, held under the auspices of the National Council of Education, the topic of discussion was "Thrift." S. W. Straus, Chicago banker, who is president of the American Society for Thrift, dealt with the problem in a general sense, while more than half a dozen other speakers discussed various angles of the same subject. "The most vital question in America today is individual preparedness," Mr. Straus said. "Not individual preparedness for war, but individual preparedness for anything that may come—individual preparedness to live useful, steadfast lives for the benefit of humanity and posterity." Mr. Straus declared that although the United States is a prosperous nation, "we are not a prosperous people," and backed up his assertion with the declaration that one person out of every ten who dies in any of the large cities is buried in a potter's field. "Statistics show that in the United States there are only 108 who save money out of every one thousand population," he added. "This compares with 554 in Switzerland. The only way to lay the foundation for the future thrift of the nation is begun today teaching thrift in our schools," he said in conclusion.

Frederic W. Keough, editor of American Industries, boldly declares that reckless waste of resources is undermining our national strength. He says: "In looking over prospective reasons for national inefficiency let us not minimize the effect of our indifference to waste in every department of industrial and personal interest. Wastefulness is undermining our national strength—waste of our natural resources, our forests, our stores of fuel, our edifices, our human wealth. We waste more life and limb through accidents, fatal and otherwise, yearly than are destroyed in war. The cost of our accidents, if they could be measured in money, would more than pay for our army and navy and practically any increase in these arms of the national defense that has been urged. We waste untold sums in log-rolling projects for useless army posts, unnecessary public buildings and the improvement of two-by-four rivers and harbors. No new taxes are needed to meet the requirements in national defense if the money thrown away in selfish congressional bickerings is saved and applied. President Wilson's idea that national defense can be amply provided by economy in expenditures elsewhere is thoroughly sound."

Judge Harry B. Tuthill, in an address to the Presbyterian Men's Class, Laporte, Ind., said: "During this whole time that Europe has been arming, America has been busily engaged in increasing its wealth and population. Any man, no matter whom he might be, for a long time, no matter if he was a red-handed murderer across the seas, was admitted to the bosom of our body politic and no questions asked. Numbers were what we desired, increased wealth and commercial power no matter how obtained, was what we demanded. We have grown rich in material things; we have grown weak in man power and in what might be called the red blood of ambition. Our standing army in most of the years of peace has not been sufficient to quell a mob much less to protect us from the incursions of any enemy, no matter how weak."

James M. Cox, publisher of two prosperous newspapers in Ohio, served several terms in Congress as representative of the Dayton district. During the political upheaval of 1912 he was elected Governor as a Democrat, defeated as a candidate for reelection in 1914, but triumphantly elected to a second term in his third gubernatorial race. He is likely to be a candidate for reelection in 1918. If successful he will in all probability become a candidate for the presidential nomination in 1920. Governor Cox holds pronounced views on all important questions affecting the welfare of the country. The general trend of his mind is disclosed by what he had to say a short time since on "The Man Before the Dollar":

"It is no secret to those who are familiar with legislation in this country that too much attention in the past has been given to the almighty dollar and not enough to mankind. That is to say, our legislative bodies, it seems, have been all along imbued with the idea that only wealth needed protection, that man was able to protect himself. But I am pleased to note that of late years the trend of thought has been in the opposite direction—that every year more and more people are coming to understand that government is for the protection of the individual rather than for the protection of material wealth. At the present time the leading thinkers of the country are devoting their best energies to providing measures that will in one way or another tend to promote human happiness. Such persons are not unmindful of the fact that a man's goods and chattels, as well as his person, must be protected, but they do believe that of first importance to society is the welfare of the human being."

During the Jackson and Van Buren administrations there was published in the city of Washington a magazine called The Democratic Review. It was a decidedly outspoken publication, as may be gathered from the following extract from one of its editorials in the year 1838:

"We are aware of the blind veneration which has heretofore sealed the eyes of a very large proportion of the public whenever their looks have been directed towards that sacrosanct tribunal (the Supreme Court of the United States) in prostrate submission of its presumed infallibility, and in discussing our subject with the freedom which it demands many a reader may perhaps hold up his hands in holy horror at the impious temerity. But this abject mental submission to authority and assumption is unworthy equally of our country and age. We despise that timid prudery in politics which has become too much in vogue. It is high time to print what has been often and earnestly spoken, and what everyone ought to know. Freedom of discussion, of all subjects within the range of human ken, from highest to lowest, is the vital principle of American liberty. The noblest and best of institutions can be preserved in their purity only by the perpetual vigilance of public opinion."

Thoroughly convinced that the salvation of this country is dependent on the furtherance of the nation's agricultural interests, it is gratifying to know that this view is firmly held by the most thoughtful students of government, statesmen, jurists, legislators, etc. Among those especially outspoken in the expression of their views may be mentioned A. O. Eberhart, former Governor of Minnesota. In a talk on this subject Governor Eberhart declared that

Minnesota is in the forefront in the solution of the rural question. The teaching of scientific farming in the country schools and the making of rural life more attractive by motion picture entertainments and other forms of amusement are the means of keeping a large number of boys and girls in the country who otherwise would go to the cities to live, the Governor asserted. "If we are going to reduce crime and poverty we will have to relieve the congested cities and get more people into the country," said Governor Eberhart. "Our consolidated school system in Minnesota, under which several school districts are combined into one large district, with a modern school building, has aided us in this work. Our rural school districts have grown to such an extent that it is difficult to get teachers. We are endeavoring to make our country life attractive, too, as another means of keeping young men and women on the farms. Motion picture entertainments are given frequently, and the films are distributed among the several schools. We are also giving our attention to making the rural schools social centers. The State of Minnesota has room for a vast number of persons to cultivate the land."

Defects in our general educational system are freely acknowledged and lamented by the foremost educators throughout the land. What is lucidly and forcefully set forth in the following by Silas Evans, president of Ripon College, is, to say the least, worthy of earnest consideration and thoughtful meditation. He says:

"The great bane of all secondary school training is the multiplicity of subjects and the painlessness of methods. We need more tonic of astringency for the brain. The psychology of interest has been overworked. The education of the will is the prime essential. I would have the high school take fewer studies and compel thoroughness. The social life is too precocious also. There is too much of the moving picture and tango mind connected with education. In point of studies pursued, I believe, this is entirely secondary to the point of the pursuit of study. It has been fairly well demonstrated that it makes very little difference in the first stages of education what one studies if he only study it thoroughly and scientifically. By all this I do not mean to encourage mental strain or the early strenuous life. There should be wholesome fun and plenty of physical education. I do not approve of military training in any of its forms. There is an element of artificiality in it, and it is a very poor substitute for games."

At a teachers' institute meeting held in Pittsburgh, Pa., during the latter part of August, 1917, Prof. John A. H. Keith, principal of the Indiana State Normal School, threw some light on the cause of so much parrotism among the products of our faulty educational methods. On the subject of "Four Standards for Judgment of the Public Schools" he spoke of the difference between understanding and mere education, and suggested a system whereby the years of a student in school could be shortened materially. Upon this he said:

"If the instructors would find the points of interest to the girls and boys much fewer years of schooling would be necessary. There should be a reason for learning. We see daily so many cases where children merely learn what is in the book, but they have no insight. Books are great inventions and yet they can become the greatest curses. A child should be interested in what he studies; without this interest the study does him no good. For instance, there is a stage in the life of most boys when they are interested in chickens. They ought to be taught everything in this branch of learning at that time. So it is with other things."

The standards of judgment of schools, he said, are the progress made by the pupils, the increment of good will and self-control in conduct engendered by the schools, the prevalence of community interest in the work of the school and the higher individual and social life the school inculcates.

In "Defense of Property" the Century Magazine some time ago presented these views:

"When Bismarck supported the Socialist program for the protection of the laboring classes in Germany, it was not because he was a Socialist, but because he did not wish the laborer to be exploited to a point of physical degradation that should leave him unfit to endure the hardships of war.

"Property has no hands with which to defend itself, and in the wiser states of Europe, for the last generation, the leaders of the propertied classes have seen to it that the laborer was fit and willing to defend them. That seems to be at once the explanation of German state Socialism, of German military efficiency, and of the German's patriotic willingness to fight.

"In this country property has no foreign invasion to fear, and we are a century behind Germany in the protection of the unpropertied classes. We suffer with all the worst abuses of unemployment, of child labor, of commercial monopolies, of uninsured accident and death in dangerous occupations, of pauperized old age, and criminal vagabondage. We suffer with the general failure of our civilization to be anything but a business administration for business ends. Property, opposing reform, has become the great enemy of social progress. We are told that we are the most untidy, the worst governed, the least defensible country in the world.

"History digs up, in the deposits of archaeology, the fossil remains of such civilizations, now extinct, as if the human race, in its struggle to protect itself from the forces of Nature, had accumulated property as lower orders of life in evolution formed their protective shells, only to find that the shell itself at last becomes the curse of the life it shelters, and the propertied organism is devoured, in the progress of evolution, by a freer form."

Attributing the chief cause of insanity to alcohol, Dr. T. D. Alderman, of New York, a specialist in nervous and mental diseases, asserted before the convention of the National Eclectic Medical Association, at Indianapolis, that the United States is progressing toward the stage where it will be one large insane asylum.

"We have practically become known as a nervous nation," said Dr. Alderman. "We rush and we hurry, and we turn night into day, and hurry the body to decay with tobacco, alcohol, drugs, sexual excesses and abuses. We must stop this disastrous rush and headlong hurry.

"Alcohol does more than all other causes combined. Where it is not the initial cause, it is the developing cause, because we find the use of alcohol invariably accompanied by one or more of the social diseases.

"In the United States today there are 250,000 insane and 250,000 feeble-minded. This exceeds the population of Indianapolis. I do not believe that my statement is wild or not supported by facts. We are literally and truthfully threatened with a spread of mental degeneracy that is overwhelming and out of all proportion to the increase of the population.

"There is an answer to this condition and it is in safe and sane eugenics. The world must see to it that there is a great evolution of character in men and women. There should be laws to prevent the propagation of the defectives, to prevent marriage between feeble-minded and insane. There is nothing for us doctors to do but to become strong and ardent advocates of eugenics."

That the liquor traffic has for years been working its own destruction is freely admitted by candid men connected with the same, directly or indirectly. Commenting upon the nation-wide demand for prohibition, the National Liquor Dealers' Journal recently made this truthful admission:

"To us there is the handwriting on the wall, and its interpretation spells doom. The liquor business is to blame. It seems incapable of learning any lesson of advancement or any motive but profit. To perpetuate itself it has formed alliances with the slums that repel all conscientious and patriotic citizens. It deliberately aids the most corrupt political powers and backs with all its resources the most unworthy men, the most corrupt and recreant officials. It does not aid in the purification of municipal, state or national administrations.

"One of the reasons why prohibition is spreading so rapidly in this country,' comments the Chattanooga News, 'is that the liquor interests aligned themselves with a certain type of official who is powerless when the people awaken to his evils.'"

Liquor dealers of this type referred to have not only been the enemies of humanity, but their own enemies as well, and they have not only been principally responsible for the demand for the abolition of the manufacturing and sale of intoxicants in the United States, but for the demand that sweeps the civilized world as well.

The Hon. Thomas Taggart did not serve long as a member of the United States Senate, to which position he was appointed by Governor Ralston upon the death of Senator Benjamin F. Shively. But during the eight months that he did serve as senator he made a record to which he and his friends can well point with pardonable pride. His incisive speech in denunciation of the pernicious practice of squandering public funds by the millions for the promotion of visionary projects met with unstinted commendation throughout the Republic. The Indianapolis Star, a Republican paper, made this editorial reference to Senator Taggart's well-directed onslaught on the pork barrel abomination:

"A report from Washington explains that pork-grabbing is in disfavor. The recent election was disastrous to many of the nation's most notorious 'pork' congressmen. They fell by the wayside in spite of the plunder they had taken home to their districts. The public showed that it does not endorse looting the treasury for any purpose.

"Too much credit can not be given to former Senator Taggart for the stand he took against the 'pork' abuses. Extravagance had been accepted in Congress as illogical and wasteful, but a traditional if not necessary evil. Many saw the truth, no doubt, but Senator Taggart had the courage of his convictions.

"The denunciation of 'pork' and waste, delivered by Senator Taggart, uncovered the utter defenselessness of the system. He turned on the light and showed the pettiness of the whole business, and how it has been utilized to strengthen political fences at the expense of the public treasury.

"It took courage to do what Senator Taggart did, in the face of records of many colleagues in Congress. But he had the nerve and he made such a thorough job of the exposure that he probably has crippled the 'pork' grabber for all time. The people never again will applaud a member whose claim to recognition is based on the wasteful appropriations he has been able to put through for his district or State."

Now that an organized effort is to be made to Americanize the millions of aliens in this country, it is in order to inquire why efforts in that direction were not begun long ago, during the years that immigration by the million was at its height. All political parties are censurable for neglect of duty in this particular. For years and years the chief, if not sole, object of party leaders has been to secure votes instead of Americanizing aliens. The indifference regarding this matter has been sharply condemned by men who have given it close attention and earnest thought. Chief among these is Dr. William Norman Guthrie, New York divine and educator. In an address delivered at the convention of the Ohio Federation of Woman's Clubs this gentleman vigorously assailed the educational and social system of the United States as the cause of hyphenism. "If you would make a good American of the immigrant, and especially of the immigrant's children, you should teach him in the schools the traditions and the history of his own country in his own language, and at the same time teach him American history in the language of this country." This, he asserted, was, in his opinion, the best plan for bringing the foreigner to realize the advantages of citizenship on this side of the water.

"When you teach the immigrant that to be a good citizen of the United States he must at once become a traitor to his native country, you are teaching him to have but little respect for the country of his adoption," declared Dr. Guthrie. "The customs, the habits, the traditions of the immigrant must be assimilated with those of the United States, if the immigrant is to become a real American," said the speaker. "If he must be a Polish-American, a French-American, a German-American, or any other kind of an American, let him with love for the folk-nature of his own land be, above all other things, a real American in his citizenship here. These things can be taught not by making him desert the ideals—the customs of the land of his nativity, but by assisting him to preserve them and at the same time teaching him love for the ideals of this country." Dr. Guthrie's address undoubtedly was one of the strongest heard during the convention. It was absolutely free from partisanship or reflection on the peoples of any country. He has given special study to his subject, that of "Americanization." At the present time he is located in New York in charge of the church of St. Mark's-in-the-Bowery, where he conducts classes for children of foreign parentage along the lines suggested in his address here. He is well known in Ohio and was for nine years located in Cincinnati. "Questions of the nature covered in my address," declared Dr. Guthrie when interviewed, "are not solved because of the very simple fact we never really face the issue. There are no real Americans in this country, but there are all sorts of citizens who have sprung from different nationalities and who have never known the traditions of the land of their parents. If there is a man in this country three generations removed from the land of his parents, who would take up arms against the United States in behalf of the ruler of that foreign power, it is because that man's antecedents have not been aided in assimilating the folk nature of the foreign country, taught in its own language, and at the same time given lessons in American history in the language of this country. Assimilation through thorough education is the only means by which good Americans may be made of the foreign elements. Your teachers, your neighbor or yourself can not turn up your noses at the custom of a Pole or of any other man of foreign birth and then expect to gain that man's respect for America. Our best citizens do not come from the cultured classes of Europe for they will not assimilate with American customs. They must come from those of the humble walks of life and who can be taught through assimilation. America was made by the Almighty for the assimilation of the races of the old world. Its location, its mountain ranges and its climate surely seem to make it so. Every foreigner except those from the British Isles comes to the United States at a disadvantage and that one disadvantage the one of language. He is shunted off to himself, he is not given his chance; he retains the love of his own country, its customs and even its citizenship if it has any."

"America is not given to solve the problem of the enemy alien until she solves the problem of the friendly alien." This was the statement made by Miss Frances A. Kellor, assistant to the chairman of the national Americanization committee and formerly chief of the division of aliens of the resource mobilization bureau of the New York state adjutant-general's office. Miss Kellor was positive in her declaration that if the United States wanted to avoid a recurrence of the East St. Louis riots, or the labor troubles which resulted in the deportation of the I. W. W. sympathizers from Bisbee, Ariz., then the nation would have to make a great effort to bring the friendly aliens into closer touch with America's standard of living. The alien, she said, was always the lowest paid, did the dirtiest work, and was the worst treated of all laboring classes, and hence was always ready to listen to the seductive call of any person who wished to make trouble. She related several experiences which came under her notice personally while she was in the state adjutant general's office, a position she accepted at the request of Governor Whitman, showing the great risk incurred from a manufacturer's going blithely along with no thought as to what his alien workmen were doing or what they were thinking. What the country needs, according to Miss Kellor, is a central bureau of aliens in Washington to handle the whole question. "The most effective tool in the hands of the hostile resident of America is industrial unrest," said Miss Kellor. "The basis of this unrest is the maladjustment of the friendly immigrant to conditions of life in America. Take the recent labor troubles in this country, the race riots in East St. Louis, where strikes on the part of alien workmen were followed by the importation of Negroes to take their places. In the zinc and lead mines of Missouri note the attacks by Americans on alien laborers. Look at the disturbances in the Arizona copper mines. It will be remarked that in practically all instances the leaders have been the I. W. W., and the I. W. W. are mostly aliens."

Whether Patriotism in the United States is decaying is dispassionately discussed in Harper's Magazine for June by William Roscoe Thayer:

"There are, of course, radicals who, in this age of dissolution, hold that patriotism, like religion and like the rest of the most sacred family ties, is a worn-out ideal, a pretty but fatuous survival of a superstitious stage in human development. They argue, too, that because morals vary in different lands, morality is 'a mere question of latitude,' and therefore, that it may be disregarded. They had no part in shaping the laws, religious or social, which have been handed down and still govern public affairs and private conduct; why, then, should they heed them? With these and similar pleas they justify their egotism. In truth, however, the man or woman who reasons thus is the most pitiable of human beings. Not to feel that you are part of a community is really to be unhuman; for the animals have this feeling by instinct, and in ants and bees it produces results which rival those of the highest type of men. To be shut up in the prison of your own self, without even a peephole through which you can look out upon others or communicate with them; to pass your time in such solitary confinement, unsustained by any fellow feeling, unstirred by any motive except the gratification of selfish desires, is a form of punishment more cruel than any devised by medieval tortures. In general, persons who announce, often somewhat boastfully, that they have discarded patriotism—as if by so doing they proved their superior intelligence—do not philosophize. They pursue their own ease and comfort. Most of their days, until an emergency comes, they give little thought to the country, which remains an abstraction for them except when it calls on them to pay taxes. They grumble if the local government allows the streets, or the water supply, or the policing, to run down; but even then they do not take the trouble to go to the polls and vote for a better mayor. If they are in business they probably regard the national government as a vast purveyor of benefits for those citizens who know how to get them. They usually take no more thought of what the country does for them than little children take of the means by which their parents supply them with food and clothes. Children pay back in affection, but the unpatriotic egotists feel neither gratitude nor affection; instead of being thankful for what they have, they complain that it is so little."

On the Negro question a good deal is presented on preceding pages of this volume, all of which will be adjudged germane to a clear understanding of the problem with which the nation was obliged to wrestle at various stages of our country's history. We are far from being through with certain phases of these problems. What is of special interest regarding the same is succinctly and clearly set forth by one of Ohio's foremost journalists, George F. Burba, for many years chief editorial writer for the Dayton News, and now officiating in a similar capacity on the Columbus Evening Dispatch. Mr. Burba served as secretary to Governor James M. Cox during the latter's first term as chief executive of the Buckeye commonwealth. The present situation is thus discussed by Mr. Burba:

"There isn't going to be another war between the North and the South on account of the Negro. There will be no more armies of the blue and the gray opposing each other because of the colored man. But there is 'bad blood' brewing on his account, just the same, and the Southern newspapers are saying 'harsh things' about us on account of the same fellow that caused the argument in 1861—which argument continued through four bloody years and disagreeable ones.

"The trouble is simple enough. Northern men have lately invaded the South and induced thousands of Negroes to come North—to work. The Southerners have just awakened to the fact that the South needs these same colored laborers, and the papers have set up a howl about it. They are claiming that it isn't fair to have these Northern men invading the South inducing the colored folks to go North.

"But it is a business proposition. It is never pleasant to have your 'help' leave you. All of us have experienced that unpleasantness. But the fellow who has a day's labor to sell is in the same condition as the fellow who has a bale of cotton to sell, and we note that our Southern friends who have cotton to sell try to find the best market for it. So they ought not to blame the colored man who has a day's labor to sell for also seeking the best market for the labor.

"We shall not argue whether it is better for the colored man to leave the South. There is a good deal to be said on both sides of that question. But the fact is that the citizens of this country are free to seek the best market for their labor, and to go to those communities where they believe they can secure the best wages or the best working conditions. So the only thing the South can consistently do to meet the competition of the North in the matter of inducements to the Negro is to pay as good wages and to furnish as good working conditions as the Northern employer. That would settle the whole question."

Thoroughly sound are the views expressed by E. E. Rittenhouse, president of the Life Extension Institute, relative to American Responsibility for Alien Ignorance of Our Ideals:

"During the fourteen years preceding the outbreak of the present war the flight of Europeans to the United States numbered 13,255,207. For any lack of knowledge among these newcomers of our institutions and ideals and the higher purposes of our government the American people are largely responsible. We made no effort to instruct them as to their obligations and duties as residents or citizens of our country. We turned them loose to learn the meaning of Americanism in the hard school of experience. We choked the 'melting pot.' Large numbers of them have failed to fuse.

"The public schools will take care of the children, but we need an educational plan, a special school of citizenship, for foreign adults.

"The duty of teaching these newcomers what their public responsibilities are seems imperative. Loyalty to the law in time of peace and to the nation in time of war can be expected from the majority of our foreign population, but the unfused and disloyal few need attention before damage is done and discredit brought upon the worthy."

Commenting on the thoughtless accusations and strictures of a contemporary on the East St. Louis bloody conflict between whites and blacks, Charles G. Sefrit, the foremost Republican journalist of Southern Indiana, gave forceful expression to his views on the race problem in these impressive sentences:

"The Germans, of course, had no more to do with the East St. Louis uprising than they had with the lynching of members of the Mafia at New Orleans years ago, or the riots at Homestead, the sanguinary battles at Paterson, the great railroad strike in Chicago and the bloody duels between the striking miners and the constabulary of Colorado and Idaho.

"Deplorable as it is, all the theorizing in the world will not adjust the condition in this country which arises from racial antagonisms that exist between the whites of the population and the blacks. We may argue until we are black in the face and preach the beauties of the universal brotherhood of man, regardless of color, until our tongues are paralyzed in the effort, but the plain, bare, unmistakable fact remains that the bias among the white men is so firmly fixed that the intermingling of the whites and the blacks in industrial equality is an impossible accomplishment.

"The United States has no more serious internal problem than this racial antagonism. The solution of it is one of the political mysteries that time alone can unveil. There may be found a way. Who points this out will take rank in the history of the Republic with Washington and Lincoln. The solution may come from the Negroes themselves, from one of their race, great and strong enough to take up the work begun by Booker T. Washington; some Negro power, foresight and influence, who can induce his people to confine their energies to that sure salvation for them, the tilling of the soil, in which honorable and thrifty pursuit they would be unmoled in their quest of independence."

Here is a thought that is well worth being taken into account when the forms of government are under consideration: "Unlimited power is the ideal thing when it is in safe hands. The despotism of heaven is the one absolutely perfect government. An earthly despotism would be the absolutely perfect earthly government, if the conditions were the same, namely, the despot the most perfect individual of the human race, and his lease of life perpetual. But as a perishable perfect man must die, and leave his despotism in the hands of an imperfect successor, an earthly despotism is not merely a bad form of government, it is the worst possible."—Mark Twain.

About as valuable a contribution to current comment as to "What Shall We Do With the Negro?" is the following from the pen of that sturdy champion of humanitarianism, the Rev. Charles Stelzle:

"Movement of negroes from the South to take the places of white men in big industrial enterprises has already borne fruit in the East St. Louis race riot.

"With the departure of the immigrant population to the seat of war in Europe, there remained only the Negro to exploit and he has been coming in a steady stream to Northern cities.

"By bringing the black man into competition with the white man, employers of labor have raised a social problem as difficult to meet as any by which our country is confronted.

"Booker T. Washington once said, 'I can not hold any man in the gutter without staying in the gutter myself.'

"And Washington was right. As a matter of self-protection, it behooves us to care for the Negro. If we keep the Negro in the gutter, we shall be compelled to stay there with him.

"Without discussing the race question in any way, let us look at a few outstanding facts in regard to our treatment of the Negro.

"We compel him to live in the worst sections of our towns and cities, often without drainage or sewerage or garbage service, with scarcely any of the sanitary conditions in house or yard or street which whites consider an absolute necessity.

"We drive the worst forms of immorality into the Negro quarters and then curse the Negro because of his moral weakness. If there is to be a red light district in town, it is dumped into the area into which we also dump the Negro population.

"It would be a comparatively easy matter to produce statistics which indicate that the Negro is the worst criminal in the world, but how can he help becoming such? We subject him to the severest tests of our city life—physical, moral and political—and then cynically declare the 'nigger' is no good anyway.

"But there is another side to this question. The negroes who live under these unsanitary conditions are our laundresses, nurses and cooks. If there is contagious disease in their own homes—and there is much of it—they are sure to bring it to our homes, either personally or through the laundry which we send to them.

"There is one big fact we have got to reckon with—the Negro came to the United States against his will and he is going to stay here. He will not return to Africa to establish a Liberian republic, as some people have fondly wished.

"After bringing the Negro to this country, for 250 years we systematically expunged from the Negro race the best qualities which fit a man for citizenship in a democracy.

"It is now simply a question as to whether he is to be a 'good' Negro or a 'bad' Negro, and the answer to this question depends as much upon the whites as it does upon the blacks.

"Let us give the Negro a square deal. Neither race hatred nor mawkish sentimentality will settle this delicate question. The South can not settle it alone and the North can not do the work of the South. The North and the South, the city and the country, must attack the situation together, for this is a national problem."

Substantial reasons why the people of all Europe, outside the realm of ambitious war lords and incorrigible militarists, are yearning for peace and prayerfully looking forward to a cessation of carnage and devastation, may be found in this suggestive summing up of the results of bloody war by the Berliner Tageblatt:

"War loans of $87,000,000,000; loss in dead and wounded, 24,000,000 men; killed, 7,000,000 men; crippled for life, 5,000,000 men; loss through decrease of birth rate in all belligerent countries, 9,000,000 men.

"The gold production of the world during the last five hundred years amounted to $15,000,000,000, or less than one-fifth of the cost of the awful world war. In $5 gold pieces the $87,000,000,000 raised in war loans would form a belt that could be wound around the earth nine times.

"The funeral cortege of the 7,000,000 men killed would reach from Paris to Vladivostok, if one hearse followed the other.

"When the war began, the combined public debt of all European States was a little over $25,000,000,000, and now it is $112,000,000,000. The British merchant fleet in 1914 represented a value of about $950,-

000,000. That is less than the annual interest England now has to pay for her war debt. Before the war Germany exported goods to the amount of $113,000,000 per year to the British colonies. By cutting off this export England can eventually reimburse herself for her losses, but this will take more than two hundred years.

"Germany, with the amount spent by her for the war, could have bought all the cotton fields, the copper mines and the whole petroleum industry of the United States and still would have had several billion dollars left over.

"Russia, with her war expenses, might have covered her immense territories with a net of railways as close as that of Belgium; and France, whose losses in men are larger than the entire male population of Alsace-Lorraine, could have bought all the Portuguese and Dutch colonies with the money she sacrificed for the war.

"With the enormous wealth destroyed by the war, Europe might have been made a paradise on earth instead of a howling wilderness. There is no doubt that the awful struggle would have been avoided if the nations had any idea of its enormity when it started."

Among students of government there is substantial agreement that the more elective officers there are in municipalities and states, the less real democracy exists. This statement, evoked by the huge number of candidates to be voted on at our biennial election, is made on the highest Democratic authority. In his "Constitutional Government in the United States," Woodrow Wilson writes:

"All the peculiarities of party government in the United States are due to the infinite multiplication of elective offices.

* * * The people have, under our constitution and statutes, been assigned the power of filling innumerable elective offices; they are incapable of wielding that power because they have neither the time nor the necessary means of co-operative action; the power has therefore been taken away from them, not by law, but by circumstances, and handed over to those who have the time and the inclination to supply the necessary organization; and the system of election has been transformed into a system of practically irresponsible appointment to office by private party managers. * * * We must decrease the number and complexity of the things the voter has to do; concentrate his attention upon a few men whom he can make responsible, a few objects upon which he can easily center his purpose; make parties his instruments and not his masters by an utter simplification of the things he is expected to look to."

That is evidently good common sense. Woodrow Wilson, in addition to being President of the United States, is president of the Short Ballot League, the aim of which is to reduce the amazing multiplicity of elective officers. The framers of Indiana's first constitution had this point in mind when they provided that the people should vote for only two State officers—Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. For thirty-five years the people of Indiana were entirely content with this arrangement. When, under the new constitution, the list of elective State officers was enlarged by adding a few more, it was not done in response to popular clamor, but rather to conform to the notion that the Legislature should be absolved from the task of choosing Secretary, Auditor and Treasurer of State.

Some of these days the people of Indiana will find ways and means to enable them to vote on the adoption or rejection of a new constitution framed by a convention especially elected for that purpose. In view of the objection commonly interposed to the proposition of such a procedure, it will not be amiss to direct attention to the views held by Thomas Jefferson, father of American Democracy, as expressed by him in a letter addressed to Major John Cartwright, dated at Monticello, June 5, 1824:

"But can they be made unchangeable? Can one generation bind another, and all others, in succession forever? I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living, not the dead. Rights and powers can only belong to persons, not to things, not to mere matter, unendowed with will. The dead are not even things.

The particles of matter which composed their bodies make part now of the bodies of other animals, vegetables or minerals, of a thousand forms. To what, then, are attached the rights and powers they held while in the form of men? A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves. Nothing, then, is unchangeable but the inherent and unalienable rights of man."

Elsewhere he says no constitution should last more than twenty years. That's the limit fixed in the State of New York. Every twenty years the responsibility of framing a new or revised constitution is imposed upon the electorate of the Empire State of the Union. A change may or may not be effected at such stated periods.

Generous space is accorded the foregoing citations in the hope and expectation that they may serve as an incentive to earnest study of the various problems calling for solution in the near or remote future. With the illuminating products of some of the ablest minds of the Republic placed before the studious reader, and conspicuously brought to public attention, these citations ought to prove helpful in forming sound conclusions and reaching righteous decisions. The voice of statesmanship ought to be listened to eagerly and the siren song of demogogy shunned determinedly. The line of distinction between the statesman and the demagogue ought to be sharply drawn. With this end in view there is herewith presented a comprehensive delineation from the masterful pen of a former New York editor, Charles H. Betts, whose keen analysis is unreservedly commended to the thoughtful consideration of every studious reader of these pages:

"In this noisy and sensational age we are told by the false political prophets that we should blow out the light of reason and rely upon the impulses of emotion; that we should disregard the lessons of history and experience and be guided by the noise and confusion of the hour; that we should cease to reverence the wisdom of the fathers and that in order to become progressive we must stand trembling and awe-stricken in the shadow of the babes unborn. I care not what course others may take; but, as for me, I hold that the wisdom of the fathers who founded this republic is a better and safer guide than the noise of their hysterical, office-seeking sons.

"In the Revolutionary period character, stability, brains and statesmanship were necessary to fit a man for leadership. Today all that is required to be a popular idol is to become a poise-making, leather-lunged demagogue—a political jumping jack.

"I can tell you what is the matter with this country. It is being conducted by 10 per cent. of cranks and 15 per cent. of cowards. The 10 per cent. of cranks create the noise. The 15 per cent. of cowards, who are politicians, become frightened, lie down and accept noise as their guide. The other 75 per cent. of normal, decent, intelligent people are absorbed in their own business affairs and give no time to politics or public questions and neglect their civic duties.

"Is it any wonder that the machinery of our representative government is being clogged by ignorance and incompetency?

"We are told that the cure for the 'evils of democracy' is 'more democracy,' which is equivalent to saying that the cure for a lack of brains is more lungs. What we want is not more democracy, but better democracy. What we want, what we need, is fewer talkers and more thinkers, fewer word brokers and more dealers in common sense, fewer curbstone orators selling the people 'balloon common' and more sages and philosophers to mark out the proper ends of government.

"We have in this country too many Platos in politics. They have been correctly characterized by the Hon. Andrew D. White as 'political dreamers and schemers.' They soar around in the rarefied atmosphere of the intellectual Himalayas, and they are out of touch with the earth and with humanity. They are mental aeroplanes. Their chief accomplishment is the creation of theories that will not work. They are the creators of tragedy. It was Professor Huxley who defined a tragedy as 'a theory busted by a fact.'

"These political sophists are so busy these days creating political theories that it is keeping sane and intelligent people working overtime to find facts to bust their fool theories. It is becoming so tiresome that it is making life itself almost a tragedy. But I do not mind this, for I am fond of tragedy. I am never quite so happy as when I am sticking the pins of truths into the frauds of politics.

"I want to call your attention to the fact that there is a vast difference between a demagogue and a statesman. The demagogue aims at temporary success. The statesman aims to be eternally right. The demagogue aims to stand on the quicksand of expediency. The statesman aims to stand on the rock of truth. The statesman in defying the uninformed sentiment of the hour may be and he often is sacrificed, but his name lives in history. The path of progress is paved with the bones of martyrs, but as Bruno has well said, 'Truth is the food of heroic souls.'

"On the other hand, it is the cheap, temporary idols of the hours who cowardly abandon truth and principle in order to win a temporary success, who in all history have furnished the permanent pavement for the bottom of oblivion.

"There has never been a time in the history of our country when we could study the lessons of history and experience with such profit as in the present, and there has never been a time in all our history when we were in greater need of the guidance of the sane wisdom and statesmanship that gave birth to the American republic."

* * *

There is much force to what Professor Harold C. Goddard, of Swarthmore College, says with reference to the necessity of the United States awakening from complacency if it would bring about lasting peace:

"To awaken from complacency, indeed, is the first step the United States must take if it desires peace for itself and to help bring peace to the world. That step taken, it must cease squandering its inheritance and set about the task of mobilizing its disintegrated forces of super-resistance—social, industrial, political, educational, and religious. It must wipe out the stigma of dollar worship by fashioning a creative national purpose. It must focus on itself the admiration of the world by making an America where men are free in fact as well as in name. The program for that work must be bold and imaginative. No half measures will suffice at this crisis of world history. And the working relation that the political part of that program should bear to the question of military preparedness is this: No increase in armament that is not coupled with some social amelioration, some enhancement of genuine democracy, is entitled to a moment's consideration from the American people."

* * *

So long as the American spirit survives the greatest Republic that the world has ever looked upon will move forward to new problems, solved in human uplift, new triumphs won in the extension of the blessings of liberty and peace and plenty not only to a few, but to all capable of utilizing the same. What is this American spirit? It is the golden key that opens the door for humanity into an ever richer future. It is the spirit of independence and the spirit of love for the common humanity around us.

One of the Republic's truly eloquent presidents declared once upon a time that "It behooves the jealousy of a free people to be constantly awake." In Proverbs we are told, truly: "Where there is no vision the people perish." Ruskin was eternally right when he declared: "Every duty we omit obscures some truth we should have known." And I fully concur in the thought expressed by Lyman Abbott not long since: "No man has a right to take part in governing others who has not the intellectual and moral capacity to govern himself." But, alas! That implies an ideal hardly attainable under any sort or system of government known to mankind. The best we may hope for and strive to establish in the main is an alert intelligence and patriotic electorate.

What a man knows should find expression in what he does. The value of superior knowledge is that it leads to a performing manhood.—Bovee.

The only way to love the forest is to stay in it until you have learned its pathless travel, growth and inhabitants as you know the fields. You must begin at the gate and find your way slowly, else you will not hear the great secret and see the compelling vision. There are trees you never before have seen, flowers and vines the botanists fail to mention, and such music as your ears can not hear elsewhere.—Gene Stratton Porter.

* * *

Might we not all resolve that every day we will do at least one act of kindness? Let us write a letter in such terms that the post will bring pleasure next day to some house; make a call just to let a friend know that he has been in our heart; send a gift on someone's birthday, marriage day or any day we can invent. Let us make children glad with things which they long for and can not obtain. And a thousand other things which we could do within a year, if we had eyes to see and a heart to feel and had the will to take some trouble.—Ian Maclaren.

Be not afraid of life. Believe that life is worth living and your belief will help to create the fact.—William James.

Sanctified work is a blessing. The command to labor for six days is as binding as the command to rest on the seventh. Work that is a blessing is work that creates. When creation ceases slavery begins. There must be human interest in work or it deadens both mind and muscles. The shoemaker of the old school used to see a shoe grow under his skill. Love is another element in making a life. Love is not passion; it sanctifies passion. Love is as broad as humanity.—Dr. Emil G. Hirsch.

In a sound sleep the soul goes home to recruit her strength, which could not else endure the wear and tear of life.—Rahel.

PATRIOTISM

The way to be patriotic in America is not only to love America, but to love the duty that lies nearest to our hand and know that in performing it we are serving our country. It is patriotic to learn what the facts of our national life are and to face them with candor. We set this nation up—at any rate, we professed to set it up—to vindicate the rights of men. I would be ashamed of this flag (stars and stripes) if it ever did anything outside America that we would not permit it to do inside of America. When I have made a promise I try to keep it, and I know of no other rule permissible to a nation.—President Woodrow Wilson.

* * *

The test of an American is not where he was born, but what he is doing and will do for the republic. If with resolute heart and clear mind he says, "I am an American. This country is mine. I am for it first and always," he is a good enough American to maintain our prestige, defend our honor and promote our welfare. He is a desirable.—Martin G. Brumbaugh, Governor of Pennsylvania.

America holds out an example a thousand times more encouraging than was ever presented before to those nine-tenths of the human race who are born without hereditary fortune or hereditary rank.—Daniel Webster at Bunker Hill Monument, June 17, 1843.

Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!—Patrick Henry.

* * *

Love of country is one of the loftiest virtues which the Almighty has planted in the human heart, and so treason against it has been considered the most damning of sins.—Emory A. Storrs.

* * *

God grants liberty only to those who love it, and are always ready to guard and defend it.—Justice Story.

* * *

Patriotism, pure and undefiled, is the handmaid of religion. Love of country is twin to the love of God. The instinct of love of country, of patriotism, dwelling in every human breast, is the abiding and unchangeable source of every nation's strength and safety and the inspiration of the most enlightened civilization has been the inspiration of all the people of the earth through all the ages: "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori." Strong as love of country is instinctively, it can, by cultivation, be made stronger in each individual and thus become a source of greater national strength. It is a part of the education and experience of a true man and of the real business of life that he should be a patriot. The instinct of the love of country is as natural as the parental or filial love or as the attachment for home. As the bird returns to the nest, so every fiber of a well-educated and well-developed man swells in sympathy with associations of family, home, community, State or Nation. No man liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself. There can be no well-rounded character in selfish individualism.—Chief Justice Hay Brown of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court.

* * *

To my eye the path of our duty is as clear as the milky way. It is the path of active preparation, of dignified energy. It consists not in abandoning our rights, but in supporting them, as they exist and where they exist—on the ocean as well as on the land.—Josiah Quincy, Jr.

* * *

Be loyal to the United States, your family and your employer. Beware of snakes. Unanimous United States would bring peace quicker than discordant talking machines. Now is no time for wrist-watch patriots. Make cabinet changes early. Lincoln did. Allies did after they made serious mistakes. Wilson should. Present cabinet was organized for peace. War is on. We must prepare quickly and wisely. Get the best. Forget partisan politics.—Frank I. King, Toledo, Ohio.

* * *

I believe that I am not mistaken in seeing these new purposes come into the hearts of men who have not permitted themselves hitherto to see what they now look upon. For the Nation cannot move successfully by anything except concert of purpose and of judgment. You cannot whip a nation into line. You cannot drive your leaders before you. You have got to have a spirit that thrills the whole body, and I believe that that spirit is now beginning to thrill the whole body. Men are finding that they will be bigger business men as they will spend some of their brains on something that has nothing to do with themselves, and that the more you extend the use of your energy the more energy you have got to spend even upon your own affairs—that enrichment comes with the enlargement, and that with the enrichment comes the increase of power.—Governor Woodrow Wilson at Trenton, January 13, 1913.

* * *

It is my duty as an educated American citizen; your duty, young gentlemen, is to see to it that the sun of opportunity shall not drop below the horizon and gild the few mountain peaks of education and wealth and refinement, while the great masses of the people, like the great valleys, are shrouded in the gloom and privations of poverty and ignorance, but that this glorious sun that is enlightening you and me shall rise to the meridian splendor in the firmament of American life, and bathe the lowliest home in its effulgent glory.—U. S. Senator Ellison D. Smith to Students of South Carolina University.

The very colors (of our flag) have a language which was officially recognized by our fathers. White is for purity, red for valor, blue for justice; and all together—stripes, stars and colors, blazing in the sky—make the flag of our country, to be cherished by all our hearts, to be upheld by all our hands.—Charles Sumner.

* * *

Great and worthy of all gratitude and fame were those men who have devoted their best faculties, poured out their best blood, for the land they called their own; but greater far, and more worthy of gratitude, and of purer and more enduring fame, are the very few who lived not for an age, a country, but for all ages, for all mankind; who did not live to preach up this or that theory, to insist on this or that truth, to sustain this or that sect or party, but who lived to work out the intellectual and spiritual good, and to promote the progress of the whole human race, to kindle within the individual mind the light which is true freedom, or leads to it. Such was the example left by Jesus Christ, such a man was Shakespeare, such a man was Goethe.—Mrs. Jameson.

* * *

Democracy is the grand adventure in the growth of civilization. Whenever men have struggled to be free the world has progressed; but, after all, popular government is still an experiment measured in terms of world history. Above all, the struggle is not a political one. You and I and all men live lives that are more industrial and commercial and economic than political. And so political freedom is only a part of democracy—a part that has long since been won. What the people want is not only political freedom—it is industrial freedom and the equality of opportunity. Industrial monopoly is simply industrial monarchy.—Joseph E. Davies.

This is the best government on earth—the one most responsive to the will of the people, but it is a government of the people—not of one or a few men. If a few are permitted to resist a law—any law—because they do not like it, government becomes a farce. The law must be enforced—resistance is anarchy.—W. J. Bryan.

* * *

The foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality. There exists in the course of nature an indissoluble union of virtue and happiness, between duty and advantage, between honest policy and public felicity. The smiles of heaven can never be expected on a government that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which heaven itself has ordained.—George Washington, President of the United States. April, 1789.

We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrongs done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized States.—Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. April, 1917.

* * *

It is a question of loyalty, not of nativity. Those Americans, of German birth or lineage, who have plighted their vows and adopted America as their home and their hope, establishing themselves among us, as one of us, and making common cause with us, are as good Americans as the rest of us, and are to be congratulated and encouraged rather than discouraged and condemned merely from a nationality.—President Woodrow Wilson.

WORDS OF WISDOM AND TRUTH

In maintaining that play is an essential element in making a life there must be spoken a word of caution about amusements. Whatever wastes the strength of body or mind and destroys the purity of the soul is not legitimate play. Dancing is not essentially irreligious. David danced before the ark. But those dances which weaken the moral sense and give offense to purity are irreligious and are damaging to character. The final element in making a life is worship. Worship is the acknowledgment of our limitations. To refuse to worship is to manifest selfishness. Self-sufficient men cannot worship. We are all compelled to make a living, but for completeness of living we must all make a life.—Dr. Emil G. Hirsch, Chicago.

* * *

The man who succeeds above his fellows is the one who, early in life, clearly discerns his object, and toward that object habitually directs his powers. Thus, indeed, even genius itself is but fine observation strengthened by fixity of purpose. Every man who observes vigilantly and resolves steadfastly grows unconsciously into genius.—Bulwer-Lytton.

It has been a thousand times observed, and I must observe it once more, that the hours we pass with happy prospects in view are more pleasing than those crowned with fruition.—Goldsmith.

Phobism is an addition to fear (another name for worry). If smugness be unlovely from a social point of view, phobism is fatal to its victim. Did it ever occur to you that fear can become a habit and a luxury, just as smoking is? But phobism is the more hazardous. We fear poverty, we fear disease, we fear death, we fear that we shall be snubbed socially. And each separate fear impairs our capacity for work in a definite, measurable way. I know many people addicted to the use of fear. Some of them use it to excess. To the psychologist fear is the most expensive of all habits that people indulge. Ninety-nine and forty-four one hundredths per cent. of fear is as useless as a deckhand on a submarine.—Elliott Park Frost.

I believe that the country, which God made, is more beautiful than the city, which man made; that life out of doors and in touch with the earth is the natural life of man. I believe that work is work wherever we find it, but that work with nature is more inspiring than work with the most intricate machinery. I believe that the dignity of labor depends not on what you do, but how you do it; that opportunity comes to a boy on the farm as often as to a boy in the city; that life is larger and freer and happier on the farm than in the town; that my success depends not upon my location, but upon myself—not upon my dreams, but upon what I actually do—not upon luck, but upon pluck. I believe in working when you work, and in playing when you play, and in giving and demanding a square deal in every act of life.—Edwin Osgood Grover.

The helmet of salvation is worn on the head. For 1900 years it has proven itself the best head protection known to man. Millions of people are getting all sorts of crazy fads and isms in their heads nowadays. But I have never known a really saved man to take up with any of the quack nostrums of man's devising. The power of salvation experienced in the soul is the best safeguard against false doctrine.—Rev. Henry B. Hostetter.

Just try, by taking a few minutes a day—if you cannot take more—to live upon the heights to give heed to that noble and beautiful thing within you which is the real you, which wants to grow and develop. Do not quarrel, therefore, with your lot in life. Do not complain of its never ceasing cares, its petty environment, the vexations you have to stand, the small and sordid souls you have to live and work with. Above all, do not resent temptation, do not be perplexed because it seems to thicken 'round you more and more, and ceases neither for effort nor for agony nor prayer. That is your practice. That is the practice which God appoints you. And it is having its work in making you patient, and humble, and generous, and unselfish, and kind, and courteous.—Henry Drummond.

TO LIVE LONG LIVE SIMPLY.—From the days of Cornaro down to the present those who have experimented in prolonging life are united upon one point: Live simply and eat very moderately; if the body is choked with waste its organs can not function properly. It is an almost universal custom to eat more than is needed to sustain the body in health. We eat for pleasure long after the needs of the body are met. And by overeating we shorten life. Louis Cornaro was born with a weak constitution. At forty he was subject to severe illnesses and was in appearance and feeling an old man. At this time he took himself strictly in hand and began to eat only what he could readily assimilate. He made it a rule to rise from the table while he still felt a disposition to eat and drink more. As he advanced in years he became still more abstemious. As a result he reached the century mark in good health, with a mind clear and bodily organs well preserved.—John R. Matthews.

ODD FACTS ABOUT PRESIDENTS AND VICE-PRESIDENTS

Possibly you have forgotten some of these incidents relating to Presidents and Vice-Presidents of the United States:

Washington was the one President to be elected unanimously.

The only Vice-President to resign was John C. Calhoun, who gave up the Vice-Presidency to become a United States Senator.

William Henry Harrison served the shortest time as President, having caught a fatal cold the day he was inaugurated and died exactly one month later.

Impeachment was tried against but one President and failed by one vote, in the case of Andrew Johnson.

Johnson was a tailor and could not read until his wife taught him how.

Five Vice-Presidents became President by the death of the President—Tyler, Fillmore, Johnson, Arthur and Roosevelt.

No physician, preacher or journalist has become President.

Cleveland was the only President to have someone else sandwiched between his two terms, Benjamin Harrison being the sandwich.

John Adams was not only the oldest of ex-Presidents when he died, being more than 90, but lived the longest after leaving office, about twenty-five years.

Relatively, Washington was the richest President, but his private income was hardly equal to that of Roosevelt.

Colonel Roosevelt was the only Vice-President to attain the presidency by another's death and then be honored by a reelection.

Buchanan went through his term a bachelor.

Woodrow Wilson and James A. Garfield were college presidents and Jefferson founded the University of Virginia after he retired from the White House.

The following were Master Masons: George Washington, Andrew Jackson, James K. Polk, James Buchanan, Andrew Johnson, James A. Garfield, William McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Taft.

Washington, Monroe, Jackson, the two Harrisons, Taylor, Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, Hayes, McKinley and Roosevelt were soldiers.

Lincoln's Gettysburg speech and Washington's farewell address are quoted far more frequently than any other presidential utterances.

Cleveland's "Public office is a public Trust," Grant's "Let us have peace," Jackson's "By the eternal," and Roosevelt's "Malefactors of great wealth" became universal catchwords. So did Rutherford B. Hayes's saying, "He serves his party best who serves his country best."

One President was inaugurated in New York, two in Philadelphia, and all the others in Washington.

The official salute for the President is twenty-one guns. A salute of 101 guns was fired for King Edward when the proclamation was read. When the body of Napoleon was brought back from St. Helena and arrived in the River Seine a salute of one thousand guns was fired.

At the seventeenth presidential election, 1852, thirty-one States took part with 296 electoral votes. Forty-nine ballots were necessary in the Democratic convention before Franklin Pierce was nominated, a veritable "dark horse." Only three candidates were before the Whig convention—General Winfield Scott, Millard Fillmore and Daniel Webster. Scott was nominated on the fifty-third ballot, but obtained only forty-two electoral votes as compared with 254 for Pierce. It was the last campaign of the Whig party.

CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON

By Thomas Jefferson

His mind was great and powerful, without being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of Newton, Bacon or Locke; and as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder.

It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination, but sure in conclusion. Hence the common remark of his officers, of the advantage he derived from councils of war, where hearing all suggestions, he selected whatever was best; and certainly no General ever planned his battles more judiciously. But if deranged during the course of the action, if any member of his plan was dislocated by sudden circumstances, he was slow in a readjustment.

The consequence was, that he often failed in the field, and rarely against an enemy in station, as at Boston and New York. He was incapable of fear, meeting personal dangers with calm unconcern.

Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration was maturely weighed; refraining if he saw a doubt, but when once decided, going through with his purpose, whatever obstacles opposed. His integrity was most pure, his justice the most flexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was, indeed, in every sense of the words, a wise, a good, and a great man.

If ever, however, it broke its bonds, he was most tremendous in his wrath. In his expenses he was honorable, but exact; liberal in contributions to whatever promised utility, but frowning and unyielding on all visionary projects and all unworthy calls on his charity. His heart was not warm in its affections, but he exactly calculated every man's value and gave him a solid esteem proportioned to it. His person, you know, was fine, his stature exactly what one would wish; his deportment easy, erect and noble; the best horseman of his age, and the most graceful figure that could be seen on horseback.

Although in the circle of his friends, where he might be unreserved with safety, he took a free share in conversation, his colloquial talents were not above mediocrity, possessing neither copiousness of ideas nor fluency of words. In public, when called on for a sudden opinion, he was unready, short and embarrassed. Yet he wrote readily, rather diffusely, in an easy and correct style. This he had acquired by conversation with the world, for his education was merely reading, writing and common arithmetic, to which he added surveying at a later day. His time was employed in action chiefly, reading little, and that only in agriculture and English history. His correspondence became necessarily extensive, and, with journalizing his agricultural proceedings, occupied most of his leisure hours within doors.

On the whole, his character was, in its mass perfect, in nothing bad, in few points indifferent; and it may truly be said that never did nature and fortune combine more completely to make a man great and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man and everlasting remembrance. For his was the singular destiny and merit of leading the armies of his country successfully through an arduous war for the establishment of its independence; of conducting its country through the birth of a government, new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train; and of scrupulously obeying the laws through the whole of his career, civil and military, of which the history of the world furnishes no other example.

MEN IN HIGH OFFICE SHORT-LIVED

To be a President, Vice-President, Senator, or Congressman is to die before one's time is the opinion of Professor Irving Fisher of Yale. He is the author of the following table:

| | Age when inaugurated | Years from inaug. to death | Expectation of life | Pct. of expectancy lived |

Omitting the President and the ex-Presidents now living and those that were assassinated, we find that Presidents only live out 93 per cent. of their "expected" lives. They started as men of unusual vitality, but the duties of the office are so strenuous that a proper regard for personal hygiene is impossible, and in consequence they suffer an average loss of 7 per cent. of the years to which they are entitled according to the law of averages.

The tendency to curtailment of life among the Vice-Presidents is even more marked. While they do not work so hard, worry so much, or carry so much responsibility, they must feast and wine and banquet and discharge social duties.

By contrast Professor Fisher shows that a man gains 37 per cent. over his expectancy of life by being a president of Yale University.

Averaging the Congressmen in thirty Congresses, it was found that the average Congressman only lives out 82 per cent. of his expectancy. Going to Congress on the average shortens a man's life 18 per cent.

While the strenuous life is responsible for some of the shortening of the lives of Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Senators and Congressmen, bad hygiene is a larger factor. The chief causes emphasized by Professor Fisher are: Indoor and sedentary living; a crouching, cramping posture; late dinners, overeating especially of meats, eggs and rich foods; overconcentration, or lack of bulk in diet, hasty eating, constipation, irregular hours, lack of sleep, worry and the use of drugs, especially narcotics, like alcohol and tobacco. These errors in personal hygiene, Dr. Evans says, also shorten the lives of those in humbler walks of life.

SHORT HISTORIES of the Counties of Indiana

ARRANGED ALPHABETICALLY

1816—1918

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF ADAMS COUNTY

THE history of the Democracy of Adams county is the story of nearly eighty years of continuous and unbroken victories for the party of the people—four-score years, during which time only Democrats have filled the various places of trust in one of the best agricultural communities on God's footstool. It is the proud boast of the still "unterrified" leaders of Democracy in this county that a Republican has never been elected to a county office here, and the fact that this county now has more than five hundred miles of macadam roads, farms unequalled in the State, beautiful homes, splendid towns and cities, modern public buildings and no public debt, tell the story of how well and faithfully these officials have performed their duties.

Here as elsewhere, no doubt, the early history is to a large extent blurred because of the lack of records and because those men who made it have long since passed to their reward, but from one source and another many facts of interest which, linked together, give a fairly good impression of work well performed have been obtained.

Adams county began its existence by an enactment of the Indiana General Assembly in 1836, and the first election was held on the first Monday of April in that year. At that time the Democratic county chairman was James B. Simcoke and the first officials elected in the county were John S. Rhea, Samuel Smith and William Heath, commissioners, their duty being to select the county seat and to divide the county into townships; Samuel L. Rugg, clerk; David McKnight, sheriff and assessor, and John K. Evans, collector of state and county revenues. The first state representative was Col. William Vance, elected in 1839 by a majority of but three votes.

In 1840 the first township elections were held and many interesting stories are told by the old-timers of the fights at the ballot-box in those days. Usually, however, the trouble seemed to be in securing enough candidates. It is told that in Monroe township in 1840 the election was held at the home of Henry Martz, who was also the inspector. Seven votes were cast and every man secured an office.

A complete list of county chairmen is impossible, but among those who have served during the past third of a century are: J. T. France, C. J. Lutz, J. W. Tyndall, J. W. McKean, John C. Moran, R. K. Erwin, D. N. Erwin, J. F. Snow, L. G. Ellingham, J. W. Bosse and T. J. Gallogly. The present chairman is Henry B. Heller.

The most prominent Democrat in the old days of this county was Samuel L. Rugg, who donated the ground for all the public buildings and many churches in the city of Decatur. He served as county clerk and recorder, was a state senator in 1854 and in 1858 was elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction, being the third man to fill that position in Indiana. He was defeated in 1860 for the same office, but again elected a year later when Mr. Miles Fletcher, who had defeated him, died and a special election was ordered.

Among the Democrats who were successful in local affairs and received considerable notice from over the state were Judge David Studabaker, who served as state senator; Judge James R. Bobo, also a state senator, and Judge D. D. Heller, all of whom served upon the circuit court bench. For many years this county, though known as a safe Democratic stronghold, did not produce any ambitious men for state or national positions, or perhaps because of the Democratic majority here it was deemed better politics to select candidates from other counties; at any rate, for half a century or more this county did not have a candidate for a state position. However, during the past few years we have come in for a goodly share. Lewis G. Ellingham, who retired in 1914 after four years as Secretary of State, is a resident of this county; Judge Richard K. Erwin, late chief justice of the Indiana Supreme Court, and J. Frederick France, now serving his second term as clerk of the Supreme Court, were natives of this county and a quarter-century ago were law partners in Decatur. Herman L. Conter, former Deputy Secretary of State, and now a candidate for Secretary of State, is also a resident here.

The first Democratic newspaper in Adams county was published in 1852 and was known as the Adams County Democrat, J. B. Simcoke being its editor, and the paper continued until 1863, when it was swallowed by the Decatur Eagle, which had been established in 1857, the first edition being on February 13 of that year. In 1874 The Eagle changed its name to The Decatur Democrat and continued so until two years ago, when it ceased to live, having lost out in the rush of progress and its place was taken by The Daily Democrat, a four, six and eight-page paper with 3,000 circulation, published each evening. Editors of The Eagle were H. L. Phillips, W. G. Spencer, A. J. Hill, Charles Schirmeyer, Callen & Hudgel, J. R. Bobo, T. Addlesperger, and of The Democrat have been Joseph McGonagle, S. Ray Williams, A. J. Hill, Roth & Cummons, Norval Blackburn,

Lew G. Ellingham and John H. Heller. Mr. Ellingham purchased The Democrat in 1896 and was the owner of the controlling interest until 1916, when he sold his holdings to Mr. Heller. The Daily Democrat started in 1903, with Mr. Ellingham as editor and Mr. Heller as manager. Its growth has been remarkable, and it is now a substantial and going business institution. From time to time during the years opposition Democratic papers have been established to The Democrat, but always these have been short-lived. Among these have been The Decatur Herald, 1873-1874, Worden & Bobo; Adams County Times, 1876-1877, W. W. Timmons; The Democratic Press, 1894-1896, L. G. Ellingham.

The present officers of Adams county are: Judge, David E. Smith; prosecuting attorney, J. Fred Fruchte; clerk, Will Hammell; auditor, John Mosure; treasurer, George Kinzel; recorder, A. C. Augsburg; sheriff, Ed. Green; surveyor, Orval Harruff; coroner, D. D. Clark; commissioners, William Reppert, David Dilling and Robert Schwartz; county superintendent, Ed. S. Christen; superintendent county farm, Martin Laughlin; road superintendent, J. A. Hendricks; representative, Joseph Walker.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF ALLEN COUNTY

By Louis S. C. Schroeder

ORGANIZATION.

THE territory now comprised within the bounds of Allen county was carved, almost wholly, out of the county of Randolph, although the act creating the county was entitled, "An Act for the formation of a new county out of the counties of Randolph and Delaware." That act was approved on the 17th day of December, 1823, at the suggestion of General John Tipton. The new county, whose legal existence was to begin in April following the passage of the act, was named Allen, in memory of Colonel John Allen of Kentucky, who was killed at the battle of the River Raisin on the 22d day of January, 1813.

By the third section of the act, Lot Bloomfield and Caleb Lewis of Wayne county, William Conner of Hamilton county and James M. Ray of Marion county were appointed commissioners to determine and locate the seat of justice for the new county. It further provided that said commissioners should convene at the house of Alexander Ewing, at Fort Wayne, on the fourth Monday thereafter and proceed immediately to discharge the duties assigned. Fort Wayne was determined upon and fixed as the seat of justice.

It is the largest county in the State, having an area of 650 square miles. The principal towns outside of Fort Wayne are Arcola, Grabill, Hoagland, Monroeville, Maysville (Harlan P. O.), New Haven and Shirley City (Woodburn P. O.). Population in 1915 estimated at 110,000. The county is divided into twenty townships, as follows: Adams, Aboite, Cedar Creek, Eel River, Jackson, Jefferson, Lafayette, Lake, Madison, Marion, Maumee, Milan, Monroe, Perry, Pleasant, Scipio, Springfield, Saint Joe, Wayne and Washington.

Pursuant to the first section of the act "for carrying the laws into effect in the new county," William Hendricks, Governor of the State by commission dated April 2, 1824, appointed Allen Hamilton Sheriff of Allen county until the next general election and until his successor should be elected and qualified—should he so long behave well. Under that appointment, and in compliance with a further provision of the said section, Mr. Hamilton, as such Sheriff, gave notice to the qualified voters of Allen county authorizing and directing them to hold an election on the 22d day of May, 1824, for the purpose of electing two Associate Judges of the Circuit Court, one Clerk of the Circuit Court, one Recorder and the Commissioners of the county. Samuel Hanna and Benjamin Cushman were elected Associate Judges; Anthony L. Davis, Clerk and Recorder; William Rockhill, Commissioner for a term of three years, from the 22d day of May, 1824; James Wynan for two years, and Francis Compere for one year from said date.

As late as 1842 the Democrats of Allen county had never effected an organization. A few of the more active members of the party in the city usually, but quietly, named the candidates. This, however, did not suit the farmers and the result was that a meeting of several prominent men from the townships was held at Peter Kiser's place of business, who sent for Judge James W. Borden and requested him to draw up a plan of organization. When he presented the Berks county (Pennsylvania) plan, which called for a delegate convention, the convention was called and the plan, through Colonel Woodard, a farmer from Aboite township, was adopted and controlled the action of the party until 1906, when Eugene B. Smith was chairman of the Allen county central committee. An agitation for a primary nomination prevailed and the county central committee decided upon a primary nomination, which was held in June, 1906. All the Democratic county officers were nominated by the people and with two exceptions were elected in November that year. The expense of said primary election was borne by the several candidates and amounted to a little over two thousand dollars. A larger amount was collected than was found necessary, so the balance was prorated and returned to the candidates. The people continued to agitate for primary nominations and in 1907 the State Legislature passed the primary law for the political parties of the State, which was approved March 12, 1907, and up to the present time controls the action of the Democratic party of the county.

Five court houses have been erected in Allen county. The first court house was finished in 1832 at a cost of $3,322. This was demolished in 1841 and a one-story building erected in the southeast corner of the square in 1843. Small structures to house the various county officers were built on the other corners of the square while the court house was used for court sessions. A two-story edifice of brick standing in the center of the square was built in 1847. This was used until 1862, in which year a fourth building was erected at a cost of $74,271. It was a handsome brick structure, surrounded by a broad lawn. This, however, gave way to the present magnificent court house completed October 3, 1900. The total cost of the building and ground was $817,600.

THE COURTS.

Circuit Court—Prior to 1875 Allen county was joined with several other counties in a judicial circuit. By an act approved March 9, 1875, Allen county was constituted the Thirty-eighth Judicial Circuit and so remains (1915). Judge Robert Lowry remained the Judge of the several circuits of which Allen county was a part, when he resigned to resume the practice of law at Fort Wayne. Upon his resignation the Hon. William W. Carson was appointed by Governor Hendricks to serve as Judge of the Circuit Court until the succeeding election in 1876. At the general election referred to Hon. Edward O'Rourke was elected Judge of the Allen Circuit Court. He continued to serve as Judge for thirty-six years, when at the general election of 1912 John W. Eggeman was elected and is serving his first term of six years.

Criminal Court—By an act approved on the 11th day of May, 1867, a Criminal Court was established in Allen county, with exclusive criminal jurisdiction. The act provided for a Judge to be appointed by the Governor and to serve until the ensuing general election. At the October election in 1867 Judge James W. Borden was elected Judge of the court for a term of four years. His term extended until 1871, but by reason of the annual election having been dispensed with by the act of 1869, it became necessary to elect a Judge of the Criminal Court at the general election in 1870, whose term should commence in October, 1871. At that election Hon. Joseph Brackenridge was elected Judge and held the office until October, 1875. At the general election in 1874 Judge Borden was again elected Judge and was re-elected in 1878 for a term of four years. He died in office on the 26th day of April, 1882. At the November election in 1882 Samuel M. Hench was elected Judge of the Criminal Court and held the office until the 31st day of October, 1884, at which time the court ceased to exist by virtue of an act of the Legislature, approved February 27, 1883.

Probate Court—An act of the Legislature, approved on the 29th day of January, 1829, provided for the establishment of a Probate Court in each county of the State, the Judge of which was to be elected by the people of the county. It was not required that the Judge should be a "professional character," but in order to receive a commission from the Governor he was required to produce a certificate by a judge of a Circuit Court, or of the Supreme Court, that he was qualified to discharge the duties of the office. The only Democrat serving as Judge of this court was Reuben J. Dawson, who was appointed in February, 1840, and served until the 9th day of November, 1840.

Courts of Common Pleas—By a general act approved on the 14th day of May, 1852, courts of common pleas were created in all counties of the State, and the counties of Allen, Adams, Huntington and Wells were constituted as a district. The act provided for the election of a Judge at the October election in 1852 and fixed the term of office at four years. The act also gave the court exclusive probate jurisdiction. At the October election in 1852 Hon. James W. Borden was elected Common Pleas Judge of the district of which Allen county was a part, as above stated, and he opened the court in Allen county on the 3d day of January, 1853. He was re-elected in 1856 and held the office until 1857, when he resigned. Upon the resignation of Judge Borden in 1857, Hon. Joseph Brackenridge was appointed Judge to serve until the succeeding election. At the general election in October, 1858, he was elected to fill out the unexpired term for which Judge Borden had been elected in 1856. Under that election he held the office until 1860, when he was elected for a full term of four years and held the office until 1864, when Judge Borden was again elected Judge of the Common Pleas Court and held the office until the 29th day of October, 1867, when he resigned. In 1870 Hon. William W. Carson was elected to fill out the term which expired with the October election, 1872. At that election Samuel E. Sinclair was elected for a term of four years. He held that position until March, 1873, when the court was abolished by an act of the Legislature.

Superior Court of Allen County—The Superior Court of Allen county was established by an act of the Legislature approved on the 5th day of March, 1877. Soon after the passage of the act Governor Williams appointed Allen Zollars Judge of the court, but as the act was not to take effect until the following August, the commission was not issued until the 7th day of that month. Under that commission Mr. Zollars would have been entitled to hold the office until the October election, 1878. After hearing some habeas corpus cases in vacation, he formally opened the court on the 10th day of September, 1877, and presided until about the 20th day of the month, when he resigned and resumed his practice. Upon his resignation Hon. Robert Lowry was appointed Judge of the court and held the office until the general election in October, 1878. At that time he was elected by the people for a term of four years and held the office until after the general election in November, 1882. At that election Hon. James L. Worden was elected Judge for the term of four years. He died on the 2d day of June, 1884. At the general election in November, 1884, Hon. Samuel M. Hench was elected Judge of the Superior Court and served until the general election in 1886. At the general elections in 1886, 1890, 1894 and 1898 Hon. C. M. Dawson was elected Judge of the Superior Court, who died during his last term of office. In 1900 John H. Aiken was elected. In 1910 and 1914 Carl Yaple was elected Judge of the Superior Court and is now serving his second term.

Juvenile Court—By a general act approved March 10, 1903, a Juvenile Court in all counties of the State was created. The act provided that in the counties that do not contain 100,000 inhabitants the Judge of the Circuit Court shall be the Judge of the Juvenile Court. It further provided that there shall be appointed by the Judge of the Circuit Court having jurisdiction one discreet person of good moral character who shall be known as Probation Officer; provided, that said Judge, if in his opinion the circumstances require, may appoint a second person as probation officer. Since establishing the court in Allen county the following officers have served the court: Special Prosecuting Attorneys, H. I. Smith, Frank Dulin and William Freuchtenicht, who is serving at the present time; Probation Officers, Jesse Patten, who served for thirteen years, and Wesley I. Work, who is the present Probation Officer, having been appointed in 1912. The Assistant Probation Officer is Miss Fannie Winch, who is also Police Matron of the city of Fort Wayne.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF BARTHOLOMEW COUNTY

BARTHOLOMEW COUNTY was organized under an act of the General Assembly approved January 9, 1821. Subsequently and incident to the formation of new counties and the consequent shifting of boundary lines, some changes have been made in the geographical outline of the county. In the early history of the State the territory comprised in Bartholomew county was a part of Delaware county and included the greater part of Brown county. The present area of Bartholomew county is about four hundred square miles, approximating two hundred and fifty-six thousand acres.

From its organization to the present time Bartholomew county has been safely Democratic, with the exception of a few years, when the Republican party was in control. Until the organization of the Republican party the Whig party was the dominant opposition party in the county, but in the early history of the county political lines were not tightly drawn, and from time to time there were political fusions. The first commissioners of the county were William Ruddick, Jesse Ruddick and Solomon Stout, all of whom were Democrats. With the exception of the occasional election of a Republican county official the Democrats held Bartholomew county from the Civil War until 1896, when the Democratic party of the county struck on the rock of free silver and was thrown off its course. From that time the Republican party controlled the county until 1908, when the Democratic party again righted itself and regained complete control of the county, which it still holds. The present officials of the county, all of whom are Democrats, are: State Senator, E. A. Norman; Representative, John M. Thompson; Prosecuting Attorney, Lewis A. Harding; Auditor, William H. Scott; Clerk, Leon J. Cox; Treasurer, John W. Scheidt; Sheriff, Matt Shaw; Recorder, Ed. Horton; Assessor, William C. Smith; Coroner, Dr. L. E. Bracken; Surveyor, Lloyd Rogers; Commissioners, Jacob Stucker, Charles F. Boyer and John Seele.

Columbus, a city of 12,000 souls, is the county seat of Bartholomew county and, like the county, has been under Democratic control almost from its organization. Since 1870 the Republicans have had but eight years of complete control of the city administrations.

Bartholomew county has been carried by Democratic presidential candidates as follows: 1828 and 1832, Andrew Jackson; 1844, James K. Polk; 1848, Zachary Taylor; 1852, Franklin Pierce; 1856, James Buchanan; 1860, Stephen A. Douglas; 1864, George B. McClellan; 1868, Horatio Seymour; 1876, S. J. Tilden; 1880, Winfield Scott Hancock; 1884, Grover Cleveland; 1888, Grover Cleveland; 1892, Grover Cleveland; 1896, William J. Bryan; 1900, William J. Bryan; 1908, William J. Bryan, and in 1912, Woodrow Wilson.

Bartholomew county has been represented in the General Assembly by the following Democratic Senators and Representatives: Senators, Zachariah Tannehill, Smith Jones, Francis T. Hord, Thomas Greenlee, Oliver J. Glessner, Dr. J. B. Grove, R. L. Coffee, W. C. Duncan, Richard A. Fulk, Emanuel Trautmann and E. A. Norman. Representatives: John Lindsay, Jesse A. Ruddick, Jacob Cook, Thomas G. Lee, John McKinney, Z. Tannehill, W. F. Arnold, Eliakim Hamblen, Aquilla Jones, Ephraim Arnold, Charles Jones, Thomas Essex, Colin McKinney, Joseph Struble, Francis P. Smith, O. H. P. Abbott, Stinson J. Barrett, Dr. E. K. Hawley, John M. Kline, Alfred Williams, Dr. J. M. Cook, Arthur D. Galbraith, P. H. McCormack, Louis Donhost, D. W. Heagy, Joseph F. Ghent, Benjamin F. Kobbe, James F. Cox, John Hill, V. D. Ault and John M. Thompson.

While Bartholomew county was not frequently or numerously represented in the State or national councils of the Democratic party it was ably represented. Nathan T. Carr was elected to Congress in 1876 to succeed Michael C. Kerr, who died in office. Mr. Carr was a member of the House of Representatives when the debate was on over the historic electoral commission following the Tilden-Hayes campaign and which commission seated Rutherford B. Hayes in the White House and he spoke and voted against the commission. After the action of the commission was announced Mr. Carr delivered a scathing address in the House in denunciation of his colleagues, who had favored the commission, which gained for him a nation-wide reputation as an orator, a wit and satirist. While Mr. Carr was a brilliant lawyer and gifted statesman, he was eccentric and while practicing law he carried the following advertisement in the newspapers: "Nathan T. Carr, Lawyer, practices in all courts of the State. Special attention given to divorce cases and all other cases in which innocent persons are charged with crime."

George W. Cooper was elected to Congress in 1888 and served three terms. He introduced in the House the bill which, when it became a law, provided a tax on all greenbacks. While in Congress Mr. Cooper brought about an investigation of the pension department by which much good was accomplished not alone for the department, but for the nation as well. When the government decided to establish free rural mail delivery Mr. Cooper succeeded in getting Bartholomew county chosen as one of three experimental stations in which to try out the new system. It was while Mr. Cooper was a member of Congress that he chanced to save a rustic of his county from being illegally sent to a penitentiary. He was at the depot awaiting a train for Washington when a constable from an out township arrived with a prisoner. The congressman engaged the constable in conversation and learned that the prisoner had been convicted before a justice of the peace of the theft of a hog and had been sentenced to State prison. Mr. Cooper voluntarily took the case up for the prisoner and prevented his commitment to the State prison.

Francis T. Hord was elected Attorney-General of Indiana in 1882 and served two years. While in office Attorney-General Hord won the case of the State of Indiana vs. the Portsmouth Bank, brought to recover Beaver Lake to the State, and by this action the right of the State to the lake beds of Indiana was settled for all time.

In 1894 W. C. Duncan was appointed to the position of State Statistician of Indiana, a position which he held for twenty years, and in 1914 Charles S. Talkington was appointed to the position of Superintendent of the Indiana State penal farm, which was established the previous year.

The first Democratic newspaper of consequence published in Bartholomew county was founded in 1848 by John R. Tinkle, who published it until 1850, when he sold it to Aquilla Jones and W. F. Pidgeon. In 1852 W. C. Stateler became proprietor of the paper and changed its name to the Indiana Democrat. In 1861 the paper was bought by Rev. William Howe, who sold it in 1888 to Judge Nathan T. Carr, who changed the name to the Columbus Bulletin. In 1872 Carr sold the paper to John D. Lyle, who changed the name to the Bartholomew County Democrat. George E. Finney was employed as editor and later obtained an interest, when the name of the paper was changed to the Columbus Democrat. In 1878 the paper was bought by J. N. Marsh, who continued its publication until 1880, when he sold it to J. A. Arnold and under whose ownership publication was suspended in 1885. In 1881 the Columbus Herald, which is still in existence, and which is now the only Democratic newspaper in Bartholomew county, was founded by George E. Finney and Charles H. Lacy. Within a year after the paper was founded the publication of a daily edition, the Columbus Evening Herald, was begun. In 1892 the paper was bought by A. J. Dipboye and M. A. Locke, but a few years later Locke bought Dipboye's interest and still retains the sole ownership of the paper, together with three other papers which he has bought and merged with the Herald. These three papers were the Times, started in the early 90's and owned by J. N. Marsh; the Driftwood Democrat, started by Dr. E. K. Hawley and Samuel Denison and later as the Democrat, bought by Walter C. Galbraith; the Star, started by E. H. Kinney and published for a time as a Republican paper, but later changed by him to a Democratic paper.

Among the leading Democratic workers of the county in the early days, men who ever stood by their guns, men who helped to hold their party to the fore and roll up majorities ranging from 800 to 1,000, but who have gone to their spiritual reward, might be mentioned: Thomas Essex, Minas Lowe, William R. Spurgeon, James W. Wells, David Stobo, John Stobo, Thomas May, Miles Thompson, Joseph Andrews, Jabel Smith, John D. Lyle, Dr. J. W. Allen, Jesse Walker, Eli Marqueth, Louis Donhost, Christopher Martin, Adam Fishel, Solomon Lambert, Isaac Lucas, Samuel Stuckey, Allen Hull, Webber Smith, Nelson Keyes, W. W. Mooney, Patrick Sweeney, Frank Everroad, Frank Whittington, Peter Holtz, Archie Thompson, Thomas Kennedy, Archie McEwen and Peter Johnson.

James W. Wells, a former Auditor of the county, but long since dead, and W. C. Smith were longer in the court house in official positions than any other Democrats in the county. Wells was Auditor or Deputy Auditor of the county for twenty-five years, and Smith, who is the present County Assessor, took an old violin forty-five years ago and with it "fiddled" himself into the court house as Sheriff, where he has since remained almost continuously in one official position or another.

In the early history of the county the game of politics was evidently played along pretty much the same lines as at present, for in the early forties a legislator from Bartholomew county who was in the Legislature when the internal improvement bill, which eventually cost the State fourteen million dollars, is quoted as reporting to his constituency that "There are so many of them lobsters in the Legislature working for the infernal improvement bill that there is no room for the members."

Among the chairmen of the Democratic County Central Committees of Bartholomew county who have made good records for themselves and for their party are: Irvin A. Cox, W. W. Adams, Charles H. Wagner, James F. Cox, Z. H. Hauser, David Emiz, W. C. Duncan, Joseph Ghent and David Stobo.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF BENTON COUNTY

By Elmore Barce

BENTON COUNTY is one of the new counties of the State, the first court house at Oxford being built about the year 1852. At that time practically the only settlements in the county were in the small groves in and about Oxford and along Pine creek. The early settlers had built cabins in these groves and cleared away part of the wilderness and were tillers of the soil.

A great many of the first inhabitants were of the old Scotch-Irish Presbyterian stock and mostly of the Jacksonian type of Democracy. Prior to the Civil War, the county being poor, the offices were not lucrative and there were few applicants for public position.

There is no record or tradition of any certain leaders of the Democratic ranks in those days. Among the first settlers were the McConnell's, whose descendants are still residents of the county, Ralph W. McConnell being the present postmaster at Oxford. The Wattles family were all staunch Democrats, as was the family of Dr. Stempel. Later came the Perigos, the Emersons, the Merefees, the Griffins and the large Smith family, who resided in the vicinity of Mud Pine.

At the breaking out of the Civil War many of the so-called Douglas Democrats joined the Republican ranks and for many years after that struggle the Republican party was in the ascendancy, and has always had a majority ranging from 350 to 500 votes.

"The first political speech in Benton county was delivered during the William Henry Harrison campaign of 1840 at the house of Hugh and Samuel McConnell, in McConnell's Grove, five miles southwest of Oxford. Here several of the settlers had gathered at a wool picking and while the women worked with the wool a Democratic orator made a strong speech on the lee side of the barn. The campaign of 1844 was a stirring one, but it had little effect upon Benton county politics, as the few voters were mostly Democrats and no demonstrations were necessary to hold them to their party faith.

One of the interesting stories relating to the early political history of the county is an account of a joint debate in 1852 between Joseph A. Wright, then Governor, and Nicholas McCarty, Whig candidate for Governor, in which a joint debate was held in true western style in what is known as White Oak Grove, west of the town of Oxford. The following interesting account of that occurrence is thus related by an old settler of that day:

"Ample provision was made for the convenience of these dignitaries. An old rattle-bang of a wagon had been run in the shade of the bushes to keep it from falling down. This was pulled out to give a more conspicuous position, for both spoke from this improvised rostrum, Wright making the opening speech portraying the blessed usufruct of the never-dying Democracy, while McCarty spoke in defense of the Whig party. The audience was small. There was not to exceed sixty persons present, and those were mostly Democrats. I remember distinctly the appearance and manner of these distinguished gentlemen. Mr. Wright was tall, bony, long-armed, long-fingered, straight black hair, complexion slightly swarthy and clerical attire; forceful in speech and one calculated to tickle the pride of the old moss-back. Mr. McCarthy was the reverse of Wright; he was pudgy, rotund, inclined to corpulency and pot-gutted, his clothes fitting tightly, wore a gray suit, slightly bald, face indicating that he loved a good dinner, but his speech—oh, my! it was superlatively bad. His defense of the Whig party, as I remember it, was that it favored public improvements."

After the formation of the present townships the following constituted the stronghold of Democracy: York, Richmond, Parish Grove, with Pine township always close and Hickory Grove inclined to go into the Democratic camp. Center, Grant and Union townships have always been strongly Republican and Oak Grove township has been inclined to follow the Republican lead.

In the last few years, however, the Democrats of Benton county have made a very creditable showing. The old Republican regime had worn threadbare and some of the generals in the Republican party had been guilty of the practice of nepotism to a considerable extent, and there was even some talk of others being rather liberal with the public funds. About this time George L. Robey, a brother of Judge Robey of the Appellate Court, became editor of the Benton Review, which has always been the leading Democratic newspaper of Benton county. His forceful presentation of existing conditions satisfied the voters that some change would have to be made in political affairs. The voters placed Lemuel Shipman, at present president of the First National Bank at Fowler, in the Auditor's office, which position he held for eight years. His administration of that office was honest, impartial and thoroughly efficient.

At the same time Ray Gillespie became Recorder of the county, Henry Norloh, Sheriff, and Thomas Fitzgerald, Commissioner, and later Frank Shackleton and Robert Hamilton succeeded each other in the Sheriff's office.

Being in the minority, the Democrats were careful to select thoroughly competent men and their administration of the affairs of the county was such that the old-time Republican custom of voting a "straight ticket" became a thing of the past.

The first judicial officer that the Democrats ever elected in Benton county was the Hon. James T. Saunderson, who became Judge of the Twenty-first Judicial Circuit of the State of Indiana, comprising the counties of Warren and Benton. Judge Saunderson was a veteran of the Civil War, having fought in the Union cavalry, and was a man of the utmost integrity and his candidacy was very popular with the voters. He held the office of Judge of the Circuit Court for one term of six years.

The latter-day chairmen of the Democratic party in Benton county have adopted the plan of appealing to the voters on the strength of the ticket presented to the people. Aggressive tactics and the old idea of a red-fire campaign have been abandoned. Among others who have been chairman of the county are George L. Robey, Theodore Hoss, the present postmaster of Fowler; Charles Lawson, a large farmer and stock raiser near Chase; Mead S. Hayes, lawyer, now practicing at Marion, Ind., and Elmore Barce, an attorney at Fowler. The last chairman, Patrick J. Kennedy, is a stock raiser and farmer near Templeton, Ind.

The present Democratic postmasters in Benton county are Ralph W. McConnell at Oxford, Theodore Hoss at Fowler, Edward McIntyre at Ambia, Emmett Scanlon at Boswell, Thomas Grogan at Freeland Park, Charles Leisure at Earl Park and J. W. Carroll at Otterbein.

At the last general election the Democrats again succeeded in filling the Auditor's and Sheriff's offices, Warren Mankey being elected to succeed himself as Auditor and George Duffy, son of Michael Duffy, a prominent Benton county Democrat, being elected to the office of Sheriff.

The present Superintendent of Schools, M. F. O'Rear, is also a Democrat.

In recent years the fact that Democracy has been in the ascendency has had an inspiring effect upon the rank and file of the party, and many young men have taken hold of the helm. The conventions and caucuses of the party have been attended by increasing numbers of earnest party workers, who feel at last that they are coming into their own.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF BLACKFORD COUNTY

By M. C. Townsend

A LARGE majority of the pioneers of Blackford county were Democrats. In local matters, however, political lines were not always closely drawn and men were frequently candidates for office without the formality of a nomination by a convention. In fact, as a general rule the Democrats, during the first fifteen or twenty years of the county's existence, could have two or three candidates for the same office and be reasonably sure of the election of one of them.

John J. Cook, a Whig, was elected clerk of the circuit court on his personal popularity, it is presumed, and in 1851 Joseph W. Holliday, who was a Whig and a soldier of the Mexican war, was elected to the Legislature. In 1852 Josiah Twibell and George S. Howell, both Democrats, were candidates for representative, and John C. Baldwin, of Montpelier, ran as a Whig and came out third in the race. Howell was elected by a very small plurality. In 1854 Josiah Twibell and James Rhine, both life-long Democrats up to that time, were candidates for representative as Anti-Nebraska, or Anti-Slavery Extension Democrats, while Joseph P. VanCleve, an old-time Whig, ran as an independent candidate, ignoring the issues growing out of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. William T. Shull was the regular Democratic candidate and was easily elected.

In 1856 partisan lines were closely drawn between the Democrats and Republicans. For representative the Democrats nominated Andrew J. Neff, and the Republicans nominated James Rhine. Neff was elected by a good majority. Harrison township went Republican by eighty majority, while the other three townships were heavily Democratic. The Republicans were not entirely scooped, however, as their candidates, William H. Campbell for treasurer and Isaac Goodwin for sheriff, were both elected and were each re-elected in 1858. Their personal popularity carried them through.

In 1865 there was an exciting contest for county auditor. The Democratic candidate was Hepry D. Wirtz. He had been a resident of the county but a short time; had been a lieutenant in the rebel army and was captured and paroled, and not wishing to return to the army he came to Hartford City. The Republicans nominated Ezra M. Stahl, who had just returned from an honorable term of service as a soldier in the Eighty-fourth Indiana regiment. Mr. Stahl received a slender majority, but his election was contested and was tried before the board of commissioners, and then on appeal in the circuit court, and the office was awarded to Mr. Stahl. Except in this case the Democrats were uniformly successful in the contest for county offices in 1860 to 1872. The latter year was an off-year for the Democrats. The nomination of Greeley for President was very unsatisfactory to large numbers of them, and they manifested their disappointment by sulking in their tents. Both parties placed county tickets in nomination. In the spring an election had been held on the question of aiding by taxation a proposed railroad through the county east and west. The proposal to tax had been carried in Licking township by a small majority, but the feeling against it in the county outside of Hartford City was very bitter, and it crystallized in an independent political movement and a county convention was called and a ticket nominated. The Republicans, knowing that they had no show of success, withdrew their ticket and gave their support generally to the independent ticket, which became known as the Dolly Varden ticket, and which was elected with the exception of the candidate for clerk.

In 1874 the Independent or Greenback party was in the field with state, district and local tickets. The Republicans supported the county ticket of the new party and it was successful.

In 1876 the Republicans and Greenbackers again fused, but only succeeded in electing the treasurer. The Democrats now held the ascendancy for ten years. After 1878 the Republicans made steady gains until, in 1886, they elected the auditor, treasurer and one commissioner.

In 1894 the Republicans had the best of it, electing the auditor, treasurer, sheriff, surveyor and two commissioners. In 1896 they elected only the clerk. In 1898 the Democrats again made a clean sweep.

In the various political campaigns the people of this county have been favored with visits from a number of the ablest orators of the state and nation. On the Democratic side there have been Governors Wright, Hendricks and Gray and Senators Voorhees and Turpie, General Manson, W. D. Bynum, Governor R. B. Hubbard, of Texas; James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, and William J. Bryan, in October, 1900.

We close this chapter with a list of Blackford county officials.

The first man who represented Blackford county in the lower house of representatives was Lewis W. Purviance, Democrat. He was elected in 1839. Blackford county has been represented in the lower house about three-fourths of the time by Democrats. The following have represented Blackford county: 1878, James T. Arnold, Blackford; 1880, Benjamin F. Cummins, Wells; 1882-84, Henry B. Smith, Democrat, Blackford; 1886-90, Elisha Pierce, Democrat, Blackford; 1890, John Branstetter, Democrat, Jay; 1892, William H. DEMOCRATIC NEWSPAPERS OF BLACKFORD COUNTY.

The Evening News is the only Democratic newspaper in Blackford county at this time and is owned and edited by Mr. Edward E. Cox, of Hartford City. Mr. Cox bought this newspaper in 1891. It was then known as the Telegram. The Telegram was a weekly paper. It was an eight-column folio with a patent outside, printed on a Washington hand press. The other equipment of the paper was correspondingly crude. It took an entire day to get out a weekly issue, although the circulation was very small. Mr. Cox was but twenty-two years of age when he purchased this paper. His home up to this time had been at Peru, Ind., where he received his education in the public schools and by actual work in the newspaper offices of that city.

In the course of one year after Mr. Cox took charge of the Telegram he had changed the entire equipment and had put in a cylinder press, and in three years was printing the paper with a steam engine and a power press. In 1893 the Evening News, a daily paper, was established. It has had such a prosperous growth that it now goes into the majority of the homes of Hartford City and Blackford county. So much did the Evening News encroach on the Telegram that the latter was abandoned in 1914, the morning rural edition of the News going in the homes of farmers formerly taking the Telegram.

Both the Telegram and the News have always been consistently Democratic, using their able influence for the promotion of the cause of the Democratic party in county, state and national politics.

The News has grown far ahead of the community in which it is printed. It is issued from its own building, erected especially for the newspaper business, and is filled with the latest equipment, including perfecting presses, color presses, linotype machines and other up-to-date machinery to be found only in the larger cities. The printing in its job department goes all over the United States and even to Europe, label printing being a specialty.

Mr. Cox, the founder of the News, has always taken a great interest in the success of the Democratic party, both through the columns of his paper and through his ability as an organizer. He has served as county chairman of Blackford county two years and as district chairman of the Eleventh congressional district six years. He takes a great deal of interest in the progress of his community, especially in promoting the cause of education. He has served on the school board of Hartford City for the past six years. He is at present postmaster of Hartford City.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF BOONE COUNTY

BOONE COUNTY, as an organization, was brought forth under the banner of Democracy. She was named in honor of that courageous Kentucky pioneer, Daniel Boone, and peopled chiefly by migration from Nicholas county, that state. The instruments conveying to her early settlers the lands within her boundaries bear the name of Democracy's patron saint, Andrew Jackson, and she was steadfast in the support of the principles enunciated by Jefferson and Jackson until the party went to pieces on the issues brought forth in the campaigns immediately preceding the Civil war.

The solidarity of the Democratic party in Boone county was seriously threatened in the campaign of 1854, but with strong and determined leadership the evil day was staved off until 1858. In 1856 the campaign was waged against "Knownothingism," "Abolition," and the "Maine Law," and Boone was the only county in the old Eighth district—Boone, Clinton, Carroll, Fountain, Montgomery and Warren—that withstood successfully the rising tide of opposition to the Democratic party. She came out of the fight with a Democratic majority of about one hundred, and the following year, in a purely local election, carried the county by 299. In the campaign of 1858, with national issues paramount, the Democratic sun in Boone county set to rise no more for ten years, when, in 1868, one candidate on the local ticket was elected, the Republicans carrying the county on the state and national tickets. During these ten years the party locally was without efficient leadership, and without hope. The Pioneer, the party paper, had been forced to suspend at the opening of the war, and its voice was as silent as the tomb until in the campaign of 1868, when W. J. Turpin, known throughout Indiana as the "Tipton Slasher," resurrected the corpse and breathed into it the breath of life and the unconquered and unconquerable spirit of the illustrious fathers of Democracy.

The first Democrat elected to office in Boone county after the Civil war was Israel Curry, of Sugar Creek township, who defeated Col. Abram O. Miller for clerk. Colonel Miller contested Curry's election, and was declared by the court to have been elected. This was the beginning of the restoration of the Democratic party to power and leadership in Boone county, and in the campaign of 1870 the Democratic nominees for auditor, treasurer and sheriff were elected. In the biennial general elections since 1868, the Democrats have carried Boone county fifteen times, the Republicans eight times and in three elections mixed tickets were the result. The rise of the Greenback party in the '70s, drawing its adherents chiefly from the Democratic ranks, was the chief cause of the political pendulum swinging back to the Republican party in the campaigns of 1874 and 1876. With the waning of Greenbackism the Democratic party in Boone has become more and more secure in her moorings, and today every officer in the county is a Democrat, and ten of the twelve townships have Democratic trustees. The county has never lost a dollar through the incompetence or dishonesty of a Democratic official, the affairs of the county are economically and faithfully administered, and the party is destined to a long lease of life in old Boone.

With a long and consistent record to her credit in the support of Democratic policies and nominees, Boone county Democracy has in Governor Samuel M. Ralston her first representative in the official family of the state of Indiana. No Boone county Democrat has ever represented the district in the halls of the national congress, and but few have been appointed to positions of honor in state or national administrations. In 1856 Dr. James McWorkman, one of the most distinguished Democrats of the county, was appointed superintendent of the Indiana School for the Education of the Blind, and in the '80s, while Dr. Thos. H. Harrison, another Boone county Democrat, was serving as president of the board of the state benevolent institutions, Eli P. Baker, of Lebanon, was elected as superintendent of the Indiana School for the Education of the Blind. With these exceptions the Democracy of Boone county has not participated in the distribution of the loaves and fishes when the party has been in power in state or nation.

Since the Civil war Boone county has four times given the Democratic nominee for the Presidency a plurality of the votes cast, as follows: In 1896, Mr. Bryan carried the county by 270; in 1900, by 358; in 1908, by 74, Woodrow Wilson, in 1912, was given a plurality of 1,266. In 1916, with the opposition united, Wilson carried the county by a plurality of 180.

The present Democratic officers of Boone county are as follows: Judge, Willett H. Parr; clerk, Leonard Titus; auditor, Cleve Goodwin; recorder, John T. Brown; treasurer, John L. Thomas; surveyor, Alva H. Wynkoop; assessor, Willard Stephenson; coroner, Dr. Onis E. Brendel; commissioners, John T. Jones and Frank O. Stoton. The Democrats lost sheriff, prosecutor and one commissioner in the election of 1916. The county superintendent of schools, chosen by the township trustees, is Ed. M. Servies.

The almost complete destruction of the records of Boone county in 1856 and the death of the men whose lives had been identified with the political history of the county previous to that time makes it impossible to secure data concerning the organization of the Democratic party previous to the war. Bound files of the county papers show that in 1858 Geo. W. Buckingham, one of the early editors of the Pioneer, was the chairman, and from 1860 to 1861 John M. Scott served in that position. Beginning with 1868 the chairman and the result of the campaign in Boone county follows:

- 1868—Dr. James McWorkman, Chairman. One Democrat on county ticket elected.
- 1869—Dr. James Evans, Chairman.
- 1870—Robert C. McCann, Chairman. Democrats carried county.
- 1872—James Nealis, Chairman. Republicans carried county.
- 1874—Eli P. Baker, Chairman. Mixed ticket elected.
- 1876—Thos. H. Harrison, Chairman. Republicans carried county.
- 1878—Eli P. Baker, Chairman. Democrats and Greenbackers (fused) carried county.
- 1880—John M. Ball, Chairman. Mixed ticket elected.
- 1882—Thos. H. Harrison, Chairman. Mixed ticket elected.
- 1884—Barton S. Higgins, Chairman. Democratic ticket elected.
- 1886—Israel Curry, Chairman. Republican.
- 1888—Israel Curry, Chairman. Republican.
- 1890—James R. Tyre, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1892—James R. Tyre, Chairman. Republican.

- 1894—Calvin H. Graves, Chairman. Republican.
- 1896—James A. White, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1898—William A. Buntin, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1900—John H. Hoy, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1902—James A. White, Chairman. Mixed.
- 1904—Thos. O. Beck, Chairman. Republican.
- 1906—Thos. O. Beck, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1908—Chas. J. Stewart, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1910—Thos. O. Beck, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1912—Thos. O. Beck, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1914—M. C. Long, Chairman. Democratic.
- 1916—M. C. Long. Mixed ticket.
- 1918—George M. Mangus.

The Lebanon Pioneer, founded in 1852 by Henry Hill, has, since January 1, 1890, been owned and published by Ben F. McKey, who, in June, 1873, entered the office as an apprentice. Hill published the paper for four years, when he sold it to Col. W. C. Kise and James McWorkman; Geo. W. Buckingham, of Newark, O., took charge of the Pioneer in 1856, and conducted it with unusual ability until 1860, when James Gogen succeeded him. When the war broke out in 1861, for lack of financial support, the Pioneer was suspended, and was not resurrected until 1868. Its first publisher then was W. J. Turpin, who, after a few weeks, was succeeded by Lafe Woodard. In 1869 Henry S. Evans became its editor and publisher, and in 1872 Ben A. Smith, of Brookville, assumed the ownership. Smith published the paper until June, 1874, when he sold out to the late Dr. Thos. H. Harrison, the immediate predecessor of the present publisher. On April 1, 1914, Mr. McKey took into partnership his son Claude D. McKey, and his son-in-law, T. O. Edwards, both experienced newspaper men, and the Pioneer today enjoys the distinction of being one of the best strictly county papers not only in Indiana, but in the United States. It is the only Democratic paper published in Boone county.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF BROWN COUNTY

By William L. Coffey

BROWN COUNTY, the Switzerland of Indiana, famed for its beauty of natural scenery, has attracted and won the admiration of artists from every quarter of the American continent. Their sketches upon the canvas depicting its broad stretches of forest studded by gigantic green hills, its dashing streams o'erhung by vines and wild flowers, its beautiful sunset behind a cloudland most gorgeously tinted, bespeak the story of its sturdy Hoosier citizens.

From this natural environment seems to issue such a wonderful spirit of freedom that man, so enamored by its enchanting influence, is caught in its meshes, from which he finds it a most difficult problem to extricate himself. Thus is born that spirit of freedom which makes for independent character—independent thought and action conducive to the development and nurture of true Democratic principles of the stamp and ring of the Jeffersonian kind.

At its very beginning, in 1836, the county was unmistakably Democratic and ever since has remained true to its standards—"simon-pure." But few times in the history of the county have county and township officials misused the trust reposed in them, and there are but few instances in which it has suffered defeat locally, and then only in township affairs. Such explicit confidence have the people manifested in this party's administration of their affairs that the opposition never could rally sufficient strength to overthrow it.

The county originally was a part of Bartholomew, Jackson and Monroe counties. In 1835 a sufficient number of settlers had arrived and permanently located in the hills to warrant the formation of a separate county and, accordingly, the Legislature was asked to introduce a bill, which was done, and the new county of Brown established in February, 1836.

In compliance with this act the first election in the county was held the first Monday in June, 1836. The governor commissioned one James Dawson sheriff to order an election of a clerk and recorder, two associate judges of the circuit court and three county commissioners.

As a result of this first election John Floyd was chosen clerk and recorder, James Taggart and Lewis Raper associate judges and Daniel Hedrick, William Jackson and James Davidson county commissioners. At the following election, held in August of the same year, James Taggart became sheriff, William Followell coroner and James McIntire probate judge.

On the 25th day of July, 1836, the county commissioners met and subdivided the county into four townships—Jackson, Hamblen, Van Buren and Johnson, which was later changed to five by making the fifth, Washington, from the original four. The naming of these corporations indicates the fealty of these early settlers to their political faith. Jackson and Van Buren were political characters fresh in their minds at this time.

The first circuit court was convened April 20, 1837, before Elisha M. Huntington, presiding judge, with the two associates previously mentioned.

The first probate court of the county was held on the 8th day of May, 1837, in the new log court house, a structure 18x24 feet, two stories high. Judge James McIntire, who held a commission from Governor Noah Noble, presided.

The first common pleas court was held at the county seat on the 31st day of January, 1853, by Judge William G. Quick (Democrat). Several attorneys were sworn in during this term, among whom were P. C. Dunning, Daniel McClure, Fred T. Butler, George A. Buskirk and Shadrack Chandler. Sometime in 1868 Governor Baker appointed Richard L. Coffey (D.) to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge Woolen. At the general election in 1870 Mr. Coffey was elected to the office, which position he filled till it was abolished by the Legislature.

With the exception of a few appointive positions, the very earliest officials of the county were known to be strong Democrats. The political complexion of the institutions handed down by them has never been changed. Some of these early politicians lived long lives, to be known by the present generation, many of whom stand ready to vouch for their sterling Democratic qualities.

The results of the earlier elections—prior to 1856—cannot be given. However, during this year, with the war fever on, Oliver P. Morton, candidate for governor, received 220 votes, while the Democratic ticket polled 773, more than three and one-half times as many.

Then followed the campaign of 1860, a truly warm one. The fight was waged most bitterly. Every township had its organization of "wide-awakes," a Republican institution. Political orators were plentiful and scarcely a night passed without a public speaking. Enthusiastic demonstrations, martial music and long processions were the order of the times. The Democratic clubs uniformed themselves with hickory suits, erected poles and flung the names of Douglas and Johnson to the breeze. The few Republicans, nevertheless, were confident of success. Their emblems of the campaign were rails or mauls and wedges.

The following songs used by the two parties (taken from a military history of the county) are here set out:

"Oh, see the Douglas platform falling,
Falling, falling, down it must go,
And in its place shall firmly stand
Abe Lincoln, the true, and Hamlin, too;
Abe Lincoln, the true, and Hamlin, too;
And with them we'll beat Little Dug, Dug, Dug;
Old Abe has cracked his mug."

* * * * *

The Democrats used the following lament of Lincoln, sung to the air of "Susannah":

"Oh, Hamlin, dear, my 'fairest' one,
Oh, don't you cry for me;
I fear that house in Washington
I'll never, never see.
I love the Black Republicans,
And for the darkies sigh;
But all, I fear, will do no good,
But, Hamlin, don't you cry.

Chorus:

"Oh, my dear Hannibal,
Don't you cry for me,
I'm going up Salt River
With a ducky on each knee."

Or the following:

"No, Lincoln can't come in, I say,
Then ho for Douglas, ho!
The Democrats have Stephen A.,
Then ho for Douglas, ho!
Republicans may bite their nails,
May rave about their Lincoln rails,
But can't come up to Steve's coattails,
Then ho for Douglas, ho!"

While the problems of this campaign were so perplexing and the fight so bitter, causing many Democratic counties in the state to go down in defeat, the Democracy of Brown county presented a solid phalanx, perfectly united, and maintained their usual majority. As a result of this election the vote for governor was: Thomas A. Hendricks (Democrat), 744; Henry S. Lane (Republican), 296; representative in Congress, W. M. Daily (D.), 702; W. M. Dunn (R.), 319; representative in the Legislature (all local men): Lewis Prosser (D.), 575; J. W. McIlvain (R.), 306; John Beck (Social Democrat), 118.

In 1862 the result for secretary of state, by a strict party vote, was: William A. Peele (R.), 213; James S. Athon (D.), 840. A majority of 627 in a total vote of 1,053 was enough for all practical purposes. Having reduced the Republican vote to such a small figure, one cannot help wondering why the Democracy did not wipe it wholly out.

In 1864 Morton (R.) received 364 votes for governor; McDonald (D.) received 823; representative in the Legislature: John Richards (D.), 814; W. W. Browning (R.), 288.

In 1866 the vote for secretary of state was: M. D. Morrison (D.), 1,025; Nelson Trusler (R.), 423.

In 1868 Thomas A. Hendricks received 1,084 votes for governor, while Conrad Baker (R.) received but 427.

In 1872 the candidates for governor received the following votes: T. A. Hendricks, 1,166; T. M. Brown (R.), 467.

In 1876 the vote for presidential electors was as follows: Tilden and Hendricks (D.), 1,254; Hayes and Wheeler (R.), 488; Cooper and Cary (Independent), 109.

For secretary of state in 1878 J. G. Shanklin (D.) received 1,166 votes; Isaac S. Moore (R.), 378.

For state senator in 1878 Richard L. Coffey (D.) received 1,168 votes; William Gilmore (R.), 338.

In 1880 the following vote for presidential electors was cast: Hancock and English (D.), 1,576; Garfield and Arthur (R.), 599; Weaver and Chambers (Ind.), 42.

In 1882 the vote for secretary of state was: William R. Myers (D.), 1,217; E. R. Hawn (R.), 555; Hiram T. Leonard (Ind.), 91; for senator of Brown, Monroe and Bartholomew counties: W. C. Duncan (D.), 941. The issues that dominated in this senatorial contest were temperance reform and personal liberty. The Republican party polled 708 votes in this contest and the Independent candidate received 186.

In 1884 the vote for presidential electors was as follows: Cleveland and Hendricks (D.), 1,541; Blaine and Logan (R.), 627; National party, 21; Prohibition party, 27. For governor Isaac P. Gray (D.), 1,540; W. H. Calkins (R.), 613. For joint representative, W. W. Browning (D.), 1,458; William D. Clark (R.), 693.

In 1886 Robert W. Miers, the Democratic candidate for secretary of state, received 1,368 votes; Charles F. Griffin (R.), 562 votes. For prosecutor 9th judicial circuit, Anderson Percifield (D.), 1,314; William J. Beck (R.), 578. For joint senator Brown, Monroe and Bartholomew counties, W. C. Duncan (D.) received 1,364 votes; the three other candidates together received only 32 votes.

In 1888 the vote for presidential electors was as follows: Cleveland and Thurman (D.), 1,538; Harrison and Morton (R.), 661; the Prohibition candidates received 63 votes and the Union Labor 11 votes. The state and congressional tickets maintained about the same ratio.

In 1890 the vote for secretary of state was: Claude Matthews (D.), 1,327; Milton Trusler (R.), 522. For Congress, George W. Cooper (D.) received 1,338 votes; Dunbar (Farmer and Labor), 523; the Prohibition candidate, Shelt, received 30 votes. For joint representative, William G. Watson (D.), 1,302; Harry Barnett (F. and L.), 523.

The Republicans had no local ticket in the field this year. They amalgamated their interest with a dissatisfied element of the Democratic party and a few "Grange" enthusiasts with a view of defeating the county ticket. They formed an organization which was called the "Farmer and Labor" party. They petitioned the board of election commissioners October 15 to place their candidates on the ballot under the name above mentioned, using as their device a pruning-hook. Most of the Democrats on the new ticket had been defeated at the preceding primary election and were very much chagrined. They put on the war paint and it seemed for a time that their influence would very materially reduce the Democratic majority. As the time for holding the election approached, however, the disaffection gradually disappeared and the normal political situation prevailed.

Ben P. Smith, the candidate for county auditor, was the hardest fought on the regular Democratic ticket. He received 1,239 votes, while his opponent, Isaac Chafin, on the Blackberry ticket, as it was dubbed, received but 545 votes, only 23 more than that received by the Republican candidate for secretary of state. Happily, this dissatisfaction vanished and the next campaign settled the fact that any attempt to disrupt the party by internal dissensions was a failure.

In 1892 the vote for presidential electors was as follows: Cleveland and Thurman (D.), 1,378; Harrison and Reid (R.), 656; Prohibition party, 38; People's party, 92. The vote for state officers was practically the same. John S. Williams (D.), local candidate for joint representative, received 1,385 votes; his opponent, Allen W. Grissom (R.), received 659.

In 1894 Wm. R. Myers, Democratic candidate for secretary of state, received 1,158 votes; Wm. D. Owen (R.), 685. The Prohibition party polled 35 votes and the People's ticket received 101.

In the campaign of 1896 every inch of the ground was vigorously contested. Both parties were well organized. Public speakings were held in every school house. The hammering campaign on trusts, protection and the gold standard brought every Democrat to the front. Bryan was truly their idol. The lesser parties, for the time being, lost sight of their cause and joined the old parties. The vote for presidential electors was: Bryan and Sewall (D.), 1,470; McKinley and Hobart (R.), 726; Prohibitionists, 16; People's, 10; Gold Standard, 1; National party, 3; Social Labor, 2.

In 1898 the vote for secretary of state was: Samuel Ralston (D.), 1,227; Union B. Hunt (R.), 615. During this campaign James S. Guthrie was the first and only Democrat in the county that ever received a place upon the Democratic state ticket. He was a candidate for state statistician.

In 1900 the vote for presidential electors was: Bryan and Stevenson (D.), 1,452; McKinley and Roosevelt (R.), 704; Prohibition party, 36; People's party, 11.

In 1902 the vote for secretary of state was as follows: Albert Schoonover (D.), 1,051; Daniel E. Storms (R.), 590; Prohibition ticket, 63; People's ticket, 4. Fremont Miller (D.) was elected for a second term as prosecutor of Brown and Johnson counties. Willoughby Wellons (D.) was elected joint representative of Brown and Monroe counties.

In 1904 the vote for presidential electors was as follows: Bryan (D.), 1,157; Roosevelt (R.), 760. The Prohibitionists cast 93 votes; the People's party, 13; the Socialists, 7; Socialist Labor, 4. In the congressional race, Lincoln Dixon (D.) received 1,073 votes, while his opponent, Anderson Percifield (R.), received 830. Mr. Percifield was a Brown county product, an attorney and formerly a Democrat.

In 1906 James F. Cox (D.), candidate for secretary of state, received 899 votes; Fred A. Sims (R.), 573. The Prohibition ticket polled 74 votes; People's, 5; Socialists, 5; Social Labor, 3.

In 1908 the vote for presidential electors was: Bryan (D.), 1,177; Taft (R.), 658; Prohibition ticket, 68; People's party ticket, 1; Socialists, 5. For joint senator, Brown, Jackson and Washington counties, George W. Long (D.) received 1,090 votes; H. C. Dannettell (R.), 639.

In 1910 the vote for secretary of state was: Lewis Ellingham (D.), 888; Otis F. Culley (R.), 556. The Prohibition ticket polled 55 votes; Socialists, 9; Social Labor, 2. The congressional and local tickets received practically the same vote.

In 1912 the vote for presidential electors was as follows: Wilson and Marshall (D.), 909; Taft (R.), 293; the Prohibitionists, 52; Progressives, 235; Socialists, 11. John P. Wright (D.) was elected prosecuting attorney of the Eighth judicial circuit; Charles Genolin (D.) was elected joint representative of Brown and Monroe counties.

In 1914, Benj. F. Shively, Democratic candidate for U. S. Senator, received 885 votes. His opponent, Hugh T. H. Miller (R.), received 411 votes. The Progressives polled 98, this being the number received by Albert J. Beveridge, their candidate for U. S. Senator.

The Prohibitionists polled 37 votes, and the Socialists, 8.

The vote for Secretary of State was: Homer L. Cook (D.), 809; Ed Jackson, 411. For Congress, Lincoln Dixon (D.), 902; Manley D. Wilson, 443. For Joint Representative of Brown and Monroe counties, Thomas Sare (D.), received 826 votes; Ernest Darby (R.), 436. The local tickets received practically the same vote.

The campaign of 1916 was very interesting for the reason that the Progressives being deserted by their leader were looking for some place to "land." Their organization had collapsed. Many avowed they never would return to the G. O. P. However, as time went on, the big majority permitted their partisan spirit instead of principle to dominate and skulked back into the fold. Some, true to their convictions, joined the Democratic ranks and enthusiastically supported the ticket from Wilson down to the last man.

In this election, the Democratic electors received 1,046 votes; Republicans, 506; Progressives, none; Prohibitionists, 31; Socialists, 10; and Social Labor, 2.

For United States Senator, (long term) Jno. W. Kern (D.), received 999 votes; Harry S. New (R.), 490; (short term) Thomas Taggart (D.), received 990 votes; James E. Watson (R.), 492.

The candidates for state offices received practically the same vote as did the candidates for U. S. Senator.

For Congress, Lincoln Dixon (D.), 1,017; Manly D. Wilson (R.), 519. For Joint Senator, Thos. Dorrell (D.), 964; Wm. Graham (R.), 511. For Joint Representative, Wm. L. Coffey (D.), 1,015; Frank Gentry (R.), 498.

The leaders of both the old parties were untiring in their efforts during this campaign and both equally confident of success in the state and nation.

The Democrats were proud of their achievements in legislation and were confident their work would not be repudiated. Nevertheless, the State fell to the Republicans. Many Democratic counties were overthrown entirely. Monroe county, to which this county is attached for Representative and Senatorial purposes, passed into the hands of the Republicans.

Dorrell, candidate for State Senator, was saved by the counties of Johnson and Brown; but the writer, candidate for Representative of Brown and Monroe counties, was defeated by 92 votes.

THE COUNTY PRESS.

Sometime in the year 1854 the first newspaper venture was made by S. A. Armour. This paper, a Democratic organ, continued with fair success till December, 1856, when it was sold to James S. Hester, J. S. Arwine et al. This firm changed the name of the paper to Hickory Withe.

The editor, Mr. Hester, was an unusually bright man with very pronounced Democratic views. His paper bore the distinction of being a true exponent of the Democratic principles. The Hickory Withe flourished for about a year, when it fell into the hands of the United Brethren church, with Jesse Brandon as its publisher. This venture was not very successful. The demand for a political paper led Mr. Brandon to purchase the plant, which he did in 1861, naming the new publication the Nashville Union, which was of Democratic proclivity. Mr. Brandon conducted his paper, which was well patronized, through the fiery years of the Civil war and until his death in 1866, when it was purchased by Watts Adams, who changed the name to the Nashville Star. This was a Democratic publication also. It lived about eight months, and passed away.

The following three years bore evidence of much struggle for the press to live. The Star fell into the hands of Summers and Gaston, who changed its name to the Democrat, and after an existence of six months it passed into the hands of a man named Winters, of whom it is said "only three publications got out of his press."

In December, 1867, George Sleeth secured the office and issued the Nashville Democrat until September, 1868, and then sold out to L. H. Miller, who started the Index, another Democratic organ. This was issued until about the month of March, 1869, when it became defunct. In 1870 Yates and Allison started the Jacksonian. After a few months Yates sold out to Allison. This publication was continued by Mr. Allison until March, 1883.

In February, 1883, Wm. M. Waltman and Isaac Chafin founded the Democrat, and in March, 1883, bought the Jacksonian. The new paper issued bore the name of Jacksonian Democrat.

In May, 1883, John C. Hester and W. W. Browning became owners of this paper. In June, 1883, Hester became sole owner. The paper was operated but a short time when Mr. Hester decided to move his plant to Spencer, Ind. A portion of this equipment was purchased by Browning and Metheny, who started a new paper which they called the Brown County Democrat and which they published till December 14, 1884, when it was sold to the present editor and publisher, Alonzo Allison. For thirty uninterrupted years Mr. Allison has enjoyed the distinction of being proprietor and publisher of this paper and has through that long period of time faithfully expounded and promulgated Democratic doctrine.

power was vested in these officers till June, 1845, when the county was divided into three Commissioners' Districts. After the fall election in this year, three county commissioners took charge of the county affairs. Joseph Kelley, William Taggart and William Bender constituted the first and served the first one, two and three years respectively. John S. MEMBERS OF THE STATE LEGISLATURE. REPRESENTATIVES.

Throughout its existence, the county has had but few representatives in the state legislature. The following story is told of a reverend gentleman by the name of Eli P. Farmer, who represented the county in the lower house some time in the early "fifties." This gentleman proceeded to lawmaking somewhat in the manner in which he carried on the ministry in those pioneer days. It is said that, upon one occasion when he addressed the speaker of the house, he failed to get recognition. He addressed the chair again with the same result. Being somewhat angered at this disregard, he walked up the aisle where the speaker stood and dealt him such a severe blow with his fist that he felled him upon the spot. The secretaries near at hand aided him to his feet. Mr. Farmer coolly returned to his seat and again addressed the chair: "Mr. Speaker, Mr. Speaker." It is said that he was duly recognized. The county has been represented in the lower house by the following Democrats: John Richards, 1864; W. W. Browning, 1884; Wm. G. Watson, 1890; John S. Williams, 1892; Willoughby Wellons, 1902; and Charles Genolin, 1912.

STATE SENATORS.

Judge Richard L. Coffey was elected state senator of Brown, Monroe and Bartholomew counties in 1878. He was a staunch Democrat and the first to serve his county in this capacity. His very pronounced views on all moral questions were well known throughout the district. During the two sessions, 1879 and 1881, he championed temperance reform legislation. His attitude on this question defeated him for re-nomination in 1882.

W. C. Duncan (D.) succeeded Mr. Coffey in 1882 and was re-elected in 1886.

After a period of twenty-two years George W. Long, a prominent Democrat and attorney of the Nashville bar was elected to represent the counties of Brown, Jackson and Washington. Mr. Long served during the sessions of 1909 and 1911, and ably filled many responsible positions on committees of that body.

COUNTY CHAIRMEN.

It has been found impossible to obtain a perfect list of names of Democrats who have served the party in the capacity of county chairman in this county. From the best information obtainable, beginning with the year 1886 and continuing, up to and including the present year, 1916, the following served in that position in the order named as nearly as can be ascertained:

Eugene Cully, Wm. L. Cox, Green Watson, R. L. Coffey, Joshua Metheny, Anderson Percifield, Thomas J. Taggart, John Cravens, John W. Harden, H. B. Miller, George W. Long, Sylvester Barnes, John McGee and Omer Morrison.

It is a notable fact that no Democrat of this county has ever been elected to a state office, to Congress, or succeeded to any national position of consequence by appointment.

The older Democrats of the county did not interest themselves in the larger responsibilities and seemed content in the management of local affairs. However, the younger men are more ambitious and are contending for recognition more commensurate with their political services.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF CARROLL COUNTY

THE history of the Democratic party of Carroll county dates back to the year 1828, when at the presidential election of 1828, Andrew Jackson received 112 votes and John Adams 73 votes. At the election of 1832, Jackson received 258 votes and Clay received 173 votes; in 1836 Van Buren received 565 votes and Harrison received 375 votes; in 1840 Van Buren received 765 votes and Harrison received 699 votes; in 1844 Polk received 865 votes and Clay received 712 votes; in 1848 Cass received 1,008 votes and Taylor received 822 votes; in 1852 Pierce received 1,265 votes and Scott 1,075 votes; in 1856 Buchanan received 1,344 votes and Fremont 1,261 votes; in 1860 Douglas received 1,446 votes and Lincoln 1,590 votes. From the first presidential election up to 1860 the Democratic party was in the majority.

The campaign of 1840 was the most exciting campaign prior to 1860. It was spectacular. It is remembered as the "Log Cabin, Hard Cider" Campaign. The rallying cry was, "Tippecanoe and Tyler, Too." Long processions moved through the unbroken forests, big wagons and horseback companies. A log cabin on wheels with a coon at the window, and hard cider for the thirsty. In campaigns following both political parties employed big wagons, drawn by four to sixteen horses, filled with voters, women and children, upon occasions of big meetings, where big men were present to discuss the great issues of the times.

Every school house in the land resounded with the eloquence of local orators.

When the old Whig party disbanded, the Democratic party was confronted with grave issues, upon which the party was not a unit. The time was ripe for the formation of a new National political party, and all factional elements united in 1856, and at Philadelphia the Republican party was born. Although the new party was defeated in that year, the Democratic party saw fit to split at Charleston in 1860 and for the first time in its history went before the country in 1860 in two distinct factions.

The defeat which followed brought upon the country conditions that repose now too deep for resurrection; it is well it is so. Carroll county Democrats stood pat, adhering to the old principles they learned from Jefferson.

They stood at the polls demanding the right for the men of their choice, and to see that no fraud was practiced to defeat them.

They passed through years when the ballot was regarded as purchasable. Money was used to debauch the electorate, illegal voters sent from poll to poll to defeat the party. Men led men in "Blocks of Five" those days, intimidation was used, and for many campaigns the voice of the people was crushed.

The reaction came as it was bound to without resorting to revolutionary measures. The campaign of education went on and on, and by degrees reforms were accomplished, and the upheaval of 1908, 1910 and 1912 rolled back oppression and corruption, and, as an evidence of the capability of the people to rule, the Republican party became disrupted and hopelessly divided.

The election of 1912 set on foot policies that are being enforced, and to their accomplishment the Democratic party in Carroll county has done its full part, giving a larger majority than ever before in its history.

The Democrats, now living, who have contributed to the success of the party, look back upon the past history of the party in this county, and cherish the memory of the leaders who preceded them; and can call up such men as General Samuel Milroy, J. B. Milroy, James Odell, Anthony Garrett, J. T. Richardson, B. F. Schermerhorn, B. B. Daily, E. Walker, J. D. Wilson and many others who were active in party councils.

Of those now found leading we mention a very few; J. A. Cartwright, A. B. Crampton, C. R. Pollard, John F. McCormick, Harry Reed, James Reeder, William Lesh, Mart Popejoy, Grover Long, Emory Flora, John C. O'Connor, W. C. Smith, J. H. Cartwright, W. P. Thompson, James P. Wason, W. B. Wason, William Margowski, Sell Doty, T. J. Ryan, Guy A. Hall and John L. Hanna. Many of the above named have held offices of trust and profit to their honor and credit.

In the year 1893 one of the finest monuments in the State, in memory of the soldiers of Carroll county, was erected in the court house square by a board of Democratic commissioners at a cost of $12,000.

The present Democratic officers in 1918 are: James P. Wason, judge of the Carroll circuit court; Henry Good, county auditor; James H. Hinkle, county assessor, and Walter G. Million, county commissioner.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF CASS COUNTY

CASS COUNTY is, always has been and always will be a bulwark of Democracy in Indiana. To use a muchly advertised phrase, "there's a reason."

Cass county's Democracy is a militant Democracy. The Democrats of Cass county are fighters, and if there is anything that they like better than a big, rousing political fight, it has not yet dawned on them. The stiffer the opposition, the better they fight. They are restless, dispirited, unless engulfed in the throes of a strenuous campaign. They gumshoe around, eyeing the enemy with suspicion and distrust. They cannot understand the lull in activities. They feel uncomfortable, fear trouble and, though they cannot fight, they continually keep their ear to the ground.

Democratic victories in Cass county have not been attained without fighting. Back in the days when the Whigs composed the opposition the Democracy had to battle valiantly for every victory which it obtained, because numbered among Cass county Whigs were men who knew how to fight and who loved to fight. And following the birth of the Republican party, the opposition did not become less militant. If anything it became more aggressive, and every campaign in Cass county has been a whirlwind of oratory, red fire and contagious enthusiasm. Whigs and Democrats, Republicans and Democrats, have been engaged in continual battle from the county's organization until the present day. Campaigns have been hard fought and victories have been won by close margins.

Much of the spectacularness of the campaign dwindled twenty or so years ago, when the old torch-lights, which characterized every political parade, went out of fashion. And while perhaps the masses do not show the enthusiasm which was manifested during the good old days, yet Cass county's Democracy has not lost any of its militancy. Its fighting, planning and scheming is now done by an aggressive county committee. Just as business has been organized, so has politics, and the Democrats of Cass county have not been slow in perfecting an organization which knows how to and does get results. Records of past campaigns show this.

Some counties of Indiana which invariably return a Democratic majority do so because Democracy is overwhelmingly in the majority. It would be as unnatural for the Republicans to win as it would be for the State of Texas to go Republican. But this is not and never has been the case in Cass county. The strength of both the Democratic party and the opposition has been about equal, with perhaps possibly a very slight advantage to the Democrats. As the result of this the Democrats have always had to be alert and aggressive. The opposition has never been known to lay down. It battles until the last vote is counted, and then looks about for a chance to contest the result.

Cass county was created by an act of Legislature, approved December 18, 1828, and on January 19, 1829, a supplemental act was passed changing and increasing its territory, until its northern boundary extended to the Michigan line. Other changes were made from time to time by acts of the Legislature and new counties were formed from the original territory of Cass county, until 1847, when the present boundaries were fixed.

The act of Legislature which created Cass county named Henry Ristine of Montgomery county, Erasmus Towell of Shelby county, William Purdy of Sullivan county, Harrison Tyner of Marion county and Samuel George of Tippecanoe county as commissioners to select a county seat. Cass county had been named in honor of General Lewis Cass, a resident of Michigan, who was instrumental in bringing about the various treaties with the Indians which opened up the lands in Cass and surrounding counties to white settlers. These commissioners met in the log cabin of Gillis McBean and selected Logansport as the county seat of Cass county.

The first election was held April 13, 1829, and the following officers were elected: Chauncey Carter, James Smith and Moses Thorp commissioners and William Scott sheriff. Cyrus Taber was appointed county treasurer. Carter and Taber were Democrats who played a prominent part in the party's success in those early days.

Party lines were not closely drawn during local elections in the early days of Cass county. Fitness for office and personal popularity had more weight with the voters than party affiliation. But, whether through aggressive campaigning or greater personality, Democratic candidates secured more than an even share of the offices.

But as time passed personality and the fitness of a man for office became less potent. Finally came the period when men "voted 'er straight." Political strife was the result. Men hewed to party lines and red fire and the torch-lights came into their own. Lifelong friendships were severed on the rocks of party politics. Bitterness was engendered, fist fights were not uncommon. This was the heyday of the politician. Stump speakers were on every corner and Cass county was deluged by a flood of political oratory. The zenith of this period was reached during the Bryan campaign in 1896. The torch-light was supplemented by the "full" dinner pail, but even this political trick did not awe or undermine the Democracy of Cass county. When the votes were counted it was discovered that William J. Bryan, Democrat, had received 4,814 votes and William McKinley only 4,392.

Democrats of Cass county have not been easily swayed on national issues. Abraham Lincoln carried the county in 1860 by a slight plurality, but this in a measure might possibly have resulted from the opposition which developed here against Stephen A. Douglas, Democratic opponent. Dr. G. N. Fitch, Democrat, elected from Cass county to the United States Senate, 1858-1861, bitterly opposed Douglas. While in the Senate Dr. Fitch and Douglas got into an altercation which nearly resulted in a duel, and when Douglas ran for President Dr. Fitch worked mightily against him.

The second time that Lincoln ran Cass county went overwhelmingly for George B. McClellan, his Democratic opponent. Nor was Benjamin Harrison, Indiana's favorite son, in his two campaigns against Grover Cleveland, able to win over the Democrats of this county. Each time they gave Cleveland a big plurality over Harrison. Roosevelt captured the Democracy of Cass county in 1904, but this was because local Democrats resented the lukewarm support which Alton B. Parker, his opponent, had given William J. Bryan in 1900. Woodrow Wilson carried the county in 1912 and also in 1916, although at the latter election the State went Republican.

Following is the vote of Cass county for President since its organization to 1916:

1828—Andrew Jackson, Democrat, 66 votes; John Quincy Adams, Whig, 31 votes.

1916—Woodrow Wilson, Democrat, — votes; Charles Hughes, Republican, — votes.

An incident which occurred on election day in 1848 shows how Cass county Democrats worked to elect their candidate. There lived in one of the northern townships a man named Siedenbender, who was a Democrat of the rock-ribbed order. His son was twenty-one years old that day and proudly announced that he was going to vote for Zachary Taylor. The father paused, eyed his son steadily for a moment and then declared that he could not vote, as he would not be twenty-one years old until after the polls closed, having been born in the evening. The son was obdurate and declared that he was going to vote anyway. The father, not a bit nonplused, stated that if he attempted to vote he would challenge his right.

But at this moment Mrs. Siedenbender, a large, powerful-framed woman, who would be a power in woman suffrage affairs if she now lived, interrupted. She brushed her husband aside, ordered the son to hitch up the old mule and she would drive to the polls with him. She declared that if her husband challenged the son's vote she would swear him in, and she guessed that the election board would believe her, as "she was present at her son's birthing." The father surrendered.

And with all the bitterness and strife which characterized the campaigns of the early days, many humorous incidents occurred. One especially was during the strenuous campaign of "Blue Jeans" Williams, Democrat, for governor. The election in those days came in October, and, naturally, everyone was interested in the outcome, the result being sort of a forecast of what could be expected at the national election in the following month. The result was very close and hundreds crowded before the bulletin boards of the newspaper offices. Interest was at fever heat, and when word was finally received stating that "Blue Jeans" Williams had been elected governor, the editor of the Logansport Journal, Republican, hung a pair of blue jeans out of the window. The crowd instantly understood. The Democrats broke forth in jubilant cheers, but the Republicans slunk away.

The Logansport Pharos has been the organ of the Democratic party in Cass county since July 24, 1844, and much of the party's success has been due to the various men who controlled its editorial policy. There have been other Democratic newspapers in the county, but they have been of the mushroom variety and none have had the power and the prestige of the Daily Pharos, which was so long and so ably edited by the late Benjamin F. Louthain.

The Logansport Pharos was first published as a weekly July 24, 1844, by Samuel A. Hall, a native of Ohio, who came here and purchased the press and fixtures of the defunct Wabash Gazette. Mr. Hall, though a young man, was an ardent Democrat and he soon made his paper a power in local politics. January 6, 1869, he sold the paper to Rufus Magee, who later became state senator and United States minister to Norway and Sweden. Mr. Magee, always aggressive in politics, made the paper more of a power in the community. August 10, 1874, he changed the Pharos into a daily and it has since continued as such. July 1, 1875, Mr. Magee sold the paper to a company composed of local men, and Simon P. Sheerin, Democrat, who later became clerk of the supreme court, became editor. Some time later Jerry Collins of Crawfordsville assumed management. November 28, 1877, Benjamin F. Louthain and M. Y. Todisman secured control. John W. Barnes, March 20, 1885, purchased the interest of Mr. Todisman, and from that date until a few years ago the Logansport Pharos was successfully managed by Louthain and Barnes. The paper was then consolidated with the Logansport Daily Reporter under the name of the Pharos-Reporter, with Mr. Louthain as editor.

Many other Democratic papers were started in Cass county. The Logansport Banner, a German paper, had short life during 1872-73. The Deutsche Zeitung, German paper, was started October 7, 1882, by John Day. In 1892 Mr. Day sold this paper to Peter Walrath, who changed the name to Sternenbanner. Mr. Walrath continued the publication until 1899, when he removed to Evansville. In 1896 he represented Cass and Miami counties in the lower house of the Legislature.

Soon after Peter Walrath left John Day again embarked in the newspaper business and started the publication of the Freie Presse, which is still being published weekly. It has a large circulation among the German people of Logansport and Cass county and is strongly Democratic.

The Logansport Daily Star, which first came into existence as an advertising sheet February 27, 1873, was purchased by J. Harris Hall, son of Samuel A. Hall, founder of the Pharos. The Star was supposed to be independent in politics, but represented the Dr. Fitch faction in the Democratic party, which was opposed to Rufus Magee, publisher of the Pharos. It ceased publication in 1876.

The Galveston Times, established in Galveston, Ind., March, 1886, by Isom N. Bell, had short life as a weekly Democratic paper. He removed the paper to Logansport, and September 10 of the same year it was changed into a Prohibition weekly.

The Logansport Sun, under the management of the Democratic Publishing Company, was started January 4, 1872, and continued to be issued for 49 weeks, when it suspended publication. It was revived November 18, 1873, and appeared weekly until the spring of 1875, when it died. The Sun was practically owned and controlled by John T. Musselman with George W. Fender as editor. Mr. Musselman was a radical Democrat and sometimes got on the wrong side of the fence, especially when party politics were not run according to his own personal views.

At one time during the short life of this paper William C. Mareau was employed as an editorial writer. A vitriolic criticism of David D. Dykeman caused the latter to go gunning for the writer. Mr. Dykeman met Mareau at the corner of Pearl and Broadway, pulled a revolver and started shooting at the editor. One bullet took effect, but the wound was not serious. Mareau immediately left the city.

Reason was the name of a weekly which was published during the 1904 campaign by Charles E. Carter in an endeavor to show the inconsistency of the Gold Democrats in opposing the election of William J. Bryan. It died shortly after the end of the campaign.

The Logansport Daily Democrat was the last Democratic paper launched on the sea of journalism in Cass county. It was started by Austin Fansler, former Democratic city clerk, David Loftus and Amos Palmer. It first saw the light in July, 1904. There was not much capital behind the venture and it died after a few months.

Cass county has been ably represented by Democrats in both branches of the United States Congress, as well as in the Legislature of Indiana. General John Tipton, who probably did more for the upbuilding of Logansport and Cass county in the early days than any other man, was a member of the United States Senate from 1831 to 1839. He first came to Logansport as an Indian agent and participated in many of the treaties which were drawn up between the Federal Government and the Indians. When the Pottawatomie Indians were removed from this section in 1838 they first objected to leaving, but Captain Tipton raised a company of sixty Cass county men and started them on their way west. By his prompt action he checked what might have been an insurrection.

Dr. G. N. Fitch was also a member of the United States Senate. He was born in New York in 1809 and with his father came to Cass county in 1834. He represented Cass county in the lower House of Representatives in 1851 and 1852 and was United States senator 1858-1861. He was a presidential elector in 1856.

David Turpie, who also represented Indiana in the United States Senate, was a resident of Logansport for a number of years. He studied law here with D. D. Pratt in 1849 and practiced law here from 1867 to 1872.

Judge William Z. Stuart, one of the pioneer Democrats, was a member of the state supreme court, 1853-1857, and Judge Horace P. Biddle, who in early life had been a Whig, but who later became an ardent Democrat, was a member of the supreme court, 1874-1880. Judge Moses B. Lairy became a member of the appellate court in 1911 and in 1912 was elected a member of the supreme court. Judge George E. Ross, who is practicing at the Cass county bar at the present time, was a member of the appellate court, 1893-1897.

Rufus Magee, former editor of the Logansport Pharos, and at present a member of the Cass county bar, was United States minister to Norway and Sweden, 1885-1889. Mr. Magee, during his life, has always taken an active part in politics. Although now well advanced in years, he still does his part in every campaign, making speeches throughout the county and assisting in other ways in perfecting the Democratic organization.

William H. Jacks, who died a few years ago, was United States consul at London, Ont., during Cleveland's first administration. Later he became docket clerk in the Cass circuit court and held this position until the time of his death.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF CLARK COUNTY

THE county of Clark, being named in honor of George Rogers Clark, was the second county in the territory of Indiana and was organized on the third of February, 1801, fifteen years before the state was admitted to the Union.

The original organization of the county was under proclamation by General William Henry Harrison, the first territorial governor. The territory included was a part of Knox county which had been organized in the '90s and had embraced most of the territory now included in the state of Indiana.

The new county of Clark included what is now incorporated in Harrison, Floyd, Clark, Washington, Jackson, Scott, Jefferson, Ripley, Decatur, Franklin, Bartholomew, Shelby, Rush, Fayette, Union, Henry, Randolph, Wayne, Jay and Switzerland. This embraces about one-fifth of the territory in the present State of Indiana and was a part of the grant of land given to General Clark and his men by the State of Virginia, January 2, 1881.

At the time of the organization of the county only one family resided at Charleston and a few more scattered families about six miles east. Jonathan Jennings, afterwards to become the first governor of Indiana, lived in the neighborhood of Springville, which was the first county seat. The seat of government was removed from Springville to Jeffersonville in 1802.

The first court in the county was held at Springville, April 7, 1801. The judges composing that court were Marston Green Clark, Abraham Huff, James Noble Wood, Thomas Downs, William Goodwin, John Gibson, Charles Tuley, and William Harwood. They were the head men of the county and selected regardless of politics, although at the time there were none but Democrats living anywhere in the territory.

Officers for the county were named as follows: Samuel Gwathmey clerk for the several courts, Jesse Roland judge of probate, Davis Floyd recorder, Thomas Downs treasurer, Marston Green Clark surveyor, Samuel Hay sheriff, Peter McDonald coroner. These family names were all very conspicuous in the history of the county for many years.

When the seat of government was transferred to Jeffersonville, Isaac Bowman, on June 23, 1802, transferred 150 acres to the county commissioners, and John Gwathmey was appointed to plat the land. The plan for the town was devised by Thomas Jefferson, for whom the place was named. Later on, in 1817, as the town grew, the plan was entirely changed, in order to utilize for building purposes many tracts which were set aside for parks and breathing spaces.

In the election of 1842 Thomas J. Henly, Democrat, was elected to represent the third district of Indiana in the congress, defeating Joseph L. White, the Whig nominee.

Clark county had the distinction of being the home of the first two candidates for governor of the state, Jonathan Jennings and Thomas Posey.

Jeffersonville lost the county seat to Charlestown in 1812 and the local seat of government remained fixed until 1878, when it was removed permanently to Jeffersonville.

In 1813 Jeffersonville became temporarily the seat of government of Indiana. Governor Posey did not like Corydon and moved his office, as he explained to the legislature, so he could be nearer to his doctor, who lived in Louisville. The legislature criticised him very severely for this act, but he remained there until November 7, 1816.

Since the organization of the county and to the present time, more than one hundred years since the state was admitted to the union, it requires a very close searching of the records to find where any Whig or Republican has ever held office.

While in the earlier days there were no party divisions at the polls because there were not enough people outside the Democratic party to form a political organization, later the lines were very tightly drawn and there has been very little variation in the vote.

In 1846, for instance, James Whitcomb, the Democratic candidate, received 1,113 votes, against 883 for his Republican opponent. In the election of 1856 the vote of the county was divided more than had been usual. Buchanan, Democratic nominee, received 1,950 votes; Fillmore, of the American party, 1,074, and Fremont, Republican nominee, 492.

In the October election, the same year, Oliver P. Morton received 1,485 votes against his Democratic opponent, who had 1,799.

Taking a jump of twenty years, during which time the vote remained about in the same proportion, in 1874 the Democratic candidate for secretary of state polled 3,407 against his Republican opponent, who had 2,129.

In the interesting campaign of 1876, when James D. Williams, the Democratic nominee, opposed Benjamin Harrison for governor, the Democratic vote in Clark county was 3,235, the Republicans polling 2,446.

Samuel Tilden, who polled the popular vote of the country, received in Clark county 3,369, against 2,399 for Hayes.

In the presidential year of 1880, with Garfield opposing Hancock, Clark county gave to Hancock 3,659, and to Garfield 2,899, while Franklin Landers, Democratic candidate for governor, received 3,617, against Porter's 2,902.

In 1888 the presidential vote stood Democratic 3,789, Republican 3,207. In 1892 Democratic 4,013, Republican 3,280. For governor, that same year, Claude Matthews, Democratic nominee, received 3,999 votes, against 3,259 for Ira J. Chase, Republican nominee. In 1890, two years preceding this same presidential election, Matthews received in Clark county 3,393 votes against Milton Trusler, his Republican opponent, who had 2,485.

In 1896 was one of the bad spots in the Democratic record. In that year William J. Bryan made his first race for president and Benjamin F. Shively was the Democratic nominee for governor against James A. Mount. Bryan received 3,785, McKinley 3,897, Shively 3,763, and Mount 3,846.

The year following the Democratic majority returned, but in 1900, when John W. Kern became a candidate for governor and Bryan was nominated for his second race, Bryan received only 4,134, against 4,087 for McKinley; Kern had 4,097, while W. T. Durbin had 3,816.

In 1904 the switch to the Republican presidential ticket was sufficient to give Hanly a lead over Kern for governor. On the presidential ticket Parker received 3,587, while Roosevelt had 3,644. Hanly received 3,590 votes, against 3,573 for Kern.

In 1908, when Thomas R. Marshall redeemed the state from a succession of Republican governors, he carried Clark county with 4,097 votes, against 3,648 for James Eli Watson. The same year Bryan and Kern carried the county by 4,085 against Taft, who received 3,706.

In 1912 very little of the Republican party remained in Clark county, Wilson and Marshall receiving 3,315, Taft 805, and Roosevelt 2,453 as the leader of the Progressives.

In 1914, in the state election, the Democratic vote was completely restored, the senatorial vote standing Democratic 2,727, Republican 1,150, and to Albert J. Beveridge, the Progressive candidate, 1,701.

In 1916 only seven of the original Progressive voters remained, and Wilson was given 3,572 votes, and Hughes 3,173, and Clark county has the appearance of being safely and securely Democratic for a good many years to come.

There are many interesting stories told of the early days, and of even more recent date, in the political doings of Clark county. Major William Lewis was one of the early-day Democrats who was such a strong partisan and so set in his belief in the soundness of Democratic doctrines and principles that nothing but good Democrats have appeared in his family line for a hundred years.

He was the great-grandfather of Frank Payne, who was appointed by Governor Thomas R. Marshall a member of the Indiana railroad commission, and later became a member, under Governor Samuel M. Ralston, of the first public service commission.

Major Lewis came to Clark county from Ohio in 1826, and at once became a leading political figure in the county and state. He was well-to-do in those days, being possessed of both finances and property. President Andrew Jackson named him receiver of the local land office, and stories have passed down of the method of handling the business that are at least interesting. Most of the money paid into the land office was in small denominations, both scrip and smallest of coins. As the story goes, the money was counted when received and was thrown into a large box, where it was kept until time to ship it; that then it was shoveled or dumped into sacks and sent on the river to Washington, without second counting, and "there was never a cent missing." This is always told by latter-day Democrats of Clark county as a testimonial to the thorough honesty of a Democratic community and is considered worth a whole lot as an answer to the many unkind things said of the party in Indiana by the opposition press "from everlasting to everlasting." For the Democratic party and leaders of Indiana, ever since the days when the first ballot was cast to the present time, have certainly been subject of language tirades from the publicity organs of the opposition. Democrats have thrived on the abuse and grown a sturdy fighting stock.

Major Lewis had one son named William Jackson. When Jackson was traveling from the capitol at the end of his administration, he visited Jeffersonville and made the home of Major Lewis his stopping-place. He presented the boy with a book and a silver fifty-cent piece. They have since been preserved by the family. The son, William Jackson Lewis, died and another son was given the same name.

One son of Major Lewis, Felix R. Lewis, was even more active in politics than his father had been. During the tempestuous times of Know-Nothingism he was an opponent of fanaticisms. He never was anything but a Democrat in principle as well as in the practical application of the principles at the ballot-box. During the campaign he invited Ashbel P. Willard to speak at Jeffersonville. Armed with a couple of horse pistols Lewis mounted the stage and introduced the speaker, announcing that he was prepared to take care of anyone who dared interpose any interruptions.

When election day came most of the rough element went across the river to Louisville to engage in the historically bloody elections. Lewis stayed at home, and with the same horse pistols he stood at the polls and declared his intention of seeing that no man who was entitled to vote was denied the right. The result was that everybody who claimed the right exercised it.

Probably the most interesting family in the politics of Clark county was that of Thomas Jefferson Howard. The sons were George Washington Howard, John Wesley Howard, Martin Van Buren Howard and Andrew Jackson Howard. It was in 1868 that George Washington and his father agreed that George should become the candidate for sheriff, and they entered the campaign. Martin Van Buren Howard decided some weeks later that he would like the same job for himself, so he entered the race against his brother George. Much to the chagrin of his father and brother George, he won.

"Leave my house and never return," were the orders of the father to the successful Martin Van Buren. "All right, father," answered Martin; "but when I go, Samson-like, I take the chief pillar of the temple with me."

Martin Van Buren's term of office expired in 1871. The family feud was patched up by Martin resigning in the last year of his term and allowing George to be appointed and become the new candidate. But when election time rolled around George Washington Baxter opposed the Howard family ambitions and was elected.

In 1874, George Washington Howard had his ambitions gratified when he was elected to serve as sheriff till 1877.

"Jack" Howard, who served a number of years as superintendent of the state reformatory, was Andrew Jackson Howard.

Beginning with 1824 the records to 1916 show the following Democrats to have held important offices in Clark county, and the year in which they were elected:

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF CLAY COUNTY

DANIEL HARRIS, resident of Spencer, Owen county, Indiana, member of the State General Assembly in December, 1824, introduced the bill for an act authorizing the organization of Clay county. By his bill the territory that was to form the new county was sliced from Vigo and Owen counties, these having been organized in 1818.

Harris was an enthusiastic member of the Whig party. He was a worshiper of Henry Clay. Probably one of the motives which caused him to introduce the Clay county bill was the opportunity it gave him to attach the name of his political idol to something where it would not wash off in the years to follow. Because of his performance in making the new county a reality, for the remainder of his years he was known as "Old Clay" and as the "Father of Clay County."

As a Whig he surely could take small comfort from the political performances of his new baby, even from the very start. Right off the reel, at the first election called in 1825, everything went tumbling pell-mell, helter-skelter for Democracy. It has grown stronger in the same way each year since. About the only show any Whig or Republican ever had to hold an office was to move out and not let his new neighbors know he had lived at one time in Clay county.

The fact that the county was named for Henry Clay, also one of the uncompromising Whigs, never helped in the least to save it, for the Democrats have not shown the least bit of sentiment or reverence for the name. Maybe if Clay had lived there for a few months he might have seen the error of his political behavior and become a Democrat with far more personal accomplishments than ever came to his performances as a Whig.

Some of the Democrats who helped make the county Democratic in the early days, and to keep it so ever since, are still living and rejoicing in their good work. One of these is Clinton M. Thompson, who served as county clerk from 1864 to 1868, and who is still living in 1918 at the age of ninety years.

Another is John Frump, who was county treasurer from 1864 to 1868, and who has always been conspicuous in the politics of Clay county and the State. He is still, at the age of ninety-six in 1918, an active and effective worker for the party interests. In explaining how a Whig or a Republican happened once in a long while to get into some public office he says: "You know we just spilled a little gasoline in the road occasionally and the Republicans touched a match to it and started a little fire. But it never burned very long or large enough to do any particular damage. It never started in the same place a second time."

Peter T. Luther is also one of the old-time fighters and in the later years a Democratic state convention would hardly be complete without him. Anyhow, he is always there representing Clay county and enthused with the old-time Democratic spirit. He has served in various capacities in his county, among others being county recorder from 1868 to 1872 and county surveyor from 1866 to 1868.

While the county was organized in 1825, the plat of the "seat of justice" was not placed on record until 1828, and it was in 1829, during the administration of Andrew Jackson, that the patents for the town site were issued and recorded.

Being so overwhelmingly Democratic in politics that there was little chance for any political quarrels outside the family, the residents did not delay long in starting county-seat fights. Bowling Green had been made the county seat, and all over the territory within the county limits ambitious citizens had town sites that were "much better," and they were freely offered. Then as now there were lots of people ready to serve the public by turning over their town sites. This started in 1830 and it continued until 1877, when the move was finally made to Brazil.

While the fight was going on before the Legislature and by petition to the county commissioners to have the county seat changed, and while the fight was won at least on two separate occasions before these bodies, the courts were appealed to and the decisions upset what the legislative bodies had tried to do. When the fire came in 1851 and burned the court house at Bowling Green the Legislature sought to prevent the rebuilding until such time as the voters of the county might decide what to do, but the commissioners went ahead with the rebuilding just the same, and, as already stated, the move from Bowling Green to Brazil did not come until January, 1877.

The order for removal was made in 1871, but court and other delays prevented the order being carried out for six years.

An effort is made in the lists that follow to mention all the Democrats who have held office since the county was organized. The list has been checked over with a great deal of care and compared with other histories, with the public records, with the newspaper files and by the men who have been active in politics all their lives and who were personally acquainted with many of these officials.

It is the first purely political list any writers have attempted and because of this and its accuracy it is the more valuable.

Another peculiar interest that attaches to the names is the fact that many of the men were afterwards conspicuous in the political life of other counties of Indiana, and are still so. All save names of Democrats have been eliminated from these lists:

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF CLINTON COUNTY

By Joseph Combs

CLINTON COUNTY is located in the north-central portion of the State, in the north part of the Ninth Congressional District, and in a fine agricultural region. The county is bounded on the north by Carroll and Howard, on the east by Howard, Tipton and Hamilton, on the south by Boone, and on the west by Montgomery and Tippecanoe.

Before the advent of the white men it was a portion of the territory occupied by the Miami tribe of Indians, but so far as known there was no permanent Indian settlement in the county. The first white settler was David Killgore, who located just north of where the village of Jefferson was afterward settled, in the year of 1826. Other settlers followed in rapid succession, and a year later the town of Jefferson, the first in the county, was occupied by several newcomers. This was the first town laid out in the county and it was named after the illustrious founder of the Democratic party.

The first step taken to establish local government was the act of the State Legislature of January 24, 1828, by which the territory embraced in the county was added to Tippecanoe County under the name of Washington Township. The territory had been open to settlement for ten years prior to that time, but the southern part of the State and in and near Indianapolis as well as along the Wabash river offered greater attractions to the settler, and so emigration came slowly at first.

The first action taken by the authorities of Tippecanoe county to govern this new territory was by what was then called the Board of Justices of the county, which then acted as County Commissioners. This was in March, 1829, and the Board ordered that the new territory attached to their county be named "Washington Township;" that all elections be held at the house of David Killgore, and John Ross was appointed inspector of all elections in the township for a period of one year. Also John Ross and Nathan Kirk were appointed supervisors of the State road leading from Lafayette to Newcastle in Henry county, which passed through the new township. Also Elijah Ferguson was appointed assessor of the township for the year of 1829. At the May session, 1829, of the Board, the place of election was changed to the house of John Ross, and an election was ordered to be held at his house on the first Monday of June following, for the purpose of electing two Justices of the Peace, for said township, and all elections thereafter to be held in the township were ordered to be held at the house of the said John Ross. The assessor, Elijah Ferguson, was allowed $40.00 for assessing the township that year. In July of that year the board licensed J. K. Leming to vend foreign merchandise in the town of Jefferson, for the term of four months, the license fee being fixed at $3.33. At the same term the Board also appointed Joseph Hill constable for the township during the remainder of that year. At the September session of the Board, Abner Baker and Aaron H. Southard were granted licenses to retail merchandise for the term of six months on the payment of a $5.00 fee. This was the last session of the Board of Justices, and in November, 1829, they were superseded by the Board of County Commissioners. The only business affecting the new territory by this Board of County Commissioners, was the appointment of Isaac Cook, Thomas Canby, and Mordecai McKinsey as road viewers, to view two "cartways" which were petitioned for by Nathan Kirk and Samuel Allen, which services they performed and made report thereof at the March session, 1830. While the new territory thus added to Tippecanoe county was named Washington township, the people began calling it "Washington Territory." By 1830 the population had increased to 1,423, and a petition was prepared and presented to the State Legislature for a separate county government. This petition was favorably acted upon, and the new county was ordered established. The question of building canals for transportation was then a live issue in this part of the State and so the new county was named "Clinton" in honor of Dewitt Clinton, the canal-building Governor of New York. The act establishing the new county was approved January 29, 1830. The first section of which fixed the boundary as given above and the name, the second section designated March 1, when the act should take effect, and the third section named Robert Taylor of Montgomery county, Henry Ristine of Tippecanoe county, Hugh B. McKee of Cass county, John Cary of Carroll county and Jeremiah Corbaly of Marion county, commissioners, to fix the county seat of the new county. Provision was also made for the election of three County Commissioners for the new county, who were, when elected, to meet at the house of Matthew Bunnell on the first Monday in May for the transaction of all of the business of the county. The Circuit Court was to be held at Jefferson and was attached to the first judicial circuit for that purpose. Provision was also made for the establishment of a public library for the county.

The Commissioners above named met in Jefferson on the first Monday in May as directed, and, after considerable time being taken in considering the question of the location of the new county seat, some of the people strongly favoring Jefferson, while others opposed this place as not being centrally located, John Pence came forward and offered to donate sixty acres of ground and $100.00 if the county seat should be located on his farm. This offer was accepted, and the new town was later laid out and established, named Frankfort, which has always remained the seat of government for the county.

The first election was held May 3, 1830, at the cabin of Matthew Bunnell, just south and a little west of where the "Farmer's Chapple" church now stands, in Bunnell's cemetery. There was no politics in this election. The two opposing parties in those days were the Jackson Democrats and the old Whig party, the latter afterward merged into the Republican. Jackson had been President a little over a year and was immensely popular; nearly every man elected at this first election was a Jackson Democrat.

John Douglass, Joseph Hall and Mordecai McKinsey were elected County Commissioners. John Pence was elected County Treasurer; Beal Dorsey, Recorder; Samuel D. Maxwell, Clerk of the Circuit Court and County Auditor. The office of Clerk and Auditor were held by the same officer till 1841. William Douglass was elected Probate Judge, and Samuel Mitchell and John Ross, Associate Judges. Isaac D. Armstrong, one of our most prominent of the old-time Democrats, was appointed the first County Surveyor by Governor James B. Ray, shortly after the county was organized. Solomon Young was the first Sheriff of the county.

From 1830 to 1840 there is little of political history, either of the Democrats or of any other party, to be recorded in Clinton county. There was nothing then in existence to which we can compare our present party organization. No such thing as a county chairman and secretary and precinct committeemen was then known. While candidates usually professed to be Jackson Democrats, or Whig Republicans, the elections usually turned and was decided on purely local or personal considerations. The population was sparse and much scattered, and the number of voters but few. What few roads there were, were bad about half of the year or more, and so means of communication was difficult, and not much campaigning could be done, if it had been desired, which it was not. Electing candidates for the few offices was a simple and informal matter as compared with more modern and present-day political methods.

In the early history of the county, when politics became more prominent, the county usually went Democratic, and was so classed. Whenever partisanship was aroused and party lines were tightly drawn between the old Whig party and the Democratic party prior to the time of the Civil War, the majority was generally Democratic. At times the majority was slender, ranging from one hundred up to three hundred, but the last figure was unusual and rarely reached. When the slavery question became foremost, as it did about 1850 and after, the Democratic majority in the county was reduced. Occasionally a Whig was elected to a county office, but rarely; after the Republican party came into existence majorities changed, the Democratic majority was reduced and from 1860 to 1872, at presidential elections, the county went Republican. Generally at State elections the county was reliably Democratic and the county officers were Democrats with occasionally an exception.

The first Clerk of the Circuit Court was Samuel D. Maxwell, an old-time Whig. He held the office for fourteen years, eleven of which he served also as County Auditor. He was succeeded as clerk by John Barner, a Democrat, who filled this office for fifteen years, and was succeeded by his son, David P. Barner, also a Democrat, who performed the duties of this office for two terms of four years each. David P. Barner is still living (1917) and one of the oldest Democrats in the county. His father, John Barner was also County Treasurer for three years. The first County Auditor was John P. Crothers, who served fourteen years. As County Recorder, Beal Dorsey served nine years and died in office and J. G. Smith served out his unexpired term. I. D. Armstrong, before mentioned, who served six years as County Surveyor, was elected County Recorder and served in that office for fourteen years. After the Civil War Mr. Armstrong also served Clinton county four years as County Treasurer, and, altogether, served the county in some official capacity for nearly a quarter of a century.

During this early period the Judges' offices were filled by the following persons: Circuit Court Judges—President Judges, John R. Porter of Vermillion County, 1830-37; Isaac Naylor of Montgomery county, 1838-51. Associate Judges, Samuel Mitchell, 1830-36; John Ross, 1830-33; Joseph Wood, 1834-36; John Brown, 1837-43; J. F. Aughe, 1837-43; Thomas Kenard, 1844-46; C. B. Pence, 1844-52; James Purdum, 1847-52. The early districts or circuits included a number of counties in the western part of the State, which were "traveled" by the President Judges, the Associate Judges being local residents. At the April term, 1852, the Associate Judges were discontinued under the new constitution and the Circuit Court, with a single judge, was inaugurated.

Probate Judges—Mr. William Douglass, 1830-July, 1831; Nathan Kirk, Aug. 1831-39; N. T. Catterlin (Dem.), 1851; E. Winship, 1851-2. The Probate Court was abolished by the Constitution of 1851 and the business was transferred to the Common Pleas Court.

The judges of the Clinton Circuit Court, from the formation of the Constitution, in 1852, to the present time are as follows: William P. Bryant (Parke county), 1852-1858; John M. Cowan, 1858-1870; Thomas F. Davidson, 1870-1873; Truman H. Palmer (Dem.), 1873-1878; Thomas J. Terhune (Dem.), 1878-1883; Joseph C. Suit (Rep.), 1883-1884; Allen E. Paige (Dem.), 1884-1890; Samuel H. Also the following are prominent Democrats in local and State affairs: M. Epstein, merchant, and one of the trustees appointed by Governor Ralston of the hospital for the insane at Longcliff, Logansport, Ind.; William A. Morris, local business man and well known over the State in Masonic and other orders, and was a candidate for Treasurer of State at the Democratic State convention of 1914; William B. Gregg, Trustee of Johnson township.

Among the old-time Democrats who served the party in years past as leaders and advisers, but who are not now living, may be mentioned the following: Henry Y. Morrison, who, while a member of the State Legislature in the session of 1869, introduced and secured the passage of the first law for the drainage of wet lands in the State, and thus became the father of the Indiana Drainage Law which has done so much to reclaim wet lands; David F. Clark of Madison township, a farmer and an able speaker at Democratic meetings; Nathan B. Combs, Sr., of Washington township, father of Judge Combs, and one of the Democratic pioneers, coming from Butler county, Ohio, in 1856; James S. Bailey of Perry township, former County Commissioner; Dr. Fisher of Rossville, Dr. Hiram Coon of Colfax, John Q. Garratt of Hillisburg and John Fleming of Warren township, former County Treasurer.

The date of the first Democratic county organization cannot be definitely fixed, but it was probably just prior to 1860. The earliest Democratic County Chairman known was Franklin D. Caldwell, who served for three campaigns—1864, 1866 and 1868. From the year 1886 those who have served as county chairmen for the party are as follows; Elwood Avery, 1886; Dewitt C. Bryant, 1888; David F. Allen, 1890; William G. Morris, 1892; John W. Lydy, 1894; Benjamin P. Martin, 1896; Benjamin P. Martin, 1898; Benjamin P. Martin, 1900; John W. Hedgecock, 1902 and 1904; George Smith, 1906, 1908 and 1910; Paul Pence, 1912; John W. Hedgecock, 1914; John Mattix, 1916, and present County Chairman.

Two men while residents of Clinton county have been elected as representatives in the National Congress—Joseph B. Cheadle, elected as Republican in 1886 and 1888, and Martin A. Morrison, Democrat. Mr. Cheadle served in Congress for four years and was an honest and conscientious official. He was a member of the G. A. R. and had a large personal following. About 1895, when the coinage question became prominent, he strongly espoused the doctrine of the free coinage of silver, and when Bryan was nominated by the Democrats he became an ardent supporter of the Nebraskan in 1896, and in that campaign and again in 1898 he was the candidate of the Democrats for Congress in the Ninth congressional district, and in 1896 was defeated by a very narrow margin. He remained a loyal supporter of the Democratic party till the time of his death, in 1904.

Martin A. Morrison, the only Democrat elected to Congress from this county, was born April 15, 1862, and the son of Henry Y. Morrison. He was a graduate of the Frankfort high school, and also of Butler College and the University of Virginia Law School, and admitted to practice at the bar of the Clinton Circuit Court in 1886. He early became prominent as a lawyer and was well known as a democratic speaker throughout the State. He defeated Charles B. Landis, Republican, for Congress in the Ninth district in 1908 and was the first Democrat elected in the district for many years. He was re-elected in 1910, 1912 and 1914, and has served with distinction in those sessions. He declined to be a candidate for reelection in the 1916 campaign. He is a strong character, a man of marked ability, and his record in Congress is of the best.

The first Democratic newspaper was published in Clinton county by Colonel Noah T. Catterlin, in 1839, and named the Frankfort Argus. Mr. Catterlin was one of the most prominent and enterprising of the old-time Democrats. It was discontinued in 1842. In 1843 G. Weaver Snyder established another Democratic paper, named the Frankfort Observer. It was discontinued during the summer of 1844. Three years later another Democratic paper was begun under the name of the Clintonian, by T. J. Taylor, but this lasted only a year. In June, 1849, Joseph R. Horsley began the publication of a Democratic paper called the Clinton News. This was the first permanent newspaper established in the county, for though the name and editors have been changed, the paper still exists. In the fall of 1850 the paper was purchased by John Gamble and Hugh B. McCain and the name was changed to the Compiler. In 1851 Mr. Gamble purchased the entire interest, greatly enlarged and improved the paper and changed the name to the Frankfort Weekly Crescent. For the past sixty-five years the paper has still retained the name Crescent, although changed to a daily later and still later combined with another paper. In 1854 Mr. Gamble sold the paper to Leander McClurg and Joseph T. Pressly. The new owners were attorneys-at-law and still engaged in the practice of their profession, but also edited and published the paper. They continued to publish the paper till June, 1855, when Pressly sold his interest to J. B. Newton of Delphi, Ind. In 1857 McClurg sold his interest to William H. Ghere and a year later Ghere sold his interest to Newton, who thereby became the entire owner. A year later Leander McClurg again bought a half interest and McClurg and Newton conducted the paper for four years, when, in 1862, they sold it to Franklin D. Caldwell of Killmore. Caldwell published the paper till March, 1863, when he sold it to Joshua N. Armentrout, and he conducted it till April, 1867, when he sold it to Allen E. Paige. Paige controlled the paper till October, 1869, when he sold a half interest to Jabez T. Cox, and in January, 1870, Cox bought the remaining interest of Paige. Cox continued the paper till February, 1872, when it passed into the hands of a joint stock company and under the new company it was conducted by W. H. Ghere and T. H. Palmer until June, 1872, when Erastus H. Staley was employed as editor. A few months later Mr. Staley purchased a controlling interest in the paper and continued to be owner and editor for nineteen years. Mr. Staley is the veteran editor and newspaper publisher of our county and in local newspaper circles is styled "father of the chapter." He is now nearly eighty-five years of age, but still active and contributes to our local papers.

In 1885 the Crescent was changed to a daily paper. Mr. Staley sold the Crescent to Eli W. Brown in 1891, an able newspaper man from Northern Indiana, who conducted it till his death in 1895, when it was purchased by B. H. Dornier and Charles Fennell. In November, 1896, Fennell sold his interest to Bayard Gray, a son of Governor Isaac P. Gray, and Dornier and Gray published the paper till the death of Dornier in July, 1901. Gray continued to publish the paper till January, 1906, when it was taken over by a joint stock company with Jerome Clark, president, and J. A. Hedgecock, manager. Mr. Hedgecock died in the spring of 1907, and in June of that year Mr. Robert C. Houston, an experienced newspaper man of Marion, Ind., became editor and manager. This publication and management of the Crescent was continued till January, 1913, when the stockholders of this paper and the owner of the News, the local Republican paper, Mr. William G. Hendricks, combined the two papers into one, under the name of Crescent-News, of which company Markwood Slipper is president and William G. Hendricks, business manager. It has the united press telegraph service and is a splendid newspaper enjoying a large circulation.

Prior to the breaking out of the war in 1860 the county was normally Democratic, but the war brought about some change, and for a few years following that time the county was slightly Republican, but the margin was always narrow either way. Since about 1865 to 1885 the county was generally Democratic, with an occasional Republican elected on the county ticket, but the State and Presidential election showing a Democratic majority. President Cleveland carried the county in 1884 by about 250, the majority for Tilden in 1876 being still larger. But in 1886 the county went Republican on both the State and county tickets, and this occurred again in 1888 when President Harrison carried the county by about 250 and the Republicans electing all of their county ticket. But in 1890 it changed again, the State ticket being almost a tie vote, and the Democrats electing all of the county ticket but three men. In 1892 it changed back to Republican, Harrison again carrying the county by about 220, and the Republicans electing all of their county ticket. In 1894 there was a Republican landslide and the county went Republican by 600 on the State ticket, also electing all of the county ticket. In 1896 there was another change to the Democrats, Bryan carried the county by about 135, and the Democrats elected all of the county ticket but treasurer. In 1898 there was a slight change back to the Republican party, on the State ticket the county giving about 100 majority for the Republicans, but the Democrats secured nearly all of the important county offices, on account of having a strong local ticket.

In 1900 it was again a very close race on the State ticket with a divided county ticket. In 1902 there was a decided change to the Republican party, the Republican State ticket having about 420 majority, and they also elected their entire county ticket, but some by very narrow margin. In 1904 there was an overwhelming Republican majority, Roosevelt carrying the county against Parker for President by over 900 majority, but the Democrats succeeded in pulling their candidate for sheriff through, electing John W. Haggard for sheriff by about 60 majority. This was the high tide of Republican victories in the county, and from then on their majorities all along, from that of President down to all local tickets, gradually fell off, till the county became strongly Democratic. The first change came in 1906, when Charles F. Cromwell for Auditor broke the hitherto strong Republican machine in both Center and Kirklin townships, he carrying every precinct in both of these Republican strongholds, and was elected by over 300 majority, and carried three others of the county ticket with him. Two years later, in 1908, the Democrats carried their State and Presidential tickets in the county by a little less than 100, gave Morrison for Congress nearly 800 and carried all of their county ticket but two men.

In 1910 the tendency was still strong toward the Democrats, they electing nearly all of the county ticket and showing a majority on the State ticket. In 1912 there was a complete landslide, Wilson for President and Ralston for Governor having about 1,000 plurality, and the Democratic county ticket all elected by majorities ranging from 500 to 1,200, and the first time since 1882 when the Democrats had carried all of the county ticket. In 1914 there was a heavy falling off in the Democratic plurality, the State ticket dropping down to 250 plurality, and the Republicans succeeded in electing three men on their county ticket. There was an unprecedented amount of "scratching" on the local ticket, the Republicans electing one man by 150 plurality, and the Democrats having more than 900 plurality on some of their ticket. An analysis of the votes cast during the last ten years shows that there is getting to be a very large independent vote, especially in all local contests. Twenty years ago this was not so, and a man to be elected, no matter how worthy or popular, must be on the ticket having a majority for the State and National offices, or else he was defeated. But this is no longer the case. The independent vote is increasing every year and it is becoming more and more apparent at every election that if a party wants to be successful it must put forth candidates who are in every way well qualified, and who will meet with popular approval.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF CRAWFORD COUNTY

CRAWFORD COUNTY is one of the smallest in the State. It lies midway from east to west and where the "Le Belle Riviere" makes that grand sweeping circle called Horse-shoe Bend, giving the county twenty-four miles of river border. Its verdure-clad hills afford as grand scenery as can be found in the State, and its great underground caverns have been visited by people from all parts of the world.

Perhaps its people are not as cultured as those who live nearer to the great centers of art, and science and commerce, but nowhere can there be found more hospitable people, truer friends, warmer hearts, more sterling, rugged, honest men and splendid women, than in this old river county where they are born, and live, and grow, close to Nature.

The county was formed from parts of Harrison, Orange and Perry counties by an Act of the Legislature of 1817-18, and was named in honor of William H. Crawford of Georgia, who had many admirers in that session. The Legislature appointed a Board of Commissioners who organized the county early in the spring of 1818 and selected Mt. Sterling, then the only village in the county, as the county seat. Governor Jennings appointed the following officers to start the governmental machinery of the new county: William Samuels, Clerk and Recorder; Daniel Weathers, Sheriff and Treasurer; Cornelius Hall and John Samuels, County Commissioners; Hon. Davis Floyd, Presiding Judge, and Henry Green and James Glenn, Associate Justices. The first term of court was held at Mt. Sterling in December, 1818.

Almost all of the early settlers came from the Carolinas, Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky. They were strong anti-federalists and were great admirers of Jefferson, Monroe and Jackson. They were imbued with the spirit of the then Far West, and upon the formation of the Democratic party the county cast its vote for Jackson. Ever since that time it has remained reliably Democratic upon State and National issues, and but few times in its history has it defeated Democratic candidates on the local ticket. The county has had eleven auditors, three of whom have been Republicans; nineteen treasurers, four of whom have been Republicans; fourteen recorders, three of whom have been Republicans; fourteen clerks, four of whom have been Republicans; seventeen sheriffs, four of whom have been Republicans. Only one Republican has been elected to the General Assembly from the county.

The following incident of the pre-election days of 1832 showed Jackson's popularity in the county at that time and also illustrated the almost proverbial ignorance of the early Hoosier.

An early circuit rider spent a week in a certain community preaching at the different homes. On Saturday night he closed his week's work with a very earnest and urgent invitation to those present to affiliate themselves with the followers of Wesley, but no one responded to his appeal. Being somewhat disappointed and discouraged by the indifferent attitude of his congregation towards things spiritual, he said:

"Brothers and sisters, I have labored among you for a whole week trying to show you the way unto salvation, and now, when you have an opportunity to accept Christ as your Savior, you refuse; and it seems that all my labor in your behalf has been in vain. Is there one present who believes in Jesus Christ? If so, let him arise!" No one arose. Not entirely discouraged, he made another appeal: "Is there one, JUST ONE, in this congregation who believes in Jesus Christ and his teachings? If there is, let him stand!" His appeal was not in vain this time. A great, rough fellow from the hills for which the county is famous, being evidently aroused by the rebuke that had been administered because of their indifference, arose and addressed the man of God thus: "Stranger, we all have enjoyed your speeches and we feel that you have done us a whole lot of good; and we all believe in Jesus Christ, all right, but so far as principles and teachings are concerned we want you to understand that, by the eternal, we are going to stay with Old Hickory this time."

The first party organization dates back almost to the formation of the party, but the names of the members who composed it can not be obtained. The following have served, in the order named, as chairman of the county central committee, or as head of the county organization: John H. McMickle, John Benz, W. S. Ross, Martin J. Miller, J. R. Duffing, S. A. Beals, C. A. Roberson, J. E. Jones, Charles Rogers, T. B. Sonner, B. T. McFarland and G. B. Hammond. The first named served uninterruptedly for more than twenty-five years. Under their leadership the county has given Democratic candidates a majority, except in two or three instances, of from fifty to five hundred. The last named is the present chairman of the county central committee.

The following residents of the county have been ected to the General Assembly: Jesse E. Crecelius, John K. Landis, Henry Jenkins, John L. Bates, W. M. Ellsworth, Houston Miller, Edmund Hostetter, Hamilton C. Hammond, David T. Stephenson, Clark F. Crecelius, Charles T. Myler, John Benz and Sam Benz. While none of them attained national prominence, yet they all served the State with much honor and their constituents with great fidelity. Not one of them was the author of any great act of constructive legislation, but every one was always at his post of duty and always voted, as he thought, for the best interests of the State and his community.

John Benz served as coroner and school trustee previous to his election to the General Assembly in 1874, 1878 and 1906. While the State capital was at Corydon the early members of the Legislature had not far to go to attend the sessions, but for some years after it was removed to Indianapolis the trip was a difficult one. The southern counties were an almost unbroken forest and John K. Landis and other early members rode horseback to the capital.

Clark F. Crecelius was Recorder of the county from 1870 to 1878 and Treasurer from 1878 to 1882. He served as a member of the Legislature in the general and special sessions of 1885 and was appointed as postmaster at Marengo, Indiana, in 1886, which position he held for four years. He served as Clerk of the Ways and Means Committee of the Legislature of 1891 and was appointed Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue for the seventh district July 22, 1885, but declined the appointment. Later he removed to Floyd county and was elected as Representative from that county at the November election, 1914. His son, C. F. Crecelius, Jr., is Secretary of State of Kentucky.

Following the names of some old-time Democrats who for many years marshalled the Democratic hosts of the county and led them to victory: James M. Mansfield, John B. Pankey, Esau McFall, Samuel E. McFall, Edmund Hostetter, John K. Landis, Elijah Roberson, Thomas Myler, Thomas Fleming, W. T. Carr, W. T. Beasley, Caleb Longest, John Gregory, J. A. Hughes, Jacob Tucker, George W. Cuzzort, John Benz, W. M. Ellsworth, James C. McClain, Harrison Scott, Martin Scott, Dr. H. H. Setser, Dr. G. W. Bayler, William Merrilees, Wilson Gregory, W. C. Froman, M. C. Froman, Samuel P. Batman, H. K. Jenkins, D. T. Stephenson, C. F. Crecelius, Jesse E. Crecelius, W. S. Ross, John H. McMickle, Thomas P. Ellsworth, C. D. Luckett, Burton J. Brown, Joshua Hollen, Elias Romaine, Jacob Partenheimer, William L. Temple, Peter Gottfried, John L. Bates, and Houston Miller.

John H. McMickle was a Justice of the Peace for more than forty years and as has been stated, the chairman of the central committee for twenty-five years.

Thomas P. Ellsworth was appointed and served as Clerk in the Weather Bureau at Washington, D. C., during Cleveland's second administration.

"Senator" Benz, as he was familiarly called, was for years a noted figure in Indiana politics. It was one of his proud boasts that from the time he became a voter until the time of his death he had not absented himself from a Democratic State convention. After his death in 1908, his son, Samuel Benz, was chosen to succeed him at a special election held September 17, of the same year.

Martin Scott was foreman of the first grand jury impanelled in the county.

The Crawford Democrat, the first Democratic newspaper in the county, was established at Leavenworth by John P. Cozine in 1869. It was owned and published by Robert L. Peed, Thomas K. Van Sant, John T. Crecelius and M. M. Monk, successively, until 1879, when it was purchased by W. M. Ellsworth and son, who established the Crawford County Democrat and continued as its owners and publishers until 1905. In that year it was purchased by D. W. Flanagan, the present owner. It is one of the best local papers in the State.

The Marengo Observer, owned by Elmo Wilson, is also a splendid local Democratic newspaper.

Other Democratic newspapers were established at English at various times and in succession by Claude D. Douglass, W. J. McDermott, John Benz, Jr., Benjamin Baker and J. R. Pro, but none of them survived.

The present Democratic officials are Hon. Sam Benz, Joint Representative for the counties of Crawford and Perry; Charles T. Brown, Prosecuting Attorney for the counties of Harrison, Crawford and Perry; Henry W. Mock, Clerk of the Circuit Court; A. H. Flannigan, County Treasurer; Iny Dooley, County Recorder; Jesse C. Ewing, Sheriff; S. A. Beals, County Superintendent of Schools; Thomas Cunningham, Surveyor; W. J. Trusty, Coroner, and Jerry Batman, C. J. Tucker and James P. Culver, County Commissioners.

The Democracy of the county has never been favored with a federal appointment except such as have been made on the basis of a civil service examination.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DAVISS COUNTY

By A. O. Fulkerson, Washington

DAVIESS COUNTY came into existence on February 15, 1817, by an act of the Legislature, approved on December 24, 1816, by Jonathan Jennings. Previous to this time it had been a part of Knox county. Its boundaries then included all of the county as now constituted and all of Martin county north of Lick creek, all of Greene county east of the west fork of White river, and all of Owen county east of the west fork of White river. The formation of Martin county in 1820 and of Greene county in 1821 cut Daviess county down to its present boundaries.

Probably a majority of the early inhabitants of the county were of southern extraction. These, in the main, were Democrats. The majority of the early settlers who came from the East were Whigs and later Republicans. Later a number of Irish and Germans settled in the county. They and their descendants, to a large extent, have supported the Democratic ticket. The later settlers in the main were Whigs or Republicans. These different elements composing the voting population of the county have made it rather close politically.

When the Democrats of the county formed their first political organization is not a matter of record, but it is certain that they took a prominent part in the organization of the county. James G. Reed, a Democrat of state-wide reputation, was one of the first judicial officers of the county and represented the county in the State Legislature in 1821, 1823, 1825 and 1831 and was the Democratic candidate for Governor in 1832 and again in 1834.

From the organization of the county until the 80's the Democrats, in a very great majority of cases, elected their county ticket, although the Whigs carried the county for Clay by 43 in 1844, for Taylor in 1848 by 27, and for Scott in 1852 by 106. The Republicans carried the county for Lincoln in 1860 by 185 and for Grant in 1872 by 296. The Democrats carried the county for Buchanan by 176, for McClellan by 72, for Seymour by 50, for Tilden by 324, for Hancock by 67, for Cleveland in 1884 by 202. The shops of the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway, which were built at Washington, the county seat of the county, in the 80's, brought men to Washington, a majority of whom were Republicans. After this the Republicans succeeded more frequently. The Democrats carried the county for Bryan in 1896 by 258 and in 1900 by 126, and for Wilson in 1912 by 754.

A long line of Democrats has represented the county in the State Legislature. Richard A. Clements was State Senator in 1847. In 1853, Gaylord G. Barton, a Democrat of more than local prominence, was elected to the State Senate. He was a vice-chairman at the State convention in 1870. William S. Turner, a Democrat from Daviess county, represented the senatorial district from 1867 to 1869. Later Turner was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for State Auditor. David J. Hebron, prominent in Democratic politics for more than a quarter of a century, was elected State Senator in 1877. The senatorial district of which Daviess county was a part was represented by William Kennedy of Daviess county from 1891 to 1895. This district was again represented in the State Senate by a Daviess county Democrat from 1899 to 1903 by Ephraim Inman, now of Indianapolis. Henry Gers, a prominent German Democrat of Daviess county, was elected State Senator for the term beginning in 1911.

The State representatives from Daviess county have been in most instances, men of more than average ability. Some of them were farmers, some teachers, some lawyers, some doctors and some mechanics. The following were Democrats: James G. Reed was Representative for four terms, as stated above. Patrick M. Brett was representative in 1833, Richard A. Clements in 1841 and 1845, Benjamin Goodwin in 1849, John Scudder in 1851, T. A. Slicer in 1857, R. A. Clements, Jr., in 1859; M. L. Brett in 1861, Noah E. Given in 1863, John H. O'Neill in 1867, John Hyatt in 1869, Robert Haynes in 1871, M. L. Brett in 1873, Harvey Taylor in 1875, P. H. McCarty in 1877, Samuel H. Taylor in 1879, Clement Lee in 1881, Haman Woodling in 1883, Samuel H. Taylor in 1885, Oliver H. McKittrick in 1889, Sanford Patterson in 1897, James F. Parks in 1901, and John Hoddinot in 1913.

Some of the Democrats of the county have made their influence felt not only in local affairs of State but in district, State and nation. As stated above, James G. Reed, a Daviess county Democrat, was twice the candidate of his party for Governor of Indiana. Later he was appointed the Registrar of the Land Office at Jeffersonville. He became a resident of Jeffersonville and was a member of the constitutional convention of 1850 from Clark county. Matthew L. Brett, who was for a long period prominent in the business and political life of the county, was State Treasurer from 1863 to 1865. John R. Phillips, who was one of the early School Examiners of the county, was the Democratic candidate for State Superintendent in 1868. Samuel H. Taylor, School Examiner, County Chairman, Prosecuting Attorney, State Representative and candidate for Congress, was a delegate to the national conventions which nominated Greeley, Tilden and Cleveland in 1884. For nearly half a century John Henry O'Neill was a force in Daviess county politics. He was State Representative in 1867, County Chairman in 1870, 1878, 1896 and 1898, and member of Congress for two terms—1886 and 1888—and a delegate to the national convention in 1896. William D. Bynum, who later was Congressman from the Indianapolis district, was elected City Clerk of Washington in 1870 and Mayor of Washington in 1877. David J. Hefron was county chairman in 1872, and elected Mayor of Washington the same year, and was State Senator from 1877 to 1883. Afterward he was judge of the Forty-ninth Judicial Circuit. James W. Ogdon, the present judge of the circuit composed of Daviess and Martin counties, has been prominent in county, district and State politics for a number of years. He has served his city as mayor and was a delegate to the national convention in 1888. John W. McCarty, the present Mayor of Washington, County Chairman for three terms, postmaster for one term, one of Indiana's representatives in the Cleveland inaugural parade, candidate for Presidential Elector in 1904, was one of Indiana's delegates to the Baltimore convention which nominated Woodrow Wilson. John H. Spencer has been prominent in the councils of his party for a number of years. He has served as Mayor of Washington and was a delegate to the national convention of 1900. Mr. Spencer is now an income tax collector. J. Alvin Padgett is one of the younger Democrats of the county who is influential in State politics. He is now one of the trustees of the Jeffersonville reformatory.

Much of the success of a political party depends upon the manner in which its campaigns are directed. This is especially true in a county which is close politically. A large majority of the Democratic county chairmen of Daviess county have been men of political experience and sagacity. No records of the party's early organizations are to be found. In 1868 Samuel H. Taylor was the county chairman. He conducted a winning campaign. John H. O'Neill directed the campaign of 1870 with success for his party. The county chairman in 1872 was David J. Hef-

ron. Grant carried the county but the Democrats elected their county ticket. The veteran editor of the Daviess County Democrat, Stephen Belding, managed the campaign for the Democrats in 1874 and succeeded in electing their entire ticket. For the centennial year John A. Geeting was the county chairman. Tilden carried the county by a majority of 324, the largest majority any presidential candidate had been given by the county up to that time. John H. O'Neill, in 1878, for the second time, conducted a successful campaign for his party. In 1880, Nathan G. Read was the county chairman. The Democrats carried the county for their county, State and national tickets. W. H. H. Strouse successfully directed the campaign in 1882. Under the management of Arnold J. Padgett, the Democratic county, State and national tickets of 1884 received substantial majorities. The campaign of 1886 was under the direction of W. H. H. Strouse. The Democrats were again successful. Strouse was again manager in 1888. Hovey, the Republican candidate for Governor, carried the county by 3. O'Neill, the Democratic candidate for Congress, carried the county by 4 and McKittrick, the Democratic candidate for State Representative, was elected by 46. John W. McCarty was the county chairman for the campaigns of 1890, 1892 and 1894. The Republicans were successful in each of these campaigns. The Populists polled a large vote in each of these elections and a large part of their votes came from the Democratic party. After a period of twenty-six years, John H. O'Neill was again called upon to manage the campaign for his party. This was the Bryan campaign of 1896. A large number of the Populists voted with the Democrats this year. The Democrats carried the county by an overwhelming majority. O'Neill was again at the helm in 1898. The Democrats were not successful this year. The campaign of 1900 was directed by John H. Spencer. The county again voted for Bryan and the Democratic county ticket. A. O. Fulkerson was the County Chairman in 1902. The Republicans were successful this year. In 1904, John W. McCarty, for the third time, was the manager of the campaign for the Democrats. The Republicans were again the winners. In 1906, George B. McWilliams was the County Chairman and in 1908 Philander McHenry was the manager. The Republicans were successful in both campaigns. E. E. Forsythe was chosen to direct the campaign for the Democrats in 1910. They elected the Auditor, Clerk and Sheriff. Forsythe managed the Democratic campaign again in 1912. The Democrats carried the county by a large majority. This year the Progressives polled a larger vote in the county than did the Republicans. In 1914, Ora McKittrick was the County Chairman. The Republicans won.

The newspapers are molders of public opinion in all lines of thought. The political party that has a newspaper or newspapers edited by men of ability to champion its cause is in a position to do far more effective work than if it were not so supported. The Democratic party of Daviess county has been unusually fortunate in this regard. Men of exceptional ability have been the editors of its Democratic newspapers. The Jacksonian was probably the first Democratic newspaper of the county. During its short life its editor, Jeremiah Young, made a valiant fight for the cause of Democracy. The Sun, edited by Rev. Hamilton Robb, was the next Democratic organ in the county. It soon changed hands and with this change it changed its name to the Washington Bee. James Wilkins was the editor of the Bee. Wilkins did not hesitate to use the strongest, vitriolic language in speaking of his political opponents. In 1867, the Daviess County Democrat was first published. From that time until the present it has been one of the strong county papers of the State. For about thirty years Stephen Belding was its editor. Belding always supported the Democratic ticket in a forceful and effective manner. The local victories of the Democrats during the 60's, the 70's and the 80's were in no small part due to the efforts of Belding through the Democrat. It was during the latter part of the 80's that Samuel B. Boyd became its editor. The Democrat, under the editorship of Boyd, has been and is the same conservative, forceful and influential paper it was under Belding. It is the biggest asset of the Democrats of Daviess county. Henry Backes is now a half-owner of the Democrat. He is its business manager.

Daviess county has been the scene of many hard-fought political battles. Two fights for the congressional delegates of the county are among the most noted. In 1884 Andrew Humphreys of Greene county sought the Democratic nomination for Congress in the Second Congressional District. Thomas R. Cobb of Knox county, who had served two terms in Congress, was again a candidate. The contest had reached the stage that he who won the Daviess county delegation was almost certain to be nominated. A mass convention of the Democrats of the county was called to meet at Washington on March 28, 1884. Democrats from all parts of the county gathered at the court house on that day. Many Republicans were there as spectators. There was no contest in selecting a chairman for the meeting. The trouble came in choosing the delegates. Some wanted the chairman to appoint the delegates, some wanted the Democrats from each township to get together and select their delegates, and some wanted the candidate who had the most supporters present to name the delegates. After much heated discussion it was decided that all the Democrats present should assemble in the yard at the east entrance of the court house and the Cobb supporters gather on one side of the walk and the Humphreys supporters on the other. After many charges and counter-charges of dishonesty and unfair methods were hurled back and forth it was decided that Cobb had the majority.

A somewhat similar fight took place in 1902. Congressman Robert W. Myers was seeking another nomination. Cyrus E. Davis of Greene county and Charles W. Wellman of Sullivan county were also aspirants. Again it appeared that he who would get the support of Daviess county would be nominated. A mass convention met at Washington on March 15, 1902, to select delegates. The fight over the chairman of the convention decided the matter. The following is taken from the account of the Washington Democrat: "John H. Spencer placed A. O. Fulkerson in nomination and Hamlet Allen suggested the name of Hon. John H. O'Neill. Robert P. Shirley was called to the chair to decide the voice of the convention. Mr. Shirley decided in favor of Mr. Fulkerson. A. J. Padgett and J. W. Ogdon appealed from the chair, but there was such an uproar that they could not make their voices heard in all parts of the house. A. J. Dant appeared on the stage at this juncture and asked that the immense crowd remain quiet. The three candidates for Congress, Messrs. Myers, Davis and Wellman, were then called upon and spoke briefly. The three congressional candidates then agreed upon a method of selecting a chairman to preside over the convention—the agreement that the opera house be cleared and that three men, each representing a congressional candidate, be stationed at the door and count those favoring O'Neill and those favoring Fulkerson. This plan of deciding the choice of the convention resulted in favor of Mr. O'Neill." O'Neill was a supporter of Davis and appointed delegates favoring Davis.

On December 31, 1915, Lew S. Core, Auditor; John L. Clark, Treasurer, and George W. Harmon, Sheriff, all Democrats, retired from office. They had made splendid officials. They were succeeded by Republicans. James W. Ogdon, Judge; William H. Kiefer, Clerk; James Sause, County Commissioner, and A. O. Fulkerson, County Superintendent, are at this writing the only county officials who are Democrats.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DEARBORN COUNTY

WHEN General William Henry Harrison, then governor of Indiana Territory, on the 7th of March, 1803, issued his proclamation authorizing the organization of Dearborn county, he created and set aside a political unit which seems to have been destined to be eternally and overwhelmingly Democratic.

The new county was named in honor of Major-General Henry Dearborn, at that time Secretary of War under President Thomas Jefferson.

So far as known, and so far as any records can be found, and these records by the way are pretty complete, Dearborn county has never in her history of considerably over one hundred years cast a majority for any ticket other than Democratic. These majorities have also been very substantial.

From 1790 to 1798 Dearborn was a part of Knox county, and associated in good Democratic company. In 1798 and until 1802, at which latter date the western boundary of the state of Ohio was described by the congress, Dearborn became a part of Hamilton county, Ohio. For one year following its disconnection from the Ohio county, the territory was unattached, becoming a part of Clark county, Indiana, only a few months before the legislature passed an act organizing Dearborn as an independent county, with the seat of justice at Lawrenceburg.

From the time when Dearborn county was first organized Rising Sun was ambitious to be named as the seat of justice. The people of Rising Sun and in the territory surrounding were demanding that a new county be created in order that they might select their own officials. They were unable to accomplish anything until in 1836, when they joined with the people of Wilmington and succeeded in removing the county seat from Lawrenceburg to Wilmington. The only way in which Lawrenceburg could have the court house brought home with the prospect of retaining it permanently was to accede to the demands of the Rising Sun sentiment for a new county.

An act of the legislature in 1843 provided for and created the county of Ohio, with Rising Sun as the seat of government, at the same time provided for removing the Dearborn county seat from Wilmington to Lawrenceburg. This division of territory in no way changed the political complexion of Dearborn county, but it did set off to themselves a small number of voters who have been rather persistent about electing Republican officials; this, however, by very narrow majorities.

On the same day that Dearborn county was organized General William Henry Harrison appointed justices who should constitute the court of common pleas, the court of general quarter sessions of the peace, and the orphans' court. The men appointed were Benjamin Chambers, Jabez Percival, Barnet Hulick, John Brownson, Jeremiah Hunt, Richard Stevens, William Major and James McCarty. Samuel C. Vance was named clerk of courts and James Dill recorder.

The first session of the court of general quarter sessions was held in one room of the residence of Dr. Jabez Percival at Lawrenceburg. This was on the first Monday in September, 1803.

At this session of the court there were some interesting arguments of a nature that do not prevail in more modern times. An altercation arose between the judge and one of the witnesses who was rather slow in responding to questions. The witness concluded the argument with an old-fashioned oak clapboard. The judge succeeded in protecting his head by throwing up his arm to meet the blow. This resulted in breaking both the clapboard and the judge's arm. After the judges had conferred on the matter they decided the witness was guilty of contempt of court and sentenced him to jail. There being no jail, his hands and feet were tied and he was placed in a fence corner, protected by a few extra rails to prevent his rolling out. This constituted his prison until such time as he was willing to admit that he was at least sorry that he had assailed the court. No political significance attached to the incident, nor is there any record that it was held against either of the participants in any future campaign.

In the appointment of territorial judges, from March 7, 1803, when the county was organized, and until 1816, when the state was admitted to the Union, if politics had anything to do with the selection, the people of the county were in no way responsible. They had nothing to say about the matter. No doubt the men were selected more for their ability and capacity to fill the position than from any political alliance, persons qualified for that position at that time not being so numerous as at the present day.

As illustrating the staunch Democracy of the people of Dearborn county, it is interesting to notice the few instances in which Republicans have been permitted to hold local offices. In the long list of circuit judges, who always have and do today represent Dearborn, in alliance with one or more of her neighboring counties, the Dearborn Democratic majority has been sufficient to overcome any Whig or Republican voting on the part of her neighbors and political associates.

In only two instances in the election of circuit judges has any Republican succeeded in getting into office. Jeremiah M. Wilson, of Fayette county, was the first of these, serving from 1865 to 1869. Robert N. Lamb was the second and last Republican who succeeded in any such performance. He was from Switzerland county, and served from '69 to '71. Judge Lamb's one term as circuit judge followed his service on the common pleas bench from 1865 to 1869. The other Republican judge, who also came from Switzerland county, sat in the common pleas court from 1861 to 1865. He was Judge Francis M. Adkinson. These were the only Republicans who served Dearborn county in a judicial capacity in the first one hundred years of the state's history.

As already stated, the Democratic majorities have been very large and always safe. Only once did the Republicans succeed in leading on a presidential candidate. That was when Abraham Lincoln was elected in 1860 and the opposition was divided into three factions, Douglas, Democrat, receiving 787 votes, Breckenridge, Southern Democrat, 525 votes, Bell, Union party, 208 votes. Lincoln was given 1,158 votes. In 1864, on the state election, the county came nearer going Republican than ever before or since. At that time the vote stood 2,354 Democratic and 2,451 Republican. The presidential votes of the county since 1852, previous to which time everything was overwhelmingly Democratic, stood as follows:

| | Dem. | Rep. | South. Amer. | Dem. | Union | Pro. |
|-----------|-------|-------|-----------------|------|-------|------|

A good many distinguished citizens and otherwise have held the office of county commissioner in Dearborn county in the period of one hundred years. In the whole list there are only two recorded in any history, or remembered by any one, who were Republicans. These were Benjamin P. Walser, elected in 1895, and Frederick Wolber, elected in 1896.

In the choosing of auditors the Republicans were more fortunate. They actually succeeded in electing five auditors, the first being Alexander Pattison, who was elected in 1879, the next Edward D. Moore, who came in by a small majority in 1887; then Ambrose E. Nolin, elected in 1895, Charles L. Walser, elected in 1897, and Harry Lauterbeck, who was elected in 1914.

The offices of county treasurer, county recorder, county sheriff, prosecuting attorney, county coroner and county surveyor have never been invaded by any but Democrats. In only one instance has any Republican got into the office of county clerk. This was David Lesteitler, who was elected in 1894 and served for four years.

Members of the State Legislature, both senators and representatives, have all been Democratic.

These served as territorial judges for the fourteen years preceding the admission of the State:

Benjamin Chambers—March 7, 1803, to Dec. 14, 1810.

Jabez Percival—March 8, 1803, to Jan. 6, 1814.

Barnet Hulick—March 7, 1803, to Dec. 14, 1809.

John Brownson—March 7, 1803, to Jan. 6, 1814.

Jeremiah Hunt—March 7, 1803.

Richard Stevens—March 7, 1803.

William Major—March 7, 1803, to Jan. 6, 1814.

James McCarty—March 7, 1803.

Isaac Dunn—March 17, 1812, to Feb. 14, 1817.

Elijah Sparks—Jan. 16, 1814; died May, 1815.

James Noble—Appointed vacancy; served till 1816.

Jesse L. Holman—Judge at time State was admitted in 1816.

Since the State became a part of the Union and the county of Dearborn began electing its own officials, these Democrats have been elected to office:

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DECATUR COUNTY

By John F. Russell

THE time of the birth of Democracy in Decatur county is obscured in a maze of tradition. Historical Democracy began at a time when the foundations of the present splendid civilization was being laid, but its principles lived in the thoughts and deeds of men long before they were grouped and classified under a conventional party name.

When Whig and Union party were aligning themselves upon the issues in the beginning of Decatur county political history, Democracy in its plasmic state was ready to be evolved from the lives of such men as Doddridge Alley and Joseph V. Bemusdaffer. Alley was the pioneer Democrat of Decatur county. He was temperamentally just such a man as would espouse the cause of Jefferson without pressure or persuasion, because he was spontaneously and by nature a Democrat.

He was elevated to office before the Democratic party had fully matured at the first regular election after the organization of the county in 1822, defeating his opponent for Sheriff by twelve votes. He served four years as Sheriff and was then in 1826 elected State Representative. The next year he was defeated by Thomas Hendricks, but in 1831 he was returned to the Legislature and remained one year.

In those days of imperfect transportation facilities and impossible highways, Alley was obliged to ride horseback to Indianapolis, a distance of approximately fifty miles. When he reached the State House it occurred to him that he had forgotten his credentials. In the excitement incident to his departure on his first mission of State he had neglected to include this document in his baggage. So he rode back to Greensburg that night and returned to the Capital the following morning. The long and tortuous ride over indifferent roads left him in a condition which only those who have remained hours in the saddle are in a position to appreciate. But the unwritten annals of Decatur county record that he stood during the first day of the session.

Alley is credited with being the author of a law empowering Sheriffs to perform marriages. The reason assigned for this law was that while ministers of the gospel were scarce in eastern Indiana there were Sheriffs in every county. Alley introduced a bill providing for the annexation of eighteen sections of Shelby county. He pointed out artlessly that Shelby county was very un-healthful and for that reason the people living within the territory comprised in the eighteen sections wished to "get out of it" and become citizens of Decatur county.

Since 1835 Democracy has intermittently found expression in a partisan press. William Vallette Coleman of Brookville started the Greensburg Courier in that year and remained here until the spring of the following year when he moved his printing plant to Shelbyville. For a period of five years thereafter local Democracy was without an "organ," but in 1841 Peter J. Bartholomew began the publication of the Chronicle of the Times, which had a brief career. Upon the death of Bartholomew, Philander Hamilton and James M. Talbot changed the name of this paper to the Decatur Sentinel, but a year later the name was again changed to the Decatur Phoenix, with Israel T. Gibson editor. In 1843 it was merged with the Repository, a paper of opposite political views.

In the same year Oscar B. Hord and Charles R. Hobbs started the Greensburg Gazette. Two years later the Gazette was succeeded by the Democratic Rifle, which shot bullets of invective into the enemy as accurately and deadly as the old flint-lock after which it was named. Bernard Mullen was editor of the Rifle. Following the death of Mullen's paper, John B. Covington in 1856 started a Democratic paper which history has failed to name. It survived three years and was sold by the Sheriff for $25.25. The Decatur Democrat, Dr. W. H. Van Horn, editor, was in existence in 1858. It was opposed to slavery, but beyond that little is known of its history. In 1863 the Greensburg Fact was launched by Burnham & Howell. It had a brief and apparently uneventful career. In 1869 Martin Zorger and Martin Blair started the New Era, which later passed to James E. Mendenhall. In 1892 Allen W. Clark, the son of a Baptist clergyman, bought the New Era of Mr. Mendenhall and remained as its editor until 1897, when the paper was disposed of to W. H. Glidewell, who finally sold it to J. W. Rucker & Company.

Early in April, 1910, Walter A. Kaler launched the Weekly Democrat and Evening Times, and a year later sold these papers to the Greensburg Democrat Company, Alex. Porter, president; John F. Russell, vice-president, and Charles H. Ewing, secretary and treasurer. The Democrat and Times survive as the recognized exponents of Democracy in the county.

It is interesting to note, in contemplating the rapid growth of population during the intervening years, that only 144 votes were cast in this county at the first Presidential election held November 6, 1824. Of this number Andrew Jackson received 55, John Quincy Adams 17, and Henry Clay 72. It will be seen that the sum of the votes cast for Jackson and Adams equaled that cast for Clay.

At subsequent Presidential elections Decatur county voted as follows:

1828—John Quincy Adams, 346; Andrew Jackson, 292.

1832—Henry Clay, 539; Andrew Jackson, 405.

1836—Wm. H. Harrison, 950; Martin Van Buren, 513.

1840—Wm. H. Harrison, 1,294; Martin Van Buren, 759.

1844—Henry Clay, 1,275; James K. Polk, 1,091.

One of the early statesmen who has left his impress upon the political life of the county was Colonel James B. Foley, 1807-1886. Mr. Foley was elected to Congress in 1856, defeating the brilliant Will Cumback, who was then in Congress. He was a farmer statesman and a man of peculiar natural gifts. Prior to his election to Congress, Foley was made brigadier-general of militia by Governor Wright. In 1874 he was again importuned to run for Congress, but declined.

A feature of the Foley campaign was a barbecue which has found its way into history. Strangely enough this big Democratic demonstration was marred by none of the outbreaks of hoodlumism which were of frequent occurrence in those days of bitter political strife. Democrats are now living who recall this feast in a grove in the heart of the city as it now stands. This grove later became the site of an orphans' home, which a few years ago was dismantled to make way for the handsome new high school building.

Royal B. Cobb was the candidate for Judge and Jack De Armond was an aspirant for the Legislature. Joseph V. Bemusdaffer, a pioneer Democrat, was one of the speakers. The slogan of this meeting was "Buchanan, Cobwebb and De Armond."

Conspicuous among the men who have contributed to Democratic history in county and State are James Gavin, elected to Congress in 1863; Oscar B. Hord, elected Attorney-General in 1862 and author of Gavin & Hord's Indiana Statutes; Joseph V. Bemusdaffer, elected to the State Legislature in 1863, defeating the spectacular D. R. Van Buskirk by 142 votes in a campaign which has become memorable; Alex. L. Underwood, elected to the Legislature in 1853; John W. Shaw, elected to the Legislature in 1875; Oscar L. Pulse, who served in the Legislature, 1883-4; Colonel B. C. Shaw, who was elected Treasurer of State at the close of the Civil War; Judge Andrew Davison, brilliant lawyer, who was elected to the Supreme Bench in 1852 and again in 1858, retiring in 1864; John S. Scobey, who served in the State Senate and was a Presidential elector in 1872 and again in 1876; Robert W. Miers, who was a candidate for Secretary of State in 1886. Mr. Miers later moved to Bloomington, Ind., where he was thrice elected to Congress and is now on the Circuit bench.

Democracy has been tirelessly championed by the Reilly, Ewing, Denniston, Sefton, Foley, De Armond, Kincaid, Miers, Barnes and Bracken families, whose descendants have adhered closely to the traditions and defended the fundamental principles which have made the party a vital force in the economy of present-day society.

Cortez Ewing, 1837-1882, was one of the many Democrats who became a national figure. He served in the general land office in Washington under Thomas A. Hendricks, who was then commissioner, and from 1874 to 1878 was a trustee for the State institution for the blind. James K. Ewing, a lawyer in actual practice for fifty years, represented this district in the national Democratic convention in St. Louis in 1888. He was also on the bench in this judicial circuit from 1893 to 1895. Morgan L. Miers was a delegate to the national convention in St. Louis in 1904.

John E. Osborn was chairman of the old sixth district, of which this county was a part, from 1908 to 1911.

George P. Shoemaker was elected in 1912 to represent the Fourth Congressional District in the electoral college. Mr. Shoemaker had the peculiar honor of being a member of the electoral college which made Woodrow Wilson President. This was the first time since 1876 that Decatur county gave a Democratic Presidential candidate a majority. Tilden carried the county by sixteen votes. The Democrats received a majority in the county at the Presidential election in 1856.

Men who have served the party as county chairmen are legion. Prominent among them are John L. Bracken, who served from 1876 to 1878. Then follow John H. Bobbitt, Samuel H. Logan, Russell Sawyer, Cortez Ewing, James E. Mendenhall, Alex. Porter, Will Ryan, W. J. Kincaid, George E. Erdmann, Cicero Northern, Edward Kessing and George Menzie. James E. Mendenhall also served as Clerk of the committee on public lands in the fiftieth Congress and later was named without solicitation by Congressman Holman as secretary of the committee on Indian affairs and served throughout the fifty-third Congress.

W. J. Kincaid was elected State Representative in 1912 and again in 1914. George E. Erdmann was appointed Postmaster at Greensburg, and Cicero Northern, before his term as county chairman expired, accepted an appointment in the internal revenue service. Edward Kessing, following the election of 1914, became a traveling representative of the federal census bureau.

The writer, who has been a member of the county organization for years, has been fittingly recognized by the State administration. On August 1, 1914, he was appointed by Governor Ralston on the board of trustees of the Southeastern Hospital for the Insane at Madison, and on August 1, 1918, was re-appointed by Governor Goodrich for another four years.

In 1916 he had the honor of representing the Fourth Congressional District as a delegate to the National Democratic Convention at St. Louis.

HISTORY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY OF DEKALB COUNTY

THE good people of Dekalb county saw to it in the beginning that this particular portion of the earth was made safe for democracy. It has remained more than reasonably so ever since. In state campaigns all political parties look to Dekalb county as sure to return a big Democratic majority.

The county was organized under an act of the Legislature passed in the winter of 1836-7, and named in honor of Baron DeKalb, who enlisted in the American army of the revolution and was commissioned a general, losing his life fighting for American independence at the battle of Camden in August, 1780.

Immediately upon the organization of the county a lively scrap was precipitated for the location of the county seat. On this, as on all other matters political, the final struggle demonstrated that the people were almost unanimous, and they selected Auburn. This has remained the seat of the county government ever since.

The first regular election after the organization of the county was held on the 6th of August, 1838, a board of commissioners having been rather informally chosen in 1837. The 1838 election named Luther Keep for commissioner, Wesley Park for sheriff, Lott Herrick for school commissioner and Robert Work for coroner. David B. Herriman was given a majority of 14 for representative.

The first presidential election in which this county participated as an individual unit was in 1840, when the Western States were arrayed against the East in proposing the election of William Henry Harrison. This is one of the rare occasions when this county did not return a big Democratic majority. Of 334 votes cast 177 were for Harrison and 167 for Van Buren.

It must be noted that while state pride succeeded in getting a majority of 10 for Harrison at the election in November, 1840, the vote on state and county officers on the 3d of August the same year showed a large majority for all the Democratic candidates, in some instances there being no opposition whatever. Tightman A. Howard, the Democratic candidate for governor, defeated Samuel Bigger, the Whig candidate.

In the county election of 1841 out of a total of 245 votes cast the Democratic candidates received 240 to 244. In August, 1842, the Democratic majority was about the same. Samuel W. Sprott, Democratic candidate for clerk, received 273 votes without opposition, while Aaron Hague received 243 votes and John Rose, the Whig candidate, received 1 vote.

In the election of August, 1843, when a governor was to be chosen, with all state officers, the vote was more evenly divided, but at the same time it was safely Democratic. James Whitcomb, Democratic nominee for governor, received 290 votes, while Samuel Bigger, his Whig opponent, was given 212. The returns on all the offices show that in those days there was not much "scratching." The straight party ticket seemed to have been the rule.

The vote seemed to grow quite rapidly from year to year, and in August, 1844, Jacob Helwig, the Democratic nominee for representative, received 304 votes, while his Whig opponent, Ariel Walden, was given 254. Always a safe majority for Democracy.

The national election of 1844 was one very bitterly fought. Henry Clay of Kentucky was nominated in that year as the Whig candidate against James K. Polk. The number of votes cast was about double that of 1840, Polk receiving 327 and Clay 269, a Democratic majority of 58.

Congressmen and county officers were again to be elected in August, 1845. Andrew Kennedy, the Democratic nominee for congress, received 316 votes against 237 cast for his Whig opponent, L. G. Thompson. Clark Powers was chosen representative, John W. Dawson prosecutor, Amzi Seely commissioner, Miles Waterman auditor, William P. Means assessor, I. C. George school commissioner and David Weaver coroner.

In August, 1846, James Whitcomb, being nominated by the Democrats to succeed himself as governor, was this time opposed by Joseph G. Marshall. Dekalb county contributed her portion of the state majority by giving to Whitcomb 366 votes against 219 for Marshall. Whitcomb's majority was 147. The largest endorsement given any Democrat in the county was to David Weaver for coroner, he receiving all the votes cast for that office—306.

In the August election of 1847 William Rockhill, Democratic nominee for congressman, received 406 votes against 341 votes cast for his opponent, William G. Ewing. In this election the Democrats named for prosecutor Reuben J. Dawson, he receiving 446 votes against 10 for the opposition.

In August of 1848 the local election for representative gave Reuben J. Dawson 586 votes against 343 for his opponent, C. Luce, the Democratic majority being 243. Some of the county offices in this same election were also almost unanimous.

Two months later in the November presidential election of 1848, party divisions were again closely drawn. Cass and Butler, the Democratic nominees, received 968 votes, Taylor and Filmore, the Whig candidates, 577, while Van Buren and Adams, representing the Free Soil movement, which in this part of the country had received considerable support, were accorded 347 votes. Cass and Butler's plurality was 391.

Lacking the excitement of a presidential campaign, the contest for election of governor, congressmen, state and county officers, showed considerable falling off in the total vote in August, 1849, when Joseph A. Wright, the Democratic nominee, was given 568 votes in Dekalb, his opponent, John A. Matson, the Whig nominee, receiving 298. The Wright majority in Dekalb county was 270, while in the state his majority was 9,768.

The Democratic majority from August, 1849, to August, 1850, grew quite materially. In the election on the latter date Robert Work, Democratic nominee for senator from Dekalb, received 665 votes, while Ephraim Walters, his Whig opponent, was given 104, Work's majority being 561. The Democratic majorities in this election showed no lower than 200, the highest being 997. For representative Edward R. May was chosen. For associate judges Gilman C. Mudgett and Abraham Cope were elected. Commissioner from the first district was Oliver B. Keep; from the second district William Showers, who received a majority of 997. For sheriff William K. Straight received the smallest Democratic majority on the ticket, 200. Albert B. Mott was elected prosecutor, Miles Waterman auditor, Samuel W. Ralston treasurer, and John McCune recorder.

One year later Samuel W. Brenton, Democratic nominee for congress, was given a very close race by James W. Boardman. Brenton received 485 votes, while Boardman received 474, the Democratic majority being 11. The rest of the county ticket was elected without serious opposition, in several instances the Whig party making no nominations.

The next year brought elections both for president and governor, the state election having been changed from August to October, where it remained for a number of years. In October of 1852, Joseph A. Wright was the Democratic nominee to succeed himself as governor. Dekalb again contributed her share by giving Wright 684 votes against Nicholas McCarty, who received 386. Wright's Democratic majority was 298. His majority in the state was 8,935.

On the Democratic ticket at the same election A. P. Willard, candidate for lieutenant-governor, received a majority of 295 in Dekalb. For congressman E. M. Chamberlain, Democrat, had a majority of 220. E. A. McMahan, candidate for circuit judge, had no opposition and received 692 votes. J. M. McConnell for prosecutor had a majority of 592. George W. McConnell for senator showed a lead of 212. For representative E. F. Hammond led by 263, Robert Work with 127. For judge of the common pleas court John Morris led by 192. For common pleas prosecutor W. W. Griswold had a lead of 432. For commissioners Solomon D. Long led by 266, Joseph Walter by 221, Jeremiah Hemstreet by 135. William K. Straight was elected sheriff without opposition, receiving 708 votes. For treasurer Joel E. Hendricks led by 55 only, while Joseph Nodine had no opposition, and for coroner Lyman Chidsey was elected by 289.
